Now, it is true that the courts of this country have not gone so far as to express themselves upon the question of convenience in terms similar to those used in the Scottish cases, though, as I have already noticed, it may be doubted whether there is any substantial difference between the two. Yet it seems to me clear that the inconvenience of trying a case in a particular tribunal may be such as practically to work a serious injustice upon a defendant and be vexatious. This would probably not be so if the difference of trying in one country rather than in another were merely measured by some extra expense; but where the difficulty for the defendant of trying in the country in which the action is brought is such that it is impracticable to properly try the case by reason of the difficulty of procuring the attendance of busy men as witnesses and keeping them during a long trial, and of having to deal with masses of books, documents, and papers which are not in the country where the action is brought, and of dealing with law foreign to the tribunal, it appears to me that a case of vexation in some circumstances may be made out if the plaintiff chooses to sue in that country rather than in that where everybody is and where all the witnesses and material for the trial are. If, for instance, as was put in argument, a dispute of a complicated character had arisen between two foreigners in a foreign country, and one of them was made defendant in an action in this country by serving him with a writ while he happened to be here for a few days' visit, I apprehend that, although there would be jurisdiction in the court to entertain the suit, it would have little hesitation in treating the action as vexatious and staying it. Suppose, again, for instance, that this action had been brought against all the present defendants except Scott, and the bank had been served in this country, where it can be, as it has been in the present case, because it had a branch here, could there be any reasonable doubt but that the plaintiff must be treated as intending to bring a vexatious action and that such action would be stayed? If that were not held, I see no reason why anyone abroad might not sue and be allowed to proceed against a bank which had a branch in this country in respect of transactions all of which had taken place in some other country where the head office of the bank was —e.g., Australia or Brazil—and where the inconvenience of trying the case in this country would be so enormous as practically to work the most serious injustice upon the defendant. The matter is, in this respect, of general importance because so many banks and other mercantile houses which are established in our Colonies and in the United States and other foreign countries have branches here. To a business concern to allow actions to proceed in such circumstances when there is a proper and adequate tribunal in the place where both parties really are, and dealt with each other, and all the evidence is, would be intolerable.

In the present case, apart from this question about Scott, it is difficult to conceive anything more harassing to the defendant bank than to have their officials dragged up to London for a lengthy trial, when the Court of Session is, so to speak, across the way in Edinburgh, and when together with their officials they would have to bring up here and keep away from their business numerous other witnesses with a mass of books, papers, and documents, if they can get them at all, which there seems some difficulty about without orders from the Court of Session as to some of them. All this, to my mind, is not measured by mere expense, and even on the question of expense it is to be pointed out that the cost of trying a case such as that indicated by the statement of claim, which refers to very complicated matters and attacks the character of the bank and Sir George Anderson, is utterly out of proportion to the trumpery amount in dispute; and if the defendants win, one would gather that they would have little prospect of recovering their costs from the plaintiff.

The question then seems to me to resolve itself into this, viz., whether the fact that Scott has been made a defendant and has been served in England makes any difference in the view which the court should take of the case. To my mind it does not, having regard to the special circumstances of the case. Of course it might do so if Scott were a real defendant and it had been necessary to bring one action to join him and the bank in this country; then the bank might have had to submit. But Sir George Anderson's affidavit describes Scott's position, and the affidavits of the plaintiff and his solicitor do not contain a word to show that Scott was not known to the plaintiff to be an uncertificated bankrupt. Scott is not defending, and could not apparently find any means for doing so. Was he, then, joined because the plaintiff wished to enforce his remedies against him? I feel it impossible to take this view, and, notwithstanding what the plaintiff and his solicitor say in their affidavits, I cannot bring myself to find that in fact the action is bonâ fide brought in this country. One other point; it is said by the plaintiff that a judgment against Scott might bar the plaintiff's remedy against the bank, but Mr. Dalziel, the bank's law agent, says that this is not so in Scotland, and, although this is disputed by the plaintiff's solicitor, I prefer to accept Mr. Dalziel's view of the law. He is a Writer to the Signet of thirty-nine years' standing; the plaintiff's solicitor does not appear to possess the same extensive experience. But if there be any doubt on the matter, the point is dealt with by the master's order under which the bank and Sir George Anderson are not to raise any point out of this. Moreover, there is no need for the plaintiff to sign judgment against Scott, and it seems clear he will get nothing if he does. It is further said by the plaintiff that he wishes to get discovery against Scott; but as Scott is not defending, I fail to see how the plaintiff can expect to get any discovery against him which would in any way affect the case.

For these reasons I think that this appeal should be allowed with costs here and below, the master's order restored subject to a slight correction, and the plaintiff left to pursue his remedies against the bank and Sir George Anderson on the other side of the Tweed amid his own countrymen. This involves no hardship upon the plaintiff, but is really to his advantage if his claim is persisted in and fought out; for he can make it at less expense and trouble to himself in Scotland than in England. I think the restored order of the master should be slightly varied by the stay being of the proceedings against the defendant bank and the defendant Sir George Anderson.

COLLINS, M.R.—Romer, L.J., and I have read the judgment which has just been delivered, and we agree with it.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Solicitor for the respondent, D. W. Drummond.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Oct. 25, 26.

WRIGLEY v. GILL. (a.)

Mortgage—Mortgagee in possession—Redemption—Rests—Accounts—Sale of part of the mortgaged property—Proviso for capitalization of interest—Right to compound interest.

A mortgagor who enters into possession and receives the rent of the mortgaged property is not entitled to the benefit of a provision in the mortgage deed for the capitalization of interest in the event of its being in arrear, provided that at the date of the interest becoming due there is in the hands of the mortgagee rent sufficient, after making all proper deductions, for the payment of the interest, even though no appropriation of such rent to payment of interest has ever been made.

Dictum of Cotton, L.J., in Cockburn v. Edwards, 29 W. R. 136, approved, and preferred to that of Jessel, M.R., in the same case.

Judgment of Warrington, J., 53 W. R. 334, [1905] 1 Ch. 241, affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Warrington, J. (reported 53 W. R. 334, [1905] 1 Ch. 241), varying the master's certificate in a mortgagor's action for redemption on a summons by the plaintiff.

The facts were as follows: By a mortgage of the 22nd of October, 1887, certain leasehold properties were subdemised by the plaintiff to a building society to secure £1,000.

On the 8th of October, 1890, and the 4th of July, 1892, further charges for £120 and £60 respectively were given by the plaintiff to the building society on the same security.

On the 13th of March, 1893, by a second mortgage the plaintiff mortgaged the equity of redemption of these properties to secure £200 to the defendant Ann Gill. The mortgagor covenanted to pay the mortgagee interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

The deed also contained the following proviso: "Provided also and it is hereby agreed that if and so often as any interest due under the covenant hereinbefore contained in this present provision shall be in arrear for twenty-one days after the day appointed for payment thereof, such interest shall be treated as an accession to the capital money hereby secured as on the day on which the same ought to have been paid, and shall thenceforth bear interest payable at the rate and on the days aforesaid, and this security shall extend to such capitalized interest in all respects."

On the 29th of May, 1894, half a year's interest on the defendant's mortgage being over two months in arrear, the mortgagee Gill entered into possession of the mortgaged properties.

On the 16th of June, 1894, the plaintiff paid the interest then due to the defendant, but the latter still remained in possession.

On the 11th September, 1894, the defendant took a transfer from the building society of the mortgage of the 22nd of October, 1887, and the two further charges.

On the 24th of November, 1899, the defendant sold a portion of the mortgaged properties for £250 under the power of sale in the mortgage.

On the 20th of September, 1900, the present action was commenced, the plaintiff claiming redemption of the mortgaged properties with the usual accounts.

The master by his certificate of the 29th of July, 1904, certified that there was due from the plaintiff to the defendant under the second mortgage of the 13th of March, 1893, the sum of £200 for principal and £158 13s. 1d. for compound interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 13th of March, 1894, to the date of the certificate. That there was due on the first mortgage and further charges £1,299 8s. 1d. for principal and £642 1s. for simple interest thereon at 5 per cent. from the 11th of September, 1894, to the date of certificate. From these amounts he set off the £250 proceeds of sale thereinafter referred to; he also certified the amount of rents and profits received by the defendant, and that a part of the property had been sold by the defendant on the 24th of November, 1899, for £250, and that this sum had been applied by the defendant in reduction of the principal and interest due under the second mortgage securities.

The plaintiff took out a summons to vary the master's certificate in, among other things, the following particular: "By declaring that no interest having been due under the mortgages mentioned in the said certificate to the defendant at the date when possession of the mortgaged premises was taken by the defendant, only simple interest at the rate of 6 per cent. is payable upon the mortgage dated the 13th of March, 1893."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Warrington, J., varied the certificate in accordance with the summons.

The part of the order appealed from was the following declaration: "The court doth declare that the defendants are only entitled to simple interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the principal sum of £200 secured by the indenture of mortgage dated the 13th of March, 1893, except that if the rents in the hands of the defendants or any of them were (after deducting the amount of any outgoings except costs properly chargeable against such rents during the half-year hereinafter mentioned, and the interest on the mortgage dated the 22nd of October, 1887, and the further charges dated the 8th of October, 1890, and the 4th of July, 1892, and the indenture of transfer dated the 11th of September, 1894, and interest on the sums expended in repairs accrued for the half-yearly day hereinafter mentioned), neither on any half-yearly day on which, under the said mortgage dated the 13th of March, 1893, interest was payable, nor at any time in the course of twenty-one days subsequent to such half-yearly day, equal to or in excess of the amount payable in respect of such half-year's interest under the mortgage dated the 13th of March, 1893, then the amount by which such rents were less than the amount of such half-yearly interest ought to be treated as an accession to the principal sum of £200, and carry interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum."

The defendants appealed.

Rowden, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the defendants.—Compound interest is allowed under the proviso that when interest is in arrears for twenty-one days it shall be capitalized. The question is whether interest is in arrear when nothing is paid by the mortgagor, but the mortgagee being in possession receives the rents and profits. The point is really covered by Union Bank of London v. Ingram, 29 W. R. 209, 16 Ch. D. 53; Cockburn v. Edwards, 29 W. R. 136, 18 Ch. D. 449; and Bright v. Campbell, 37 W. R. 745, 41 Ch. D. 388. There was no appropriation by the mortgagee of these rents and profits to the payment of interest. The order appealed from in fact requires that the account shall be taken with half-yearly rests. This is contrary to the practice. A mortgagee cannot be compelled to accept payment in driblets: Ainsworth v. Wilding [1905], 1 Ch. 438.

Peterson, for the plaintiff.—None of the cases cited really cover the present point. In Cockburn v. Edwards there is a dictum of Jessel, M.R., one way and of Cotton, L.J., the other. It is submitted that the latter should be preferred—i.e., that when a mortgagee in possession has received rents more than sufficient for payment of interest and expenses, interest should not be held to be in arrear merely because there has been no appropriation. The object of a proviso like this is to prevent the mortgagee being kept out of his money, and so long as the money comes to his hands the proviso does not take effect.

Rowden, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from part of the order dated the 24th of November, 1894, and made by Warrington, J., on the further consideration of an action brought by a mortgagor for redemption of the mortgage property. The effect of that order is that the mortgagor is relieved from the burden of capitalization of interest except in the cases therein mentioned. The question for decision depends entirely upon the meaning of the proviso contained in the mortgage deed of the 13th of March, 1893. We have to consider whether on the facts it has been shown that interest has been in arrear for twenty-one days after the days respectively appointed for payment. It has not been suggested that the mortgagor in fact made any payment of the interest as such, but it is said that although he did not make any payment of interest as such, yet that if the mortgagee had in her hands rent which after deducting the ground-rent and other proper outgoings left in her hands a sum sufficient for the payment of the interest, then it cannot be said that within the meaning of the proviso the interest was in arrear. Now, on the authorities cited to us, it cannot be said that the matter is perfectly clear, but our attention has been called to expressions made use of by Jessel, M.R., in Cockburn v. Edwards which show, I think most clearly, that in his view the fact that the assignee has in his hands rents which after making all proper deduction would be available for the payment of the interest would not of itself be sufficient to prevent the interest from being in arrear. The question in that case did not arise upon a covenant identical with the covenant in this case, but the question was whether a power of sale by the mortgagee had arisen, and that depended upon whether the interest had been three months in arrear according to the terms of the mortgage deed. Jessel, M.R., said: "But was there any interest in arrear? It has been argued that a mortgagee in possession, if he receives rents to an amount more than sufficient to pay the interest, must be taken to have been paid his interest. I cannot accede to that argument. A mortgagee in possession first deducts expenses, and then what remains goes against principal and interest, but till an account is taken there is no set off; there is no appropriation of the rents. This is still clearer if you take the case of a horse. The mortgagee lets it out for hire, he has to pay the expenses of its keep, and you cannot treat his receipts as appropriated to anything till an account is rendered." The learned judge then referred to Brocklehurst v. Jessop, 7 Sim. 438, and expressed his disapproval of a dictum of Shadwell, V.C., in that case to the effect that the receipt of rents by an equitable mortgagee in possession ought primâ facie to be taken as payment either of the principal or interest of his debt as the case may be, and the Master of the Rolls went on to say: "The receipt of rents by the mortgagee is not a payment by the mortgagor or by anyone on his behalf. The mortgagee receives rents which are his own, subject, of course, to the right of redemption." The decision of Cockburn v. Edwards did not essentially turn upon this point, for all the learned judges agreed that in that particular case the accounts showed that there had been such an appropriation of the rents in the hands of the mortgagee that it amounted to a discharge of the interest, so that it was impossible for the mortgagee to say that the interest had been in arrear for the three months, as was necessary to justify his exercise of the power of sale. But Jessel, M.R., did express very plainly his view that if it had been necessary to decide the point the mere fact that the mortgagee had the money in his hands would not have prevented him selling under the power—that is, in other words, that the interest would have been in arrear—that the receipt of rents by the mortgagee did not of itself amount to the payment of interest. But both Brett and Cotton, L.JJ., dealt with the point. Brett, L.J., says: "But was there any interest in arrear? The argument on behalf of the mortgagee went so far as this, that when a mortgagee is in possession there must be interest in arrear, unless an actual appropriation of interest to the payment of the rents has been made. It is not necessary to decide that point, for we have here accounts which show actual appropriation." It is true that there is no affirmative expression by Brett, L.J., of his view on this question, yet to my mind his words suggest very strongly that this was a length to which he was not prepared to go, and I think it may be taken that he did not agree with the positive opinion of Jessel, M.R. Then Cotton, L.J., said: "Interest was in arrear unless the rent received by the mortgagee can be treated as applied in payment of interest. Now receipt of rents by a mortgagee is not as a general rule equivalent to a payment by the mortgagor. If a mortgagee enters into possession his receipt of rents is not payment of interest by the mortgagor so as to entitle the latter to the benefit of a proviso for reduction of interest on punctual payment, and I quite agree with the remarks of the Master of the Rolls as to the dictum in Brocklehurst v. Jessop. If, however, the mortgagee receives rents which are all along more than sufficient for payment of interest and expenses, so that his account, if he were to render one, would show that there was in his hands at every time a balance applicable to the reduction of the principal, I am not prepared to decide that he can, merely because there has been no actual appropriation of the rents to payment of interest, say that there is interest in arrear within the meaning of the proviso in the power of sale." It seems to me that the learned Lord Justice was saying as plainly as possible that he could not go to the same length as Jessel, M.R., but that he thought that the receipt by the mortgagee of rents available for the payment of the interest would preclude him from saying that the interest was in arrear. It is true that the case actually suggested by Cotton, L.J., was one in which a mortgagee receives rents which are "all along" more than sufficient for payment of interest and expenses, so that the mortgagee's account, if he were to render one, would show him that there was in his hands at every time a balance applicable to the reduction of the principal, and that is not quite the present case, because it is said that here, while in some half years the rents may have been sufficient, in other half years they may not have been sufficient for payment of the interest. But I think it is plain that Cotton, L.J., did not agree with dictum of Jessel, M.R. In fact the words which had to be construed in Cockburn v. Edwards—"in arrear"—were not quite the same as those in a covenant giving a mortgagor the benefit of a reduction of the rate of interest on prompt payment. It may well be that the interest is not in arrear although there has not been in strictness any payment of it by the mortgagor. This has been recognized at common law in an action of replevin, where upon the issue whether rent was in arrear the tenant has been allowed to set off against rent payments made by him which ought properly to have been made by the landlord. In the present case, as in Cockburn v. Edwards, the question is not one of payment, but whether the interest was in arrear within the meaning of the proviso. In this conflict of opinion between judges of great authority we have to consider which is the proper conclusion in a case like the present. Primâ facie, one's mind revolts somewhat against a construction which will give the mortgagee a right to interest upon interest—for that is the effect of capitalization in a case in which he has in his pocket money of the mortgagor available for payment of the interest, and which he, the mortgagee, could use for that purpose if he thought fit to do so. We ought not to put such a construction upon such a proviso unless we arrive at the conclusion that this must have been the intention of the parties. This is not the case of a proviso allowing a reduction of the rate of interest to the mortgagor in case he pays the interest punctually. It is the case of a proviso which, in the event of the default of the mortgagor in paying the interest, gives the mortgagee a right to something beyond that to which he would otherwise be entitled under the mortgage deed, and in my opinion the mortgagee could not within the meaning of this proviso say that interest was in arrear which would cease to be in arrear the moment he chose without any further act by the mortgagor.

It was properly admitted by counsel that the case is one in which it is for the mortgagee to prove that the event upon which he was to obtain this advantage has happened, just as in Union Bank of London v. Ingram the onus was upon the mortgagor to prove that the event had happened which entitled him to a reduction of the rate of interest. We have, therefore, to consider whether the interest was in arrear in the present case. In Cockburn v. Edwards it was held there had been an appropriation of the rents to payment of the interest. But it seems to me that we cannot support the judgment of Warrington, J., in the present case unless we are prepared to hold that under such a proviso as we have here the mortgagee will not be entitled to say that the interest is in arrear if while he was in possession he had in his hands on the day appointed for payment of interest, or within twenty-one days afterwards, rents received by him available for the payment of the interest. In my opinion that is the right view. In such circumstances I do not think, but it is not necessary to decide it in this case, that the mortgagee, having in his hands rents available to pay the interest, would be able to relieve himself of the obligation so to apply the money by giving notice to the mortgagor that he had appropriated it to some other purpose, or that he did not appropriate it to the payment of the interest.

In my opinion the judgment of Warrington, J., was right. The meaning is that if the mortgagee has in his hands such an amount of rents as, after deducting all proper outgoings, exceeds or is equal to the interest due, he is not entitled to say that the interest is in arrear. I believe that to be the meaning of the observations of Brett and Cotton, L.JJ., in Cockburn v. Edwards, and it is that which I adopt.

If after making the proper deductions for outgoings a mortgagee in possession has in his hands money available for the payment of the interest, it cannot, in my opinion, be properly said on the construction of such a proviso as this that the parties intended that the interest should be treated as "in arrear" so as to entitle the mortgagee to compound interest.

I desire to add this: The appellant's counsel suggested that this conclusion would be inconsistent with the opinion expressed by Warrington, J., in the present case, and also by Joyce, J., in Ainsworth v. Wilding, that a mortgagee is not bound to receive payment of his interest by driblets. That would be a sound observation if the amount of the rents in the hands of the mortgagee were less than that of the interest due, but in my judgment it has no application to a case in which the amount of the rents available exceeds or is equal to the amount of the interest due on the day appointed for payment or within twenty-one days afterwards. In my opinion the decision of Warrington, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also am unable to differ from the judgment of Warrington, J. The question for our decision is whether the mortgagee is entitled to the benefit of a proviso in the mortgage deed which entitles him to compound interest in case the interest on the mortgage debt shall be in arrear for twenty-one days after the day appointed for payment. [His lordship read the proviso.] In order that the mortgagee may obtain the benefit of this proviso he must show that the event mentioned in it has happened—namely, that the interest has been in arrear for twenty-one days. The question is, has it been established that any interest was in arrear for twenty-one days? [His lordship stated the facts, including the accounts directed by the judgment at the trial, and observed that the account No. 2 was a remarkable one and that it must have been inserted either by consent or by some slip which could not now be corrected. His lordship continued:] Warrington, J., has held that at any rate as regards some half years the mortgagee has not shown that the interest was in arrear within the meaning of the proviso. He pointed out that the onus of proving that the interest was in arrear lies upon the mortgagee, and there is no question but that he was right as to that. The learned judge then discussed three cases which had been cited to him—viz., Union Bank of London v. Ingram, Bright v. Campbell, and Cockburn v. Edwards, the latter of which is the nearest to the present case, and having regard to what was said in it by the judges of the Court of Appeal he came to the conclusion that he was at liberty to act on his own opinion, and to decide that the mortgagee had not shown that interest had been in arrear so as to entitle him to compound interest. With that conclusion I agree, and mainly for the reasons given by the learned judge. Union Bank of London v. Ingram was a decision of Jessel, M.R., upon the construction of a proviso contained in a mortgage for the reduction of the rate of interest (which was 6 per cent.) in case the mortgagor should pay interest at 5 per cent. within forty days after the days appointed for payment. In order that he might claim the benefit of this proviso the event which it had to be shown by the mortgagor had happened was that he had paid the interest within the time limited. The mortgagee had entered into possession and had received the rents of the mortgaged property, and Jessel, M.R., held that this did not amount to payment of the interest by the mortgagor so as to entitle him to the reduction of the rate of interest under the proviso. That decision was followed by Kay, J., in Bright v. Campbell, but I think with some reluctance.

However, the proviso with which we have now to deal differs both in its nature and in its language. In both those cases the mortgagor was claiming the benefit given to him on his paying interest at 5 per cent. within a certain time, and it was held that he did not discharge the onus of showing that he had done this by showing that the mortgagee had received rents sufficient for the the payment of the interest. In the present case it is the mortgagee who is claiming a benefit under a proviso upon the happening of a certain event—i.e., the interest being in arrear. Cockburn v. Edwards much more clearly resembles the present case than either of the other two. In that case the mortgage deed was treated as containing a power for the mortgagee to sell the mortgaged property in the event of the interest being in arrear for more than three months. No interest had been actually paid by the mortgagor, but the mortgagee had gone into possession and had received the rents, and the question was discussed whether that was sufficient to prevent the power of sale arising. There was no actual decision of the point, because all the members of the court held on the evidence that there had been in fact an appropriation of the rents to the payment of interest. Jessel, M.R., however, expressed a strong opinion that the receipt of rents by the mortgagee could not of itself be considered as payment so as to prevent the interest from being in arrear. But I think that, to say the least, Brett and Cotton, L.JJ., did not concur in that view. I am fully sensible of the great weight that is due to any expression of opinion by Jessel, M.R., but at the same time it appears to me that the language of Cotton, L.J., expresses more accurately the rule which is applicable. [His lordship read the passage already quoted from the judgment of Cotton, L.J., and continued:] I agree with the view of the Lord Justice, and wish to adopt his words as my own with regard to the present case. Here the proviso in the mortgage deed is one for the benefit of the mortgagee, and it is inserted with the view of compensating him for being kept out of his interest through nonpayment by the mortgagor. He goes into possession of the property and receives the rents, and thereby deprives the mortgagor of the readiest means of paying the interest, and, as the learned judge found, he had in some half years in his hands rents by which he might have satisfied the interest, and he does not show that he applied those moneys in the payment of anything else under the mortgage. In these circumstances ought he to be allowed to say that within the meaning of the proviso the interest was in arrear? In Cockburn v. Edwards Cotton, L.J., was not prepared to say that interest was in arrear as regarded the exercise of a power of sale, and it seems to me that the same principle applies to the present case, in which the mortgagee is claiming compound interest. It was pressed upon us by the appellants' counsel that if we so decide we shall be departing from the practice of the court that a continuous account is to be taken as between mortgagor and mortgagee without making any rests. I quite agree that that is the practice. But the answer is that the account will not be taken with rests. It is true that an inquiry will be made as to the state of the account each half year, but the account will proceed continuously though the inquiry will be made in order to see whether the proviso applies or not. I desire to say nothing as to how far the mortgagee might have appropriated the rents which he received otherwise than to the payment of interest. It is not suggested that any other appropriation was in fact made. If there were any evidence of such an appropriation I should desire to consider what the effect of it might be. I wish in particular to reserve my opinion as to the operation of the proviso in the event of an appropriation of rents by a mortgagee to the payment of the capital of the mortgage debt. As it is I agree with the judgment of Warrington, J.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is a difficult and important one. There is no decision of the Court of Appeal which is binding upon us, though some dicta of members of that court have been quoted. There are, however, two decisions of judges of first instance on the construction of a proviso for the reduction of the rate of interest upon punctual payment by the mortgagor. It was held first by Jessel, M.R., in Union Bank of London v. Ingram—and this was really followed by Kay, J., in Bright v. Campbell—that in such a case the receipt of rents by a mortgagee in possession could not be regarded as payment of the interest by the mortgagor so as to entitle the mortgagor to claim the benefit of the reduction of the rate of interest. Assuming that those cases were rightly decided, still it seems to me that they in no way govern the present case. There is a great difference between those cases and the case of a proviso in favour of the mortgagee if, and if only, the interest should be in arrear. I think this distinction is very clearly pointed out by Cotton, L.J., in Cockburn v. Edwards—viz., that the interest may not be in arrear although it has not been paid by the mortgagor. The dicta of the judges of the Court of Appeal in that case cannot be reconciled. I have great hesitation in differing from Jessel, M.R., but on the other hand there is the dictum of Cotton, L.J., which commends itself to my mind as it does to my learned brethren. I understand Cotton, L.J., to put the case on the ground of estoppel against the mortgagee, that the mortgagee cannot be allowed to say that the interest is in arrear when he has in his hands rents which might be applied to its payment. I was at one time impressed with the argument that this view really involves the taking of the account of rents and profits with rests. But on consideration I agree with Stirling, L.J., that this will not be the result; the account will still be taken continuously in the usual way and the mortgagee will be entitled to simple interest at 6 per cent. unless he can make out in any half year the existence of the facts which entitle him to compound interest.

Solicitors, Bower, Cotton, & Bower, for Longbotham & Son, Halifax; Scott, Spalding, & Bell, for William Lees, Oldham.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Dec. 7.

In re W. C. HORNE & SONS (LIMITED).
HORNE v. W. C. HORNE & SONS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Debenture-holder action—Plaintiff's solicitors' costs, charges, and expenses—Property recovered or preserved—Charging order—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.

The plaintiff brought an action on behalf of himself and the other debenture-holders to realize their security,

Held, that the solicitor was entitled to a charging order for the difference between the plaintiff's party and party and solicitor and client costs of the action, on the fund belonging to the debenture-holders, because the plaintiff was unable to pay such difference.

This was an action by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and the debenture-holders in W. C. Horne & Sons (Limited), to enforce and realize their security.

In June, 1904, judgment was pronounced, and a receiver and manager was appointed. The company went into liquidation, and the receiver was appointed liquidator of the company.

Mr. F. H. Honey acted as solicitor for the plaintiff and the receiver.

Actions were brought and proceedings were taken with the sanction of the court, and the funds in court after paying the debenture-holders in full left a large surplus for the liquidator of the company.

Mr. F. H. Honey, as solicitor for the plaintiff, made an application by summons that it might be declared that the applicant as solicitor for the plaintiff and other holders of the mortgaged debentures of the defendant company was entitled to a charge upon the sum of £6,000 in court as being property recovered or preserved by the plaintiff and the other holders of the said debentures for the amount of the applicant's taxed costs, charges, and expenses of and in reference to this action.

The Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28, provides: "In every case in which an attorney or solicitor shall be employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard, or shall be depending, to declare such attorney or solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved; and upon such declaration being made such attorney or solicitor shall have a charge upon and against and a right to payment out of the property, of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, which shall have been recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of any such attorney or solicitor, for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such suit, matter, or proceeding; and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to make such order or orders for taxation of and for raising and payment of such costs, charges, and expenses out of the said property as to such court or judge shall appear just and proper."

Waggett, for the application, referred to Harrison v. Cornwall Railway Co., 32 W. R. 748; Greer v. Young, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 548; In re New Zealand Midland Railway Co., 49 W. R. 529, [1901] 2 Ch. 357.

Stone, for the company.

Shebbeare, for the plaintiff.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This case is not without a little difficulty, but I am clearly of opinion that this charging order ought to be made, especially if it be possible to express the order in such a manner as, whilst carrying out the view that I have just expressed, not to seem to run counter to the decided cases. The plaintiff in this case has been so successful as to recover more than enough to pay all the debenture-holders in full, and still to have a surplus for the company.

I will grant the solicitor a charging order for the difference between the plaintiff's party and party and solicitor and client costs of the action on the fund belonging to the debenture-holders, because the plaintiff is unable to pay such difference. In Harrison v. Cornwall Railway Co., 32 W. R. 748, a similar application was refused, but in that case there was no evidence that the plaintiff was unable to pay such costs, and in that case Kay, J., in his judgment, says: "If there were any question as to the solicitors not obtaining their costs I should not hesitate to make the order asked for." I will follow the dictum. But the larger amount of the costs were incurred in the proceedings that have been mentioned, and appear to me to be really part of the receiver's costs of administration and management and can be properly included in his accounts. I will grant a charging order for these costs also on the fund that will be payable to the liquidator, and the receiver will include them in his final account as part of his costs, and they will be dealt with by the master in due course. As the application is really for the benefit of the plaintiff and against the interests of the other debenture-holders, a consent brief on their behalf must be produced to the registrar.

Solicitors, F. H. Honey; Baillie & Co.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Dec. 19.

THOMPSON v. HAMMERSMITH CORPORATION. (a.)

Metropolis management—Streets and highways—Widening street—Power to take part of house—Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.), ss. 80, 82.

A local authority requiring part of a house for the purpose of widening a street under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act may be compelled by the owner to take the whole as a condition of taking the part, if the removal of the part would destroy the house as a house.

Gibbon v. Paddington Vestry, 49 W. R. 8, [1900] 2 Ch. 794, followed.

Action.

By an indenture of lease dated the 15th of May, 1905, there was demised to Alfred Williams Thompson and Alfred Robert Symonds Jackson, the plaintiffs, a messuage or double shop known as No. 98, King-street, Hammersmith, for the term of forty years from the 25th of March, 1905, at the annual rent of £250. The lease contained a covenant by the plaintiffs at their own expense to forthwith proceed to alter the premises in accordance with the plans which had been already submitted to and approved by the lessors, and to execute such alterations within twelve calendar months from the date thereof in a thoroughly workmanlike manner to the reasonable satisfaction of the lessors. The alterations so agreed upon involved altering the premises, which were old and had not sufficient height for the plaintiffs' shop, on the ground floor, and converting the three floors of the front part of the premises into two floors. Before taking the lease they had seen a sketch plan showing that the borough council proposed to take part of the front of their house to a depth varying from 7ft. 2in. to 5ft. 3in. for the purpose of a street improvement.

The plaintiffs went into possession of the premises on the 8th of June, and at once commenced the works which they had covenanted to perform.

On the 20th of June the plaintiffs received a notice, dated the 16th of June, from the borough council of Hammersmith that for the improvement of King-street aforesaid, and under the powers vested in them by the Metropolitan Paving Act, 1817, commonly called Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.), they had resolved to widen the said street and had adjudged that a strip of land of a depth varying from 7ft. 2in. to 5ft. 2in. (being in fact the strip of land of that depth on which the front part of the premises No. 98, King-street stood) obstructed such widening, and that they gave notice to treat accordingly.

On the 26th of June the plaintiffs served on the borough council a counter-notice requiring them to take and purchase the plaintiffs' interest in the whole of the house or shop No. 98, King-street, instead of that part only of such house or shop as was described in the notice to treat.

The borough council did not comply with the counter-notice, but on the 24th of October delivered to the plaintiffs a tender in writing of the sum of £1,100 as and for the plaintiffs' interest in the strip mentioned in the notice to treat.

The plaintiffs then delivered to the borough council particulars of their claim for the interest in the whole of No. 98, King-street, but the borough council refused to comply with their claim.

On the 7th of November the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding under their notice to treat to take such part of the lands and hereditaments of the plaintiffs, No. 98, King-street, as was in the said notice mentioned.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiffs.—Michael Angelo Taylor's Act does not contain any provision corresponding to that contained in section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enabling the owner to require the purchasing body to take the whole when part only is required. Part of a house may be taken under the Act provided that the part so taken does not destroy the identity of the house: Gordon v. St. Mary Abbotts Vestry, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742; Gibbon v. Paddington Vestry, 49 W. R. 8, [1900] 2 Ch. 794. Here the council claims to take the whole front of the house to a depth of from 7ft. 2in. to 5ft. 2in., and this would destroy the house as a house.

Astbury, K.C., Courthope-Munroe, and Langston, for the defendants.—Under their covenant the plaintiffs are bound to partly demolish this house; it may be regarded, therefore, as if in fact it had been partly demolished, and may be treated as "land" and not as a "house": Thomas v. Daw, 15 W. R. 113, 2 Ch. 1, 3 note; Gard v. Commissioners of Sewers, 28 Ch. D. 486, 507. At the time the plaintiffs took their lease they knew that the council intended to take part of the house. The accommodation of the house would not be destroyed, for it can be so altered as to give them equally good accommodation. The correctness of the council's adjudication cannot be questioned, if honestly made: Thomas v. Daw, 15 W. R. 113, 2 Ch., at p. 7; Gard v. Commissioners of Sewers, 28 Ch. D., at p. 494, 33 W. R. Dig. 106; Stroud v. Wandsworth Board of Works, 42 W. R. 355, [1894] 2 Q. B., at p. 5; Metropolitan District Railway Co. v. Fulham Vestry, 44 W. R. 53, [1895] 2 Q. B. 443.

BUCKLEY, J.—The question I have to decide is whether the defendants are entitled to proceed under a notice to treat, dated the 16th of June, 1905, with respect to a house numbered 98, King-street, Hammersmith. It is a notice to treat by which the defendants desire to acquire a strip off the front of the house numbered 98, King-street, varying in depth from 5ft. 2in. at the eastern end to 7ft. 2in. at the western end.

First, as to the law, section 80 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.) does, but section 82 does not, add to the general words "houses, walls, buildings, lands, tenements, and hereditaments," the words "or any part thereof." In Gordon v. St. Mary Abbotts Vestry, however, it was decided in the Divisional Court that the words "or any part thereof" are by implication carried on into the words "such houses, buildings, lands," &c., in section 82, with the result that under that Act compulsory purchase may be made of part without taking the whole; thus differing from a purchase to which section 92 of the Lands Clauses Act applies. As a matter of decision that case ends there. The parties in that case were willing that the motion should be treated as the trial of the action, but the court declined so to deal with it, and as a matter of interlocutory order refused to restrain the vestry from proceeding upon their notice to treat. And this upon the ground that the court could not until the trial of the action determine the question whether that which the vestry proposed to take was or was not a part of the premises within the Act of Parliament. As a matter of dictum, however, the court there did go on to say what would satisfy the words "or any part thereof." They laid down that a house is primâ facie a unit incapable of division; that the vestry could take part of a house only when that part was separable from the house so that it could be removed without destroying the house as a house. I need scarcely say that I should have had no hesitation in following this although it was but dictum. But the matter does not stop there, because in Gibbon v. Paddington Vestry this matter was the subject of decision by Stirling, J. At the trial of the action in that case Stirling, J., held that the owner could compel the vestry to take the whole of the house when the part which they claimed the right to take was not a part separable from the house so that it could be removed without destroying the house as a house.

(a.) Reported by T. PAKENHAM LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As the next point, let me suppose that the house in question is one to which the owner is at the date of the notice to treat making, or proposing to make, or is under covenant to make, alterations. The defendants argue upon some words of Kindersley, V.C., in Thomas v. Daw, 2 Ch., at p. 3, that in such a state of facts the matter is to be treated as if that which the owner was contemplating doing had been done. The Vice-Chancellor's words are these: "At the time of the notice, it was true, No. 50 was not pulled down, but it was intended to be pulled down, and must for the purposes of this motion be considered as a house actually pulled down." The Vice-Chancellor's decision was appealed from, and upon the appeal, as I understand the judgment of Lord Chelmsford, he did not agree with that sentence; he refers to it at p. 6 of the report, and after saying that he is not disposed to agree exactly with the reasons which appear to have governed the Vice-Chancellor's decision, he goes on to affirm his decision, not upon the grounds which the Vice-Chancellor had assigned, but upon the ground, as appears at p. 8, that the commissioners had not satisfied the essential preliminary as to No. 50, in that their adjudication, which is to be found at p. 5, was not that the site of No. 50 was necessary, but only that part of the site of No. 50 was necessary for the purposes of the Act.

Apart from that case, and regarding the matter upon principle, it seems to me that the rights of the defendants must be determined, not upon that which the owner had in contemplation when the notice to treat was served, but upon the rights which the owner had as owner of a house which at the date of the notice to treat was of a particular kind, and which the owner might or might not as he was minded alter as he pleased. By the word "owner" here I mean all the owners at the time in question—that is to say, for the purposes of the present case, not the lessee only but the lessor also. The defendants' rights are not, in my opinion, enlarged by reason of any intended voluntary alterations which the plaintiffs were to make or were under covenant to make. At most the consideration could be relevant only if the alterations in question would if carried into effect result in a new house of which the part which the defendants desired to take was not an essential part. The fact that the plaintiffs are making or are under covenant to make certain alterations does not authorize the defendants to say: "You must make further alterations, which will cost you no more, and will answer your purpose just as well, and which when made will render the part which we want no longer an essential part of the house." The plaintiffs are entitled to say that the matter is to be dealt with regarding the house as it in fact is at the date of the notice to treat, or at the most as it will be when altered in the way in which they are going to alter it.

This being the law which, in my opinion, I have to apply, the relevant facts are as follows: The plaintiffs on the 15th of May, 1905, took a lease of the house No. 98, King-street; they had then seen a racing and knew that such a widening as is here in question was in contemplation as regards their house. Their lessors, however, could and did give them a leasehold interest in such a house as was then there on the site. The defendants' rights are no larger by reason of the fact that the plaintiffs took a lease of a house as against which the defendants had such rights as Michael Angelo Taylor's Act gave them, and of which the defendants were asserting, if that were the fact, that they had a right to take this strip. The question is, what rights does the Act give them? Have they or have they not a right to take the strip? Those rights I have discussed above. The question then is whether the part which the defendants propose to take is separable from the house so that it can be removed without destroying the house as a house. Now upon that, the first point upon which I comment is this: The building, as it stood on the 16th of June, 1905, was provided with and warmed by fireplaces set in a large chimney-stack, which was very ancient, I should think, by the position in which it stands, and which was midway between the two small houses which made up the larger house as the plaintiffs intend to occupy it. By taking the strip in question the defendants would have destroyed the whole of the chimney stack and destroyed all the fireplaces that warmed the rooms in the different parts at any rate of this house. Of course it is obvious that that is taking such a part of the house as not to leave it such a house as it was before; it could not be enjoyed as a house. But it is said, and said truly, that the plaintiffs were going to destroy the chimney-stack themselves in the alterations they were going to make. But, mark, they were going to destroy the chimney-stack for the purpose of enjoying the space that would be left bare by its removal and make one large shop. The defendants cannot, I think, say that for the purpose of determining their rights I must treat it as a thing destroyed, whatever view may be taken of Thomas v. Daw, when they propose to remove it, not for the purpose for which the plaintiffs intend to remove it—namely, to leave a large shop in the space formerly occupied by the chimney-stack, but for another purpose altogether—namely, of throwing that space into the street.

Of course this point is enough to dispose of the whole case, if I am right in saying that the fact that the plaintiffs were themselves going to remove it is immaterial; of course the removal of this by the defendants—if it was to be their removal—would destroy all the chimneys and fireplaces.

Secondly, it is necessary here to describe quite shortly something as regards the premises. These were old premises consisting of three floors—a ground floor, first floor, and some attics. The wall, which is called the back front of the house (I should call it the back wall of the house, but the surveyors call it the back front) was, at the level of the ceiling of the ground floor, carried upon girders so that the ground floor ran beyond it. The first floor and the attics did not run beyond it. The alterations which the plaintiffs proposed would have converted the three floors into two; would have raised the ceiling to the ground floor to some extent and thrown the remains of the house into a first floor room, and that would have been a room extending from the front wall of the house in King-street to this back front at the back. If the defendants take this strip they will destroy what at present are the first and second floors, and as altered will be the first floor room of the house, altogether. Mr. Chatfield Clarke, who was called for the defendants, was compelled to say that certainly those rooms as rooms would be nothing like as good as before. The best he could say was that they would be fair usable rooms. The depth of the room from back to front would be so affected by taking this strip as that the room would become practically useless, not the same as before at all. However, the defendants say, "You can build a new back front seven feet further back, and the front wall will be seven feet further back, and then you will have the same space as you had before." To my mind that is no answer at all. I do not think the defendants are entitled to say, "We will take a part of your house and then we will show you how to build a new house, for that is substantially what this is, which will be just as good as the old one."

Thirdly, consider what will be the effect as regards the ground floor. As I have said, the back front wall there does not extend down to the ground floor, so that you get additional space there, and the plot is of such a considerable depth from north to south that you may make as good a shop perhaps on the ground floor to some extent. But it destroys the ground floor front shop in this sense, that the front part, the large extra space which would be gained by this intended removal of the chimney-stack, will be absorbed into the street and the shop itself will be thrown further back

Now that is a matter which, as regards the particular business which the plaintiffs desire to carry on, is one of moment. The principal part of the shop, the ground floor premises, is to be used for the purpose of a show case where they want to put up tailor's dummies and show their goods and so on in front. The ground floor shop, it seems to me, would be largely affected.

Fourthly, the strip, if acquired, will throw the front of No. 98 back to the extent I have said of 5ft. 2in. at one end to 7ft. 2in. at the other, and unless No. 96 on one side and No. 100 on the other are thrown back to a like extent nobody disputes that the value of the plaintiffs' premises No. 98 as a shop will be largely affected. They will be left in a sort of well set back from the main frontage of the street. The defendants say that they are going to set back Nos. 96 and 100 also. I daresay they intend to do so, but the position of affairs is this. As regards No 96 they finally sanctioned the purchase of what they want there on the day when this cause was in the paper for trial and settled it on the evening before. As regards No. 100, they have not up to the present moment even given a notice to treat.

For all these reasons I arrive at the conclusion that the strip which the defendants propose to take is such as that the part is not separable from the house, so that it could be removed without destroying the house as a house. I think that the case is governed by Gordon v. St. Mary Abbotts Vestry, and the decision of Stirling, J., in Gibbon v. Paddington Vestry. It seems to me, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the injunction they ask. In granting the injunction I do not in any way say what the defendants may be entitled to substitute for it. I only say that this notice to treat is one they cannot carry into effect. I therefore grant the injunction as asked by the indorsement of the writ, inserting the word "house" before the words "lands and hereditaments," as suggested by counsel.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors, Guscotte, Wadham, & Co.; Watson, Sons, & Room.

Chan. Div. }
Joyce, J. } Dec. 20.

MCMILLAN v. LE ROI MINING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — General meeting — Poll—Proxy — Voting papers—Powers of chairman—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 51.

By the articles of association of a company it was provided that votes might be given "either personally or by proxy," and that on a poll being demanded it should be taken "in such manner and at such time and place as the chairman of the meeting directs." At a general meeting of the company, on a poll being demanded, the chairman of the meeting directed that it should be taken by means of voting papers sent to each member, which should be signed by the member voting and returned to the company's offices by a certain date.

Held, that the use of such voting papers was irregular and invalid, and an injunction was granted restraining the company from acting upon the result of any poll so taken.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders in the defendant company, other than the defendant directors, for an injunction to restrain the company and the directors from acting on a resolution purported to be passed at a general meeting of the company.

The facts were shortly as follows:

At a general meeting held on the 8th of December, 1905, certain resolutions were submitted dealing with a scheme of amalgamation. These resolutions being put, and there being a show of hands, a poll was demanded by the chairman. The chairman thereupon directed that the poll should be by polling papers signed by the members, the place should be the offices of the company, and the time should be any time before noon on the 22nd of December, 1905.

Polling papers were sent to all shareholders, having the resolutions printed thereon, together with instructions that the shareholder should mark "for" or "against" opposite each resolution, and return the paper, duly signed, to the offices of the company within the specified time.

It was provided by article 94 of the company's articles of association that votes might be "given either personally or by proxy"; and by article 87 that, on a poll being demanded, it should be taken "in such manner and at such time and place as the chairman of the meeting directs."

Younger, K.C., and Kirby, for the plaintiff.—It is clear from the articles, apart from authority, that there can be no voting at a poll unless the member is present or unless another member duly constituted his proxy is present and votes on his behalf. If this were otherwise section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, would be evaded. If the articles or statutory authority are not clear on this point, a shareholder can have no right that he would not have at common law. Voting by a voting paper is not an enlargement of the meeting, like a poll, nor is it an incident at common law: Reg. v. Wimbledon Local Board, 30 W. R. 400, 8 Q. B. D. 459; In re Horbury Bridge Coal Co., 27 W. R. 433, 11 Ch. D. 109.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the defendant company.—The defendants, by the employment of voting papers, were merely using their best endeavours to get the true opinion of the shareholders. By article 87 the poll may be taken in any way not contrary to natural justice or to the express provisions of the articles or the Companies Acts. Two modes of voting may co-exist: Reg. v. Wimbledon Local Board.

(a.) Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

JOYCE, J., in giving judgment said: I do not feel the slightest doubt that primâ facie a voter must attend and give his vote personally unless there is any statutory or other provision entitling him to vote in a different manner. In this case it is clear that by the articles of association he must vote personally or by proxy—that is, through another member who must be present and vote on his behalf. The voting papers which have been issued are not authorized by the articles of association. It is true that the chairman may give directions as to the manner of voting, but, in my opinion, that does not entitle him to enlarge the power of voting or alter the rules as to the personal attendance of members. What is proposed to be done in this case is contrary to the articles of association of the company and is irregular and invalid. In my opinion the proposed mode of taking the poll by means of voting papers is unauthorized and invalid and the defendants must be restrained from acting on the result of any poll so taken.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant company, Burn & Berridge.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Jan. 13.

STAINLAND AND HOLYWELL GREEN INDUSTRIAL CORN AND PROVISION SOCIETY v. STAINLAND WITH OLD LINDLEY URBAN COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Public health—Cleansing of cesspools—Construction—"And" whether conjunctive or distributive—Bye-laws—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 42 and 44.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 42, enacts: "Every local authority may, and when required by order of the Local Government Board shall, themselves undertake or contract for . . . the cleansing of earth-closets, privies, ashpits, and cesspools."

Held, that the word "and" is to be read distributively, and that the local authority therefore have power to undertake the cleansing of earth-closets, privies, and ashpits without undertaking the cleansing of cesspools.

Case stated by justices of the West Morley Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire.

A complaint was preferred by the respondent council against the appellants for having on the 2nd of March, 1905, failed to cleanse a cesspool on their premises at least once in every three months, contrary to a bye-law of the respondent council made on the 23rd of June, 1890.

The appellants were the owners and occupiers of certain premises erected prior to 1890, and consisting of a shop and a slaughter-house and stables at the rear, on which there was a cesspool used in connection with the premises. The cesspool received the drainage from the slaughter-house and stables and from the shop also, and at the date of the information it was so full and in such a state that it required emptying and cleansing. Notice was given by the respondents to the appellants requiring them to cleanse the cesspool, but the appellants neglected or refused to do so, alleging that it was the duty of the respondents themselves to empty and cleanse it.

On the 23rd of June, 1890, bye-laws were made by the predecessors of the respondents under section 44 of the Public Health Act, 1875, with respect to the periodical cleansing of earth-closets, privies, ashpits, and cesspools. The bye-laws provided, inter alia, that "the occupier of any premises shall, once at least in three months, cleanse every cesspool belonging to such premises." It was admitted that at the time these bye-laws were made the local authority had not themselves undertaken or contracted for the cleansing of earth-closets, privies, ashpits, or cesspools.

On the 6th of September, 1894, the respondents, pursuant to section 42 of the Public Health Act, 1875, passed a resolution "that the scavenging of privies, closets, and ashpits be undertaken by the board at once," and another resolution "that tenders be obtained for emptying and cleansing privies, closets, and ashpits . . . and that any earth-closets be emptied and cleansed monthly and privies and ashpits every three months."

These resolutions were duly confirmed, and it was admitted that thereafter the respondents carried out the work of scavenging privies, closets, and ashpits within their district, but that they had not at any time cleansed or emptied cesspools.

It was admitted that the appellants had from time to time, at their own expense, both before and after the making of the bye-laws, emptied and cleansed the cesspool down to the time when the question as to whose duty it was to carry out such cleansing and emptying of cesspools was raised by them.

It was admitted that the respondents from the passing of the resolutions of the 6th of September, 1894, provided in their estimates of expenditure for each year a sum for the scavenging of their district; and it was admitted that the appellants as ratepayers had duly paid their quota towards the general district rate.

For the appellants it was contended that the respondents, having undertaken to act under section 42, were bound to cleanse and empty cesspools in their district, and that the whole of the bye-laws made in June, 1890, were abrogated by the resolution of the 6th of September, 1894.

For the respondents it was contended that it was competent in their predecessors to resolve, as they had done, to undertake only part of the duty of scavenging and cleansing referred to in the second paragraph of section 42, and that the bye-law as to the cleansing of cesspools remained in full force and effect. The justices by a majority decided that the respondents' contention was correct in law, and that it was the duty of the appellants to cleanse and empty the cesspool; they therefore convicted the appellants, but stated this case for opinion of the court as to whether they were right in so doing

R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellants.—The respondents had no power to pass a resolution as to part of the things mentioned in the section. The word "and" must be read conjunctively, as the section casts a duty upon the local authority. The local authority cannot themselves say that their own resolution was bad, and the resolution must therefore be taken as covering the whole of the objects mentioned in the section.

Daldy, for the respondents.—The resolution is either bad or good. It is bad if the word "and" should be read conjunctively, in which case the bye-laws remain and the conviction must stand. But the resolution was a good and valid one. It is an enabling statute. It is impossible to think the Legislature has not empowered the Local Government Board to order the local authority to undertake only some of the objects.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think the substantial question is whether the words in question in sections 42 and 44 of the Public Health Act, 1875, are to be read distributively or not. The point as to the validity of the resolution, if it had been taken before the justices, would, I think, have been a difficulty in the appellants' way; but it is better to deal with the matter upon the merits. In 1890 bye-laws were made dealing with the cleansing of earth-closets, privies, ashpits, and cesspools, and it is not suggested that these bye-laws were invalid. In 1894 the respondents themselves undertook the duty of scavenging earth-closets, privies, and ashpits, and it is argued for the appellants that the legal consequence of that resolution was that the respondents were also obliged to undertake the duty of cleansing cesspools. I have come to the conclusion that we ought not to construe section 44 as making it imperative upon the local authority to make bye-laws dealing with the whole group of things named therein. It is not disputed that if we take that view, the same construction should be placed upon the words in section 42; and as to that section I think it would be a strong thing to decide that the Local Government Board must order the local authority to undertake the cleansing of all these things if they have undertaken the cleansing of any. It would be difficult to contend that the powers of the Local Government Board were to be limited in that way. Section 44 supports the view contended for on behalf of the local authority, particularly those words in it empowering authorities to make bye-laws for the prevention of nuisances arising from snow, filth, dust, ashes, and rubbish. It is perfectly obvious that it may be necessary to have a bye-law as to filth or rubbish, whereas in many places there may be no necessity for a bye-law as to snow or dust. If we could see that the same burden would be imposed upon the local authority in respect of everything in the class named in section 42, it might be right that all these things should be grouped together; but I can conceive that there may be places where it is desirable to distinguish between them. This case affords an instance of that, for the appellant's cesspool receives the drainage from a slaughter-house as well as from stables and a shop. On the whole, the balance of my opinion is in favour of holding that under section 42 the Local Government Board have an option as to ordering, and the local authority have an option as to undertaking all or some only of the duties mentioned in the section, and that the local authority under section 44 can make bye-laws as to some of these things and are not bound to make them as regards all.

RIDLEY, J., concurred.

DARLING, J.—I have felt considerable doubt about this matter. It is possible to read section 42 either conjunctively or distributively. That being so, and not being clear in which way it ought to be read, what influences me in coming to a conclusion in favour of the local authority is this: I can quite imagine the Legislature limiting the discretion of a local authority and saying to them, "If you undertake these duties you must undertake them all"; but section 42 applies equally to the Local Government Board, and I find a difficulty in thinking that the Legislature meant to limit the board in that way—in supposing that the board should not be able to interfere unless it ordered the local authority to undertake the cleansing of all the things mentioned in the section. There is a very wide distinction between this cesspool which is apparently used for trade purposes, and the other things mentioned in the section.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, Helliwell, Harby, & Evershed, for Jubb, Booth, & Helliwell, Halifax.

Solicitors for respondents, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for Longbotham & Sons, Halifax.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Darling, JJ.) } July 31; Aug. 3, 4, 1905.

REX v. BRAILSFORD. (a.)

Criminal law—Conspiracy—Indictment—Acts tending to public mischief—Obtaining a passport by false pretences.

Two defendants were found guilty on an indictment which alleged that they unlawfully conspired together to obtain a passport in the name of one defendant for the use of another defendant, to the injury and prejudice of the lawful, free, and customary intercourse existing between inhabitants of this country and of Russia, to the public mischief of the subjects and the endangerment of the continuance of peaceful relations existing between the King and the Czar and their subjects. On a motion in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the obtaining of a passport by false representation was not a criminal act,

Held, that the indictment was good.

At the trial the judge directed the jury that if they found that the defendants did conspire together to obtain a passport by false representation, and that they knew it was to be used by someone else, that those acts constituted a criminal offence.

Held, that the direction was right.

Motion for arrest of judgment.

The defendants H. N. Brailsford and A. H. M. McCulloch were convicted by a jury on an indictment which charged them with conspiring to obtain from the Foreign Office by means of false representations a passport made out in the name of McCulloch for his use in Russia, and with conspiring to send, and sending, the said passport to some unknown person in Russia to be used there by such unknown person "to the public mischief of the King's subjects, and to the endangerment of peaceful relations between the King and the Czar of Russia and their subjects respectively."

A summary of the material allegations in the indictment will be found set out in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

The indictment contained a second count alleging that the defendants had obtained a passport by similar false pretences, but not alleging a conspiracy.

At the trial before Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and a special jury in the King's Bench Division, the jury found both defendants guilty on the first count of the indictment and the jury were discharged without giving any verdict on the second count. On this verdict judgment was entered for the Crown, but a stay was granted in order that a motion in arrest of judgment might be made to the Divisional Court on the ground that the facts alleged in the first count of the indictment did not amount to a criminal conspiracy.

Sir Robert Reid, K.C. (J. A. Simon with him), for the defendants.—No offence known to the law is disclosed in the indictment. The facts disclose no known offence. There is no authority which says that any combination which causes public mischief or endangers public safety is indictable. The court is being asked to create a new offence unknown to the common law.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He referred to Reg. v. Jameson, [1896] 2 Q. B. 325, and Stephen's History of the Criminal Law, vol. 3, p. 358.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and Sir E. Carson, S.G. (H. Sutton. C. W. Mathews, and Bodkin with them).—It is a well-known principle of the common law that acts involving public mischief are indictable. Here is a wrongful act, the attaining of a passport by misrepresentation, the natural consequence of which would be a public mischief. The indictment would have been good against an individual, but at all events it contains all the elements of a criminal conspiracy.

The following cases were cited: Neeve's case, 2 East P. C. 281; Young v. Rex, 3 T. R. 92; Rex v. Dixon, 3 M. & S. 11; Reg. v. Higgins, (1885) 2 East 5; R. v. Wheatley, 2 Burr. 1125; Rex v. Vaughan, 4 Burr. 2494; Rex v. Berenger, 3 M. & S. 617; Mulcahy v. Reg., L. R. 3 H. L. 303, 17 W. R. Dig. 4; Reg. v. Warburton, 19 W. R. 165, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 274; Quinn v. Leathem, 50 W. R. 139, [1901] A. C. 495; Reg. v. Aspinall, [1896] 2 Q. B. D. 48; and Reg. v. Parnell, 14 Cox C. C. 505.

Sir Robert Reid, K.C., replied.

Aug. 1.—Motion in the same case for a rule nisi to set aside the verdict and judgment for the Crown on the grounds of misdirection and misrepresentation of evidence, and on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence in support of the indictment. The evidence given on behalf of the Crown went to prove the following facts: That the defendants combined and conspired together to obtain, and they did in fact obtain, from the Foreign Office by false and fraudulent representations a passport in the name of the defendant McCulloch for his use in Russia with the intent that it should be used by some other person, and that in fact, that it was so used with their knowledge and consent. It appeared that the passport, some months after it had been issued, was found on the body of a man who had been killed by the explosion of a bomb in his room at an hotel in St. Petersburg. In the course of his summing up to the jury the Lord Chief Justice directed them that if as a matter of fact they found that the defendants agreed between themselves, or one agreed with the other or some other person, to commit this act, then the offence in the indictment would be proved. They had to take the law from him, and he directed them that if they were satisfied that these defendants did conspire to do that which had been described to them by the Attorney-General to obtain this passport, that that was a criminal offence. During the course of the trial the Crown tendered in evidence a statement made in writing by the defendant McCulloch and given to an inspector of the Metropolitan Police who was making inquiries about the matter. The defendants' counsel objected to the admission of this evidence that McCulloch had been induced to make the statement by reason of the inspector telling him that there would be no prosecution. The Lord Chief Justice admitted the statement in evidence.

Sir Robert Reid, K.C. (J. A. Simon with him), in support of the motion.—The question of whether there was an intention to cause a public mischief should have been left to the jury. No evidence as to whether the acts did in fact cause a public mischief was given. The Lord Chief Justice was wrong in directing the jury that if they found the defendants did conspire to obtain a passport for a third person then a criminal offence had been committed. The statement of the defendant McCulloch was wrongly admitted in evidence.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment of the court: This is a motion in arrest of judgment upon an indictment against Henry Noel Brailsford and Arthur Henry Muir McCulloch, against whom a jury found a verdict of guilty on the first count of an indictment in respect of a conspiracy to obtain a passport from the Foreign Office in the name of McCulloch to be used by another person. It is not necessary to repeat at length the allegations in the indictment; its scheme may be summarized as follows: It sets out the practice with regard to passports and the conditions upon which they are issued; it alleges a conspiracy between the defendants and other persons not known to obtain by false and fraudulent pretences and misrepresentations a passport in the name of Arthur Henry Muir McCulloch; it alleges the sending in of the necessary documents by Brailsford and McCulloch in the name of McCulloch, and the issuing of the passport thereon. It then alleges the use of the passport by other persons not known and concludes with the following averment: "And the said other persons whose names are unknown, in further pursuance of the said conspiracy, combination, confederacy, and agreement, did send and cause and procure to be sent the said passport lastly hereinbefore set forth, having then thereon the visé and signature of the said Russian Consul-General, out of the United Kingdom to a certain person or persons unknown for use when in Russia by a certain person whose name is unknown other than the said Arthur Henry Muir McCulloch, with the intent and purpose that the said passport should be so used in the dominions of the Czar of Russia by the said person whose name is unknown as aforesaid to the evil example of all others in the like case offending in contempt of our said Lord the King and his laws in fraud of the said regulations issued by and with the authority of the said Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to the injury and prejudice and disturbance of the lawful, free, and customary intercourse existing between the liege subjects of our said Lord the King and the subjects of the said Czar of Russia, to the public mischief of the said liege subjects and to the endangerment of the continuance of the peaceful relations between our said Lord the King and the said Czar of Russia and their subjects respectively, and against the peace of our said Lord the King, his Crown and dignity."

The indictment contained a second count alleging as an offence the obtaining of a passport by similar false pretences, but without any allegation of conspiracy. The jury, as already stated, found both defendants guilty on the first count and said that they had not considered the second count, and I discharged them without their finding a verdict thereon. It was argued in arrest of judgment by Sir Robert Reid, on behalf of the defendants, that the count of the indictment upon which the defendants were found guilty was bad in law, as disclosing no indictable offence, and also on the ground that the act done—namely, the obtaining of a passport by a false representation—although an improper act, was not a criminal act or an indictable misdemeanour at common law and that the conspiracy to obtain such passport was not an indictable misdemeanour. We are clearly of opinion that the count is good and that the conviction must stand; but in deference to the arguments of Sir Robert Reid, and as the point has never arisen directly before, we think it right to state the reasons for our decision. It is not necessary for us to decide whether apart from conspiracy the obtaining of a passport by false pretences—namely, by alleging that it was required for the use and protection of A. B., whereas it is in fact intended to be used by some third person, not known or recommended to the Foreign Office—is of itself a misdemeanour; but as the question has some bearing upon the validity of the conviction on the first count we desire to make a few observations thereon. It will be well to consider what a passport really is. It is a document issued in the name of the Sovereign, on the responsibility of a Minister of the Crown to a named individual, intended to be presented to the Governments of foreign nations, and to be used for that individual's protection as a British subject in foreign countries, and it depends for its validity upon the fact that the Foreign Office, in an official document, vouches the respectability of the person named. Passports have been known and recognized as official documents for more than three centuries, and in the event of war breaking out become documents which may be necessary for the protection of the bearer, if the subject of a neutral state, as against the officials of the belligerents, and in the times of peace in some countries, as in Russia, they are required to be carried by all travellers. It is not necessary to do more than to remember certain incidents in the nineteenth century to see what grave international questions might arise in the event of a person who holds a passport receiving ill-treatment in a foreign country. It cannot, of course, be maintained that every fraud and cheat constitutes an offence against the criminal law but the distinction between acts which are merely improper and criminal and those which tend to produce a public mischief has long been recognized. The cases cited by the Attorney-General—Rex v. Higgins, Rex v. Wheatley, and Young v. Rex—are authorities for this view. They are supported by the reasoning in the judgment in Rex v. Berenger, Rex v. Dixon, and Neeve's case, and a reference to the original record of the decisions of the judges which is in the possession of the Lord Chief Justice shows that Neeve's case did not depend upon the ground given at p. 822 of 2 East P. C. The whole chapter under the title of Cheats in that work is worthy of perusal. It is, however, unnecessary to consider this point further because we are clearly of opinion that the act done—namely, the obtaining of a passport by a false pretence is an act of the kind which would render a conspiracy to carry it into effect, unlawful and we think that both defendants have been rightly convicted of criminal conspiracy. Whatever attempts have been made from time to time to strain the law of conspiracy or to bring within its purview combination to which no objection could be taken when done by a single individual, no question of that kind arises in this case. For a great many years it has been the law of England that conspiracy consists "in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. So long as such a design rests in intention only it is indictable. When two agree to carry it into effect the very plot is an act in itself, and the act of each of the parties . . . punishable, if for a criminal object, or for the use of criminal means": Mulcahy v. Rex. This definition was expressly approved by the House of Lords in Quinn v. Leathem. It cannot seriously be disputed that the obtaining of a passport from the Foreign Office by the false statement that it was required for a person named therein, and recommended to the Foreign Office, with the intent that it should be used by another and different person who has not been recommended, is a cheat and conspiracy to deceive the Foreign Office, and obtaining the document by means thereof is a criminal conspiracy. We are therefore clearly of opinion that the first count of the indictment upon which the defendants were found guilty is good and the conviction stands. In addition to the objection taken on motion in arrest of judgment a motion was made by Sir Robert Reid in arrest of judgment on Tuesday last, for a new trial upon the ground that there was no sufficient evidence in support of the indictment, and that the jury had been misdirected in that it had not been left to them to find that the act done might tend to public mischief. Without saying that there cannot be acts upon which an innocent construction might be put or that in some cases it might not be for the jury to find as a fact whether the party was innocent or not, we are clearly of opinion that no such argument can possibly be urged in this case. In criminal as well as in civil cases persons are responsible for the natural consequences of their acts. It was not disputed that there was abundant evidence that the defendants did combine to obtain a passport in the name of McCulloch with the intent that it should be used in Russia by some other individual, and that in fact it was so used with their knowledge and consent. We are of opinion that it is for the court to direct a jury as to whether such an act may tend to the public mischief, and that it is not in such a case an issue of fact upon which evidence can be given. Assuming the matter to relate to the issue of a public document by a public department of State, and it is obtained by a false representation for an improper purpose—i.e., for use by a different person passing himself as the bonâ fide holder—we are of opinion that it is injurious to the public and tends to bring about a public mischief. It is scarcely necessary to cite authority, but we would call attention to the reasoning of Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Vaughan. A further point was raised, as to the misreception of evidence. We are clearly of opinion that the evidence of McCulloch was admissible, there being no evidence that the statement was otherwise than voluntary, and nothing to bring the case within the rule laid down in Reg. v. Thompson, on which ground the Lord Chief Justice had excluded a letter written by Brailsford to the other defendant. For these reasons the conviction must stand.

Conviction upheld.

Solicitor for the prosecutors, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for the defendants, Radford & Frankland.

Privy Council.

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.)

Nov. 7.

HAWTHORN CITY (MAYOR) v. KANNULUIK. (a.)

Negligence—Construction of drain—Overflow on neighbouring land—Trespass—Municipal authorities' liability—Statutory powers.

In 1889 the appellant corporation, under their statutory powers, took over the care and management of a water-course and made it into a public drain. Later on there was an overflow over the respondent's land, which adjoins the drain, and this was occasioned by the then insufficiency of the drainage, though the works were large enough for the purpose in 1889.

Held, that the corporation had acted negligently, and were liable in damages for the injury caused to respondent's land owing to the overflow.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

The action was for trespass owing to the overflow of a main and other drains over respondent's land.

The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Danckwerts, K.C., and M. L. Romer, for the appellants.

Hugo Young, K.C., and W. O. Hodges, for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, JAMES OF HEREFORD, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The conduit in the city of Hawthorn, which is now known as the "main drain" and for the most part is an open sewer, was formerly a natural watercourse receiving and carrying off nothing but the surplus storm-water of a hilly district about five hundred acres in extent. This district or drainage area, as it may be termed, has been divided between the municipalities of Hawthorn, Kew, and Boroondara. Hawthorn has about half The rest is comprised within the limits of the other two municipalities in nearly equal proportions. Kew on the north and Boroondara on the north-east and east are at rather a higher level and naturally drain through Hawthorn.

In 1888 the plaintiff Jaan Kannuluik purchased a plot of ground abutting on the watercourse at its lowest point in Hawthorn, just where it turns to the south with a sharp bend after passing under Auburn-road. From a contour plan of the drainage area it appears that the fall to this point is not less than 140 feet.

In 1889 the municipal authorities of Hawthorn under their statutory powers took over the care and management of this watercourse and made it into a public drain. They spent a good deal of money upon it in the way of improvement at intervals down to to the year 1896. The work was done in sections. The section adjoining Kannuluik's property was pitched and finished in 1889. A number of subsidiary channels have since been made by the municipal authorities of Hawthorn, or with their permission, for the purpose of running off the storm-water and sewage into the main drain. The result is that the water and sewage from the upper parts of Hawthorn and from the parts of Kew and Boroondara which drain through Hawthorn are concentrated and poured into the main drain with great violence. When there is heavy rain the flush of water is so great and so sudden that the channel becomes choked. There is an overflow, and when the flood subsides, the low-lying lands, and Mr. Kannuluik's premises in particular, the ground-floor of his dwelling-house and the surface of his garden, are covered with an offensive mixture of sewage and slime.

After several ineffectual complaints, Mr. Kannuluik brought this action against against the municipality of Hawthorn. The case was tried by Williams, J., without a jury. It occupied no less than seven days. The learned judge found in favour of the plaintiff and assessed the damages at £250.

On appeal the full court affirmed the judgment of Williams, J., but not altogether on the same grounds. The learned judge who tried the case relied principally, though not entirely, on faulty construction in 1889. In the full court, where the leading judgment was given by Holroyd, J., the decision turned rather on the subsequent acts and conduct of the municipal authorities.

Their lordships agree with Holroyd, J. The case seems to be a very simple one. The only question is, Have the municipal authorities acted negligently so as to do unnecessary damage to Mr. Kannuluik?

As for negligence, it is difficult to imagine a more conspicuous example of negligence than is shown by repeatedly pouring offensive stuff into a receptacle or channel proved over and over again to be insufficient to hold it and pass it on. The municipal authorities might just as well pour this stuff directly on the plaintiff's land. The damage to the plaintiff cannot be denied. It is nothing to the purpose, even if it be true, to say that the property in the plaintiff's hands and in the hands of his predecessors in title was often flooded before the municipal authorities turned the watercourse into a public drain. Nor is it enough to prove that the work done in 1889 was sufficient at the time. It is insufficient now. It has been insufficient for some time past. The mischief grows as building increases, as new roads are made, new channels formed, and more and more of the surface becomes impervious to rainfall. It is not suggested that there is any real difficulty in remedying the mischief. Indeed, if the evidence of the surveyors called on behalf of the plaintiff may be trusted, the matter can be set right at a very trifling cost.

Their lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

The appellants will pay the costs of the appeal.

Solicitors, Roy & Cartwright; Lee, Ockerby, & Everington.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Jan. 16.

In re NESBITT AND POTTS' CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Title—Possessory title—Restrictive covenant—Notice—Purchaser for value—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 34.

A restrictive covenant is in the nature of an equitable easement over land, and is binding on the land into whoever's hands it comes, except in the case of a purchaser for value without notice. A trespasser, therefore, who acquires a title to land by virtue of the Statute of Limitations is bound by any restrictive covenant affecting such land, both before and after the expiration of the statutory period, and a purchaser from him is affected with constructive notice of the covenant if he accepts less than a forty years' title, being content to make no inquiry as to title before the date when his vendor's possession began.

Judgment of Farwell, J. (53 W. R. 297, [1905] 1 Ch. 391), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported 53 W. R. 297, [1905] 1 Ch. 391).

By a contract in writing dated the 1st of January, 1903, F. V. Nesbitt agreed to sell to S. L. Potts a piece of land at Leytonstone for £3,200.

The contract provided that the title should begin with a conveyance dated the 11th of August, 1890, and that the purchaser should be deemed to have full notice of its contents.

An abstract was delivered on the 10th of February, 1904. It commenced with the conveyance referred to in the contract, which was a conveyance from

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thos. Headde to S. C. Davis, I. Davis, and L. Levy as joint tenants in fee simple. The recitals showed that the property had formerly been in the possession of Wm. T. T. Kidd, and that Thos. Headde had acquired a statutory title by the possession of the property by himself and his father for thirteen years after Kidd's death.

The only other abstracted deeds were a conveyance by S. C. Davis of his share in the property to L. Levy and the conveyance to the vendor, which was dated the 29th of November, 1901, and made by I. Davis and L. Levy.

On the occasion of his purchase the present vendor had produced to him a statutory declaration of the possession of Thos. Headde and his father for thirteen years before the 11th of August, 1890, and their successors in title since that date without interruption or any acknowledgment of the title of any person claiming under Kidd.

The abstract did not show the existence of any restrictive covenants affecting the user of the land but the purchaser ascertained aliunde that the property was subject to restrictive covenants contained in an indenture of the 9th of November, 1867. He accordingly made a requisition to the effect that he must be satisfied that these restrictions did not exist or he would be compelled to rescind the contract. The vendor answered this requisition: "The vendor purchased without notice, and, having regard to this and the fact that the title is one by adverse possession, these covenants do not now bind the land." In the interval between the delivery of the requisitions and that of the answers the purchaser received a letter from a solicitor on behalf of other freeholders on the estate threatening proceedings for an injunction to restrain any breach of the covenants. He then ascertained that covenants similar to those contained in the deed of 1867 had been entered into by Kidd in the conveyance to him in 1872.

The present vendor on his purchase had accepted a title commencing in 1878. He had no actual notice of the covenants, but would have obtained notice if he had insisted on a forty years' title.

The purchaser took out a summons asking for a declaration that the purchaser's objections to the title had not been sufficiently answered, or, alternatively, that the title shown was not one which the purchaser ought to be compelled to accept, and for a return of the deposit.

Farwell, J., held that the vendor had not shown a title.

The vendor appealed.

Jenkins, K.C., and Macklin, for the vendor, the appellant.—Farwell, J., held that these covenants ran with the land in accordance with the doctrine in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774, and that we are bound by them. Our title is not derived, however, from any person who derived title under the covenantor, but from Headde, who had obtained a statutory title by possession. So far in every case of this kind the title has been derived from the covenantor. In this case the Statute of Limitations creates a parliamentary title and the person possessing the parliamentary title ceases to be bound by the covenant, at any rate as soon as the estate of the covenantor fails. The dictum of Jessel, M.R., in London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 652, is doubtless against that view, but we submit that this dictum is inconsistent with the later cases of Hall v. Ewin, 36 W. R. 84, 37 Ch. D. 74, and Clegg v. Hands, 38 W. R. 433, 44 Ch. D. 503. In any case the vendor derived title through a purchaser for value without notice. This is merely an equitable right derived from a contract. The vendor obtained the legal estate, and this is a protection against equitable interests: Bailey v. Barnes, 42 W. R. 66, [1894] 1 Ch. 25. A person claiming the legal estate by actual disseisin, without collusion with the trustee, will not be bound by the trust: Gilbert on Uses, p. 429. There can be no distinction between equities arising on trusts and equities arising on contracts.

Upjohn, K.C., and Jessel, for the respondent.—A restrictive covenant is in the nature of an equitable easement: London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm. This view was followed in both Rogers v. Hosegood, 48 W. R. 659, [1900] 2 Ch. 405, and Formby v. Barker, 51 W. R. 646, [1903] 2 Ch. 539. A trespasser cannot get rid of an easement by acquiring a title under the Statute of Limitations, and the restrictive covenant being in the nature of an easement is equally binding. Then as to the question of notice, a purchaser is bound to make reasonable inquiries: Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 3. He has not discharged this duty unless he requires the usual title—that is to say, forty years: In re Cox and Neve, 39 W. R. 412, [1891] 2 Ch. 109. The fact that he was purchasing a possessory title did not bind the purchaser to accept less than a forty years' title: Jacobs v. Revell, 49 W. R. 109, [1900] 2 Ch. 859. If, therefore, he chose to accept less than the full title, he is affected with notice of all he would have learnt if he had made proper investigations.

Macklin replied.

The following cases were also referred to in the course of the argument: Keates v. Lyon, 17 W. R. 338, 4 Ch. App. 218; Maclean v. Mackay, 29 W. R. 798; Leech v. Schweder, 22 W. R. 633, 9 Ch. App. 463; Mander v. Falcke, 40 W. R. 31, [1891] 2 Ch. 554; Wilson v. Hart, 14 W. R. 748, 1 Ch. App. 467; Patman v. Harland, 29 W. R. 707, 17 Ch. D. 353; Tichborne v. Weir, 67 L. T. 735, 41 W. R. Dig. 120; Jackson v. Rowe, 2 S. & Sm. 472; Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Parr, 42 W. R. 561, [1894] 2 Q. B. 420; Burrows v. McCreight, 1 J. & L. 290; Bolling v. Hobday, 31 W. R. 9; Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society, 30 W. R. 299, 8 Q. B. D. 403.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. It has been most clearly and succinctly argued on the part of the appellant, but I have come to the conclusion myself that the learned judge's judgment is right, and, in point of fact, so exhaustive does his judgment appear to me to be that I should not venture to add or substitute anything of my own, except that I feel bound, in deference to the very able arguments which have been addressed to us, to give my decision in my own language.

The question arises in this way: The vendor seeks to have it declared that he has made a title which the purchaser ought to accept. What the vendor bought was what he himself describes in his affidavit as a squatter's title. A certain person had remained in possession of land for more than the statutory period, beginning somewhere, I think, about 1878, so that, at the end of the necessary time, he had acquired such right as arises under the Statute of Limitations in favour of a person who has occupied land for the statutory time, with the result that the title of the true owner is extinguished. Now this purchaser of that squatter's title contented himself with a squatter's title—that is to say, he contented himself with limiting his inquiries to the state of things subsequent to 1878. But when the title was being investigated by the present purchaser, he ascertained, not from any materials actually placed before him in the consideration of the title, but from independent information, that, in point of fact the person who had been dispossessed by the squatter had in the year

1872, being then the owner of the land in question, entered into a covenant with the owner of the adjoining land whereby certain restrictions were placed on the user of the land in question in the matter of building. Having notice of this covenant, the purchaser addressed a requisition based upon it to the vendor, with the result that the vendor contended two things: first of all, that it was a matter that he was absolutely unconcerned with; that any right claimed as arising, or asserted as existing, under something done by a predecessor—meaning thereby not a predecessor in the proper sense of the term, but the person whose right was extinguished as against the squatter—had ceased to exist by virtue of the Statute of Limitations, the squatter under whom the vendor claimed having acquired a title paramount to any preceding covenants or obligations accepted or imposed by the owner of this property, so that he was able to pass the property entirely free from any obligations incurred by former owners. That, inasmuch as the present vendor was a purchaser from the squatter, he received the land discharged from those obligations, and was able to pass it on to his purchaser, and therefore it was a matter not material to the discussion whether or not a former owner had imposed that obligation upon himself and upon the land. That was one point; the second point was that, even if it were the fact that what the owner of the land had done was effectual to create a burden under certain conditions, the vendor, at the time when he purchased from the squatter, was himself a purchaser for value, and that even if the squatter himself had not come in, as I have already said, entirely freed from any obligation, but this obligation passed through the squatter on to the purchaser from the squatter, still, unless that purchaser was a purchaser with notice of the burden, he was discharged from it; and it was contended that the present vendor Nesbitt in this case had neither actual nor constructive notice of the burden. That is the second point.

With regard to the first point the question really turns upon this, whether or not the effect of the Statute of Limitations was to vest in the squatter, at the expiration of the statutory period, the land in question discharged from the obligation of the covenant which had been created by the owner whose title was extinguished. Unless that is so, the burden of that covenant was on the land to which the squatter had become entitled simply through the extinction of the right of anybody else to turn him out, and this burden being imposed on the land notwithstanding his acquisition of it, every person who took that land would take it subject to the obligation of that covenant, unless he could prove that he was a purchaser for value without notice. Now whether or not that burden was imposed upon the land in the hands of the squatter depends upon the nature of the obligation created by a restrictive covenant entered into by the owner of the land. That such a covenant was entered into by the owner of the land whose right was afterwards extinguished, before his right was extinguished, there can be no doubt whatever; and if the right created by that covenant is what the late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, treated it as being—namely, a right in the nature of a negative easement, then it is not contended, or hardly contended, by the appellant here that a right of this nature would have been extinguished on the acquisition of the land by the squatter. It was admitted that a squatter could not take land freed from positive legal easements, and I understand it to be admitted also that if the right arising by virtue of the restrictive covenant was such as Sir George Jessel treated it—that is, analogous to a negative easement—then the squatter would take subject to the paramount right created by the obligation imposed by the covenant which adhered to the land and which bound those persons who became assignees of or acquired in any way a title to the land. It is suggested that the squatter was never an assignee—he was never a purchaser—and that, therefore, he does not come under the condition that a purchaser for value with notice is bound; but that he is a person who takes by a title given to him by law, which, it is asserted, is paramount to and overrides any such obligation as would have attached if the property had passed merely by assignment, so that the squatter coming in by operation of law takes independently of and freed from all such collateral obligations.

Now, that must depend upon the statute itself. Therefore we have got to see what the machinery of the statute is, and what, in point of fact, it effects. Now the Statute of Limitations, as one would expect, does not purport to annul by lapse of time any rights other than those which persons might have and ought to have exercised during the time. The statute does not begin to run in any case against a person until that person has been put to what is generally called his right of entry. Unless the circumstances have been such as to put the person who is to be barred by the lapse of time, upon the assertion of his right the time does not begin to run against him. All that the statute does is this: By section 34 it says this, "At the determination of the period limited by this Act to any person for making an entry or distress, or bringing any writ of quare impedit or other action or suit, the right and title of such person to the land, rent, or advowson, for the recovery whereof such entry, distress, action, or suit respectively might have been made or brought within such period shall be extinguished." That is the whole right that the squatter gets, the extinction of a title adverse to his own; but how does that affect the question here? What machinery is there in the Statute of Limitations which would affect the right of a covenantee having the benefit of a restrictive covenant? Nothing has been pointed out in the Act which touches it at all. There is no reason, to begin with, in principle, why it should be touched, because unless and until the right of that person has been in some way impinged upon, so that he has been called upon to exercise his rights, it would be clearly unfair that his rights should be affected. A person who stands simply with the benefit of a negative easement is certainly not put upon the assertion of his right unless and until that right has been interfered with in some way. It is a matter of absolute indifference to the person who owns the benefit of that obligation, who is the owner of that adjoining land over which that right exists, until that land has been used in some manner incompatible with his right. It seems to me, therefore, that the principal point of the discussion here is whether or not Sir George Jessel was right in the view that he took, that an obligation created by a restrictive covenant is in the nature of a negative easement creating a paramount right in the person entitled, over the land to which it relates. If that is so, then this gentleman by his squatting simply acquired a right to land subject to this incident; and then, of course, the burden of that incident would pass to all persons who become assignees of the land, and the squatter is not entitled to hand it over freed from that obligation.

Now, is that the law or not? To begin with, I do not think there was anything inconsistent with that view in the law as laid down in the leading case of Tulk v. Moxhay, though no doubt words are used there pointing to the equity as arising from the injustice which would accrue if a person getting land at a reduced price by reason of a restriction being accepted, were afterwards able to pass that land to other persons freed from that obligation, receiving in return a fair price. That element, no doubt, does enter into the discussion when we come to criticize, as we always have to criticize, the position of a person who acquires for value a legal estate in that land. The right created is an equitable right, capable of being defeated by a person who acquires the legal estate for value, and therefore the question arises whether, in the circumstances of the case, there is something which would make it inequitable for that person to avail himself of his legal estate. That, as pointed out by counsel for the respondents, is an inquiry which is inevitable in cases where you are dealing with equitable rights and legal estates. But that does not in the least prevent the right in question being what Sir George Jessel considered it to be —namely, a burden imposed upon the land, and passing with the land, subject, of course, to this: That it might be defeated by a purchaser for value without notice, but in order to defeat it the burden would be upon the person who took the land to show that he had acquired it under such conditions as to defeat the right as against him—namely, that he had acquired it for value and without notice.

Now, that being Sir George Jessel's view in Gomm's case, it seems to me that that view has been adopted more than once in this court—particularly in the case of Rogers v. Hosegood, that has been cited, although the point that arose in that case was, strictly, the running of the benefit, and not the running of the burden, as has been pointed out by the learned counsel for the appellant. Still, I think the principle which was dealt with there was not one limited only to the running of the benefit, but also dealt with the running of the burden, and I cannot help thinking that the court there did guide themselves by, and adopt, as expressing the true view in this matter, the view taken by Sir George Jessel in Gomm's case. It seems to me, therefore, that that view stands, not only on the great authority of Sir George Jessel, but it has also the authority of this court, not only in the case of Rogers v. Hosegood, but also in the later case of Formby v. Barker, which was cited to us this morning, and I think also in Haywood's case. It seems to me, therefore, that the law is clearly established in accordance with Sir George Jessel's view of that matter, and that this burden did remain on the land binding any person who could not show that he had bought for value and without notice. Therefore the squatter's title does not help the plaintiff in this case.

Now that brings us to the second point: Has the plaintiff here shown — and the burden is upon him to show—that having bought for value he has bought without notice of this incumbrance? Now there again it seems to me quite clear he has not discharged that burden. He admits that he accepted a title commencing in 1878. He was entitled to demand a title of forty years, and it seems perfectly clear that if he had insisted upon a title of forty years he must have had before him the existence of a covenant made as late as 1872 by the person whose title was displaced and extinguished, in the words of the statute, by possession for the statutory period by the person through whom the vendor now claims. That is equivalent to notice. In point of fact, by reasonable care in demanding the title to which he was reasonably entitled, he must have discovered the fact that there was this burden, and, if so, he must be taken as having had constructive notice of it. It is not even necessary to go as far as that, because I agree with Farwell, J., in this, as in all other points of the case, that the burden being upon the purchaser to show that he had bought for value without notice, he has not discharged that burden by simply stating "I did not push my inquiries beyond that." Whether he could have discovered it or not I do not know. I believe that is in doubt. But that does not seem to me to discharge the burden, if the burden is shown, and therefore it appears to me, on all grounds, that the vendor is not in a position to enforce the purchase against the purchaser, and therefore the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I also have come to the same conclusion as arrived at by Farwell, J., and for the reasons given in his very clear judgment. I also agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, and I might be contented with leaving the case as stated in those two judgments, but, having regard to their importance, I desire to add a few words of my own upon certain of the points that arise in the case.

In the first place, with regard to the general doctrine concerning a negative covenant, such as we are dealing with in this case, I think that whatever reasons may have been given for the doctrine in the earlier cases, and notwithstanding the way in which the doctrine has been referred to in some judgments in early cases, yet at the present day the doctrine ought to be regarded as well settled. I think the law is that such a covenant, when validly created, binds the land in equity, and can be enforced against subsequent owners of the land, subject only to the limitations that, being an equity, it cannot be enforced as against a bonâ fide purchaser of the land, that is to say, of the legal estate, without notice. This was clearly pointed out by Jessel, M.R., in the case of London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, where, at p. 583 of the report, he says: "The doctrine, rightly considered, appears to me to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine of Spencer's case to another line of cases, or else an an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements, such, for instance, as a right to the access of light, which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building to obstruct the light." And he says: "This is an equitable doctrine, establishing an exception to the rules of common law which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land, and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or on analogy to an easement. The purchaser took the estate subject to the equitable burden, with the qualification that if he acquired the legal estate for value without notice he was freed from the burden." The qualification, however, did not affect the nature of the burden; the notice was required merely to avoid the effect of the legal estate, and did not create the right, and if the purchaser took only an equitable estate he took subject to the burden whether "he had notice or not." As pointed out by my lord, in subsequent cases that view of the law has been adopted by this court. Indeed, to hold otherwise would lead to a result which, in my opinion, would be lamentable, for according to the contention of the appellant, it would result that, while any person in occupation of the land, claiming through the covenantor, even though only a tenant from year to year, or a mere occupant by permission, would be bound by the the covenant, yet a squatter going into occupation without any right or any permission of the true owner could say that, as between him and the covenantee, the land was freed from the covenant. In other words, he could as against the covenantee successfully plead his own trespass as putting him in a better position than if he had gone upon the land by right. I cannot think that the law necessitates any such result. On the contrary, as I have said, in my opinion the negative covenant does bind the land in equity, and I think that with regard to a squatter dealing in the first place with the time before that squatter has acquired any statutory right by lapse of time, inasmuch as he could not say he was a purchaser of a legal estate without notice, he would be bound by the covenant during his squatting, and that the covenant could be enforced against him if he sought to break it at the instance and on behalf of the covenantee. Now, that being, in my opinion, the position of the squatter before he has acquired a statutory right under the Statute of Limitations, let me consider what would be the position of the squatter after a twelve years' occupation under the statute. By that occupation he has no doubt acquired a statutory title as against the covenantor, or the heirs or assigns of the covenantor, who during those twelve years has or have been so remiss as not to eject him; but he does not thereby of necessity become entitled to hold the land free from the obligation of the negative covenant. That obligation was one existing against the title of the true owners of the land The right of the true owner, no doubt, has gone as against the successful squatter, who has acquired a title against him under the statute, but the equitable right of the covenantee still exists. It was not a right that could be barred by the operation of the Statute of Limitations in favour of the statutory squatting owner. The covenantee was not an assign of the land, or of any part of the land, or of any estate in the land which was capable of being barred by the operation of the Statute of Limitations; nor was the covenantor a trustee in any sense of the land for the covenantee, or of any part of it, or of any estate in it. The covenantee could not, directly or indirectly, by any person representing him and his right, in respect of that right under the restrictive covenant, take proceedings to recover possession against the squatter during the twelve years, and, in the case I am considering, the covenantee would, in my opinion, be no more barred by the operation of the Statute of Limitations by not taking proceedings against the squatter during the twelve years than he would have been barred by not taking proceedings against the true owner had that true owner remained in possession during that period. There is a fallacy, as it appears to me, in the argument of the appellant, and I think it is this: The argument seems to assume that the statutory owner becomes, at the end of the statutory period of limitation, in the same position as if he had ousted by statutory title all the prior owners of the estate so as to destroy all negative covenants validly created by them. That is not so. If A. being really entitled to land ousts by his superior good title one B. who has created restrictive covenants, or purported to create them, at a time when B.'s title was bad as against A., then, of course, when A recovers possession he is not bound by the restrictive covenants, for they were not originally validly created as against him (A.); but if A. is admittedly the true owner in fee in possession of the land at the time when he enters into valid restrictive covenants binding the land in equity, then a subsequent squatter, even when he ultimately by twelve years' occupation becomes entitled to the land as against A., or his heirs or assigns, cannot say or be heard to say that A. had no right to enter into the covenants originally, or that those covenants never had any validity as against him, the squatter, or ceased to have validity directly the twelve years elapsed. And certainly a squatter, who, if he did not know of the restrictive covenants validly entered into by the true owner, at best could only say that he did not know of them then, because he made no inquiry as to the title before he squatted, cannot say that he is in the position of a purchaser of the land for value without notice. So to hold would, in my opinion, be most unjust towards the covenantee, and lead to what appears to me would be most undesirable consequences affecting many estates in this country now usefully regulated by such restrictive covenants as I am considering. That being so, it remains to be considered whether, in the present case, the vendor, or his vendor, was a purchaser for value without notice. Now, in my opinion, if a purchaser chooses, either by agreement with the vendor or otherwise, to take less than a forty years' title, he cannot by so restricting his investigation, and by not inquiring into the title for the part of the period I have referred to, say that he was not affected with notice of equities affecting the land that he would have ascertained by reasonable inquiries into that part of the title. The appellant seems to contend that the case where a vendor has acquired a title merely by possession under the Statute of Limitations is to be treated as an exception to the rule I have indicated, and that a trespasser who has acquired a good title by successful trespass for twelve years or more is not bound, or should be treated as not being bound, to make any inquiries whatever as to an earlier title, but is to be treated as if he were in the position of a person who had purchased without notice after making proper inquiry as to title. I cannot agree with that contention of the appellant. I cannot see why a successful trespasser for twelve years, or a purchaser from him, should be placed in a better position than an ordinary owner or vendor, or a purchaser from such ordinary vendor. I do not see that he is entitled to be regarded as being in any peculiarly favoured position. That being so, in the present case neither the present vendor nor the vendor to him can say he was a purchaser without notice. If the present vendor or his vendor had insisted on a proper title, in regard to length, being given to him, or had made proper inquiries into that title, it is clear that he must have ascertained the existence of the negative covenants in question. It certainly is, in my opinion, for the vendor in this case to prove the plea of purchaser for value without notice on his behalf, or on behalf of the vendor to him. He has not discharged the onus cast upon him. For these reasons I think the appeals fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I so entirely agree with all that was said by Farwell, J., in his judgment, and with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J., that I almost doubt whether I ought to occupy even a few minutes of the time of the court, but having regard to the great importance of the case, perhaps it is right that I should add a few words.

The suggestion which is at the root of the appellant's argument is this: That a squatter can wholly disregard restrictive covenants affecting the building estate. That is so startling a proposition, and so wide reaching, that it must be wrong. The value of estates in the neighbourhood of London and all large towns, and the amenity of those estates, depends almost entirely upon the continuance of the mutual restrictive covenants affecting the user and the enjoyment of the property, and when we are told that the squatter, notwithstanding that he is a mere trespasser, is to be in a different and a better position from that occupied by a person deriving a title strictly through the original covenantor, one feels that there must be an answer to the argument, and I think the elaborate discussion and investigation of the authorities makes the answer quite plain. A restrictive covenant of this kind, or rather the benefit of a restrictive covenant of this kind, is a paramount right of the nature of a negative easement not in any way capable of being affected by the provisions of the Statute of Limitations on which the squatter relies. The only rights extinguished for the benefit of the squatter under section 34 are those of persons who might have brought during the statutory period, but did not in fact bring, an action to recover possession of the land. But the person entitled to the benefit of a restrictive covenant like this never had any cause of action which he could have brought, because unless and until there is a breach, or a threatened breach, of such a covenant, it is impossible for the person entitled to the benefit of it to bring any action. It appears, therefore, so far as the squatter himself was concerned, both during the currency of the twelve years, and after the expiration of the twelve years, there would be no possible answer to the claim of anybody seeking to enforce the claim, in fact there would, so far as he is concerned, be no difference between this, which was in the nature of an equitable easement, and a legal easement strictly and properly so called. But although the squatter took this property subject to this equitable burden, it may be, of course, in spite of that, that the present vendor, who purchased from or through the squatter, may be able to say that the burden does not affect the property in his hands. But what must he prove in order to claim this exemption? He must prove that he is a purchaser for value without notice. If he simply pleaded in the old days "I am a purchaser for value," such a plea would have been demurrable; he must go further and allege and prove that he was a purchaser for value without notice. Now can the present vendor allege and prove that? I think not. It is not necessary, of course, to prove actual notice. That has not been contended. But if a purchaser chooses to take a title without making full inquiries, he cannot be allowed to say that he had no notice of that which a full abstract would have disclosed. On this point the observations of North, J., in Cox and Neve's Contract, and the passages which have been referred to in [1891] 2 Ch., p. 117, are so much in point that I may venture to read them: "I must say I dissent entirely from the proposition that the purchaser would have taken the property free from the restrictive covenant if he had made no inquiry. On the contrary, I think he would have been bound by it, and for this reason. He had agreed by the bargain contained in the conditions of sale to accept a title of less than forty years. That cannot relieve him from all knowledge of the prior title, or it would come to this—that if a man was content to purchase property on the condition that he should not inquire into the title, he would acquire a title free from any restrictions, and would not have constructive notice of any incumbrance." Of course the law does not permit of anything so absurd as that, and I should be sorry to think that there could be nowadays any real doubt upon that. In the case of a lessee the law has gone possibly one step further, because in Putman v. Harland it has been held, and so far as I know, it has never been questioned, that a lessee is convicted with notice of any restrictive covenants, the existence of which he would have learned if he had investigated the lessor's title. Even though, since the year 1874, the lessee is not entitled under an open contract for a lease to require the production of the lessor's title, as Sir George Jessel in that case said, that alteration of the law did not really prevent or interfere with the application of Tulk v. Moxhay. If the lessee wanted to escape from that obligation he, in agreeing to take the lease, should have required the production of the lessor's title. So that the doctrine has been extended, and I venture to think, properly extended, not merely to a case where a purchaser under an open contract would get notice of the document, but, at least in the case of a lease, to a case where a purchaser under an open contract would not be entitled to require production of the documents which alone could give him notice. I think that a squatter, who has been in possession for more than twelve years, is certainly in no better position than any other person. He cannot make a good title without making and delivering a full abstract extending over the full period, and if the purchaser is willing to take a title depending upon the Statute of Limitations, and the effect of section 34, he must take such title as the vendor has, which is a title subject to the equitable burden, as it is often called, by analogy to Tulk v. Moxhay, except in so far as it can be shown that the equitable burden has been got rid of by means of a purchaser for value without notice.

For these reasons I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Solicitors, Harris, Chetham, & Cohen; Granville Smith, Coleman, Betts & Co.

From Chan. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 20.

In re ODDY.
MAJOR v. HARNESS. (a.)

Practice—Judgment—Order that plaintiff do recover a sum of money—Four-day order—Enforcing order—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 42, r. 3; ord. 41, r. 5.

Judgment in an action for a breach of trust was given in the form that the plaintiff do recover a sum of money. The plaintiff subsequently obtained a four-day order for payment of this sum.

Held, on appeal, that the four-day order must be discharged, the court having, under the old common law practice as it existed before the Judicature Act, no jurisdiction to supplement an order for the recovery of a sum of money by a four-day order, while rule 3 of order 42 did not apply, as a four-day order was not a mode of enforcing the original order but was an addition or supplement to it.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

By the judgment in the action, which was dated the 5th of August, 1905, the court declared that the defendant Harness had committed a breach of trust in the sale and application of the sum of £1,200 4 per cent. Debenture Stock in the Midland Railway Co., referred to in the statement of claim, and it was ordered that the plaintiff do recover from the said defendant the sum of £1,248 11s., being the loss occasioned to the trust estate after deducting certain payments already made by the defendant Harness, and that the said defendant do pay to the plaintiff his costs of the action.

By an order dated the 6th of November, 1905, made by Buckley, J., in chambers upon the application of the plaintiff, it was ordered that the defendant Harness do, within four days after service, pay to the plaintiff the sum of £1,501 1s., being the amount of the judgment with interest and costs.

The defendant moved to discharge this order.

Buckley, J., was of opinion that the case was within the words of ord. 42, r. 3, and accordingly dismissed the motion.

The defendant appealed.

By ord. 42, r. 3: "A judgment for the recovery by or payment to any person of money may be enforced by any of the modes by which a judgment or decree for the payment of money of any court whose jurisdiction is transferred by the principal Act might have been enforced at the passing thereof."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By ord. 41, r. 5: "Every judgment or order made in any cause or matter requiring any person to do an act thereby ordered shall state the time, or the time after service of the judgment or order, within which the act is to be done, and upon the copy of the judgment or order which shall be served upon the person required to obey the same there shall be indorsed a memorandum in the words or to the effect following, viz.: 'If you, the within named A. B., neglect to obey this judgment [or order] by the time therein limited, you will be liable to process of execution for the purpose of compelling you to obey the same judgment [or order].'"

Cave, K.C., and Luxmoore, for the appellant.—The court has no jurisdiction to make a four-day order where the original order is in the form that the plaintiff do recover: Drewett v. Edwards, 26 W. R. 60, 122; Hulbert v. Cathcart, [1894] 1 Q. B 244 42 W. R. Dig. 54. Rule 3 of order 42 does not apply here, as to make a four-day order when there is no order for payment is not to enforce the original order but to add something to it.

Cannot, for the plaintiff.—Drewett v. Edwards was decided before rule 3 of order 42 was made. Here there is a declaration that the defendant has committed a breach of trust, which distinguishes the present case from both Drewett v. Edwards and Hulbert v. Cathcart. The judgment is for the recovery by a person of a sum of money, and according to ord. 42, r. 3, it may be enforced in any mode by which a judgment or decree for the payment of money could have been enforced before the passing of the Judicature Act.

No reply was called for.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that this appeal must be allowed. So far as the practice is concerned the case cited to us of Drewett v. Edwards, which was a decision of the Court of Appeal, is really an authority. I am aware that that case was decided before rule 3 of order 42 was made, but that case shows as plainly as possible that according to the practice at common law an order that the plaintiff do recover could not be supplemented by a four-day order; and in the Chancery Division they did not use that form of order at all. Drewett v. Edwards was followed in the Queen's Bench Division by Hulbert and Crowe v. Cathcart, and though the latter case deals with sequestration, it did lay down in an emphatic manner that an order that the plaintiff do recover a sum of money could not be followed by a four-day order. Buckley, J., says that he does not quite understand the earlier part of the judgment of Wills, J., in that case. I think he can only mean that he does not understand why Wills, J., decided as he did, because the words of the judgment are very plain indeed. The only thing we have to deal with here is the language of rule 3 of order 42, which Buckley, J., dealt with in his judgment, and on which I think he intended to base his judgment. [His lordship read the rule.] Buckley, J., says that this case comes within the very words of that rule. I do not agree with him there. In the first place I agree with the argument that was addressed to us by counsel for the appellant, that to make a four-day order is not to enforce an original order that the plaintiff do recover. In my judgment it is to add a new order to the original order. Further, it would not be true to say that a four-day order so far as it fixes time is an order which ought in the ordinary course to have been added to an order that the plaintiff do recover. Not only have I never known such a thing done, but it would in fact defeat the very object of taking an order in that form. Plaintiffs are sometimes very anxious to get an order in that form because it enables them to get immediate execution. There is a manifest difference between an order for payment by a trustee and an order that the plaintiff do recover in considering the question what may be done to complete or supplement or perfect the order. In this particular case we do not know what led the plaintiff to take the order in this form, but we know that he did so. We also know that if the plaintiff had not brought the order to the registrar in that form, the registrar would never have made it in that form. I think that this appeal must be allowed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The judgment which was given in this case, after a declaration that the defendant had committed a breach of trust, proceeded to order that the plaintiff do recover from the defendant a certain sum of money, being the amount of the loss occasioned to the trust estate. That judgment having been given on the 5th of August, 1905, subsequently an application was made, to which the learned judge acceded, that that order be supplemented by making an order that the defendant Harness do pay to the plaintiff within four days of service of the order then made the sum of £1,501 1s. That order is now appealed from, and the question is whether the learned judge had power to make such an order. The judgment is one by which it is ordered that the plaintiff do recover a certain sum of money. Now, rule 3 of order 42 provides as follows. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:] A judgment for the recovery by the plaintiff from the defendant of a sum of money was a form of order which, prior to the Judicature Act, 1873, was not adopted by the Court of Chancery. It was a form of order which, prior to the Judicature Act, was peculiar and appropriate to the courts of common law. In order, therefore, to ascertain how such an order can be enforced, we have to consider how such an order could have been enforced in the common law courts at the time when the Judicature Act was passed. Could such an order have been enforced in the common law courts by a supplementary order directing payment within a limited time? We have been referred to two authorities which show that that could not be done. Drewett v. Edwards is a decision of the Court of Appeal subsequent to the Judicature Act, and is binding on us, and Hulbert v. Cathcart is a more recent decision to the same effect of a Divisional Court, while no case is cited to the contrary. It seems clear, therefore, that a judgment for recovery of a sum of money could not be supplemented by an order for payment within a limited time. From that point of view the order of the learned judge cannot be justified. But reference was made to ord. 41, r. 5. [His lordship read the rule.] It is said that the court has jurisdiction under that rule to make such a supplemental order as we have here. I think not. I agree with counsel for the appellant that making such a supplemental order is not enforcing an order already made. It is making an additional and another order, which appears to me to be contrary to the practice of the court in such a case as this. As regards the argument that the declaration in the first part of the judgment, that the defendant was a trustee and had committed a breach of trust distinguishes this case from the two cases cited, it appears to me that declaration cannot affect the construction of the order in the latter part of the judgment. If it is desired to pursue the remedies which under the Debtors Act, 1869, are still available against trustees who are ordered to pay money in their possession or under their control, the parties must be careful to select that form of order which was formerly adopted in the old Court of Chancery.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It seems to me that there never was a time at which in any court a judgment for the recovery of a sum of money in those words could have been enforced by a four-day order. In the language of Brett, L.J., in Drewett v. Edwards, the four-day order was made in equity to supply a deficiency in the decree which might have contained what was given in the four-day order. The judgment obtained here is not a judgment which ever did or could name a day, and so there is no deficiency to supply. That was really the principle upon which Wills, J., proceeded in Hulbert and Crowe v. Cathcart. He says: "The judgment is not an order to pay money; and for a master to order that the unsuccessful party shall pay the sum recovered within a certain time is totally to alter the nature of the remedy." For the reasons given by my lord and Stirling, L.J., I think this appeal must be allowed, and I can only regret that Buckley, J.'s, attention was not called to the case of Drewett v. Edwards, which is a decision binding on us in principle, although it is quite true that rule 3 of order 42 was not then in force.

Solicitors, Slark, Edwards, & Co.; H. Dade & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Nov. 22.

BANNATYNE v. MACIVER. (a.)

Principal and agent — Money borrowed by agent on behalf of principal without authority—Application of money in discharge of principal's legal liabilities—Right of lender to recover from principal.

An agent of the defendant firm borrowed money from the plaintiff on behalf of the firm, but without having any authority from them so to do, and applied the money so borrowed in discharging legal liabilities of the firm.

Held, that, by virtue of the equitable principle stated by Lord Selborne, L.C., in Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co., 31 W. R. 98, 22 Ch. D. 61, the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendants the money so borrowed and so applied.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Grantham, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought on a bill of exchange or, in the alternative, for money lent.

The plaintiff was a ship and insurance broker carrying on business in London. The defendant firm were also ship and insurance brokers, carrying on business at Liverpool and having a branch business in London.

Between the months of March and May, 1904, the manager of the defendants' London branch, named Hudson, applied to the plaintiff for advances, stating, but without having any authority so to do, that he was borrowing on behalf of the defendant firm, and the plaintiff accordingly gave him cheques for sums amounting to £350. Hudson paid the greater part of the sums so advanced into a banking account which the defendant firm kept with a London bank, and on which he had authority to draw. Nearly the whole of the amount so paid into the banking account was used by Hudson in discharging the liabilities of the firm, and even that part of the sums advanced which he did not pay into the bank was applied by him to the purposes of the firm. Subsequently Hudson accepted in the name of the firm a bill of exchange drawn by the plaintiff for £370 10s., being the amount of the sums advanced with interest.

The defence was that Hudson had no implied authority to borrow money on behalf of the defendant firm, and that the defendant firm kept him supplied from time to time with sufficient money to cover the liabilities of the branch.

At the trial the defendants negatived implied authority to borrow by giving evidence to the effect that it was not necessary or customary for a partner in a firm of ship and insurance brokers to have authority from his co-partners to borrow money.

For the plaintiff it was contended that he was at any rate entitled to recover on the ground that the sums advanced by him had been in fact expended in paying the liabilities of the defendant firm.

Grantham, J., gave judgment for the defendants.

J. R. Atkin (Scrutton, K.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to recover money advanced by him and applied in discharge of the defendants' liabilities by virtue of the equitable principle stated in Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co., 31 W. R. 98, 22 Ch. D. 61. This principle applies where money is borrowed by a partner on behalf of his firm without authority so to do and the money is applied in discharge of the firm's liabilities: Lindley on Partnership (7th ed.), p. 219.

Carver, K.C., and Sims Williams, for the defendants.—The equitable principle cited only applies to cases where money is borrowed by an agent of a company with limited powers of borrowing. It does not apply to the ordinary case of principal and agent. An ordinary principal cannot be held liable if he has supplied the agent with sufficient money for the purposes of the agency. In similar circumstances a firm are not liable for money borrowed by a partner although they have derived benefit from it: Smith v. Craven, 1 Cr. & J. 500. This case ought to be decided on contract alone, and there was no authority, express or implied, neither was there any ratification.

COLLINS, M.R.—It seems to me that this case can be put on a simple and clear basis. A man named Hudson was acting in London as the representative of the defendant firm, and he was allowed considerable latitude in the conduct of the business of the firm. He had an account at a London bank in the name of the firm, and as he seemed to be spending more money than they desired him to spend, they remonstrated with him, but they let him go on, and at last a time came when he had used all the money at the bank. As there were pressing demands in connection with the firm's branch business, Hudson borrowed money from the plaintiff, telling him that the money was required for the purposes of the firm. It is clear that a portion of the money so borrowed was applied by Hudson in paying liabilities of the firm. The plaintiff now says that he is entitled in equity to claim back from the defendants the money so applied in discharging their legal liabilities, and he asks for an account and relief. The principle on which the claim is based was stated by Lord Selborne, L.C., in Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co. He said: "I think the consistency of the equity allowed in the Cork and Youghal Railway Co.'s case, 18 W. R. 26, L. R. 4 Ch. 748, with the general rule of law that persons who have no borrowing powers cannot, by borrowing, contract debts to the lenders, may be shown in this way. The test is, has the transaction really added to the liabilities of the company? If the amount of the company's liabilities remains in substance unchanged, but there is, merely for the convenience of payment, a change of the creditor, there is no substantial borrowing in the result, so far as relates to the position of the company. Regarded in that light, it is consistent with the general principle of equity that those who pay legitimate demands which they are bound in some way or other to meet, and have had the benefit of other people's money advanced to them for that purpose, shall not retain that benefit so as, in substance, to make those other people pay their debts." That was cited in the case of In re Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Co., 47 W. R. 464, [1899] 1 Ch. 440. Here money found its way into the coffers of the defendants and was applied in discharge of their liabilities. It seems clear, therefore, that the equity spoken of by Lord Selborne arises. I think the plaintiff is entitled to an account and to recover what shall be found due on the account.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this case is governed by the general principle which I will state. Where money is borrowed on behalf of a principal by an agent, the lender believing that the agent has authority, and it turns out that the agent has no authority, and that his action has not been ratified by the principal, then, though the principal cannot be sued at law, yet in equity, to the extent to which the borrowed money has been applied in paying the principal's debts and liabilities, the lender is entitled to stand in the same position as if the money had been borrowed with authority. The precise difference between the position of such a lender and the position of a person who is entitled to stand in the shoes of a creditor absolutely is pointed out in In re Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Co. It is contended that the principle which I have stated is limited to the case of agents of limited companies. I see no reason for such limitation, neither does there appear to be any authority for it. I therefore think the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, J. S. Wilkinson.

Solicitors for the defendants, Charles Russell & Co., for Lightbound, Owen, & Co., Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Nov. 20, 21, 22, 23, 24.

WHITEHOUSE v. HUGH. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Building scheme—Roadway—Power to vary plans—Dedication—Cul-de-sac.

The plaintiff purchased a plot of land subject to a building scheme. On the plan attached to the conveyance a roadway, leading up to a railway and adjoining the plaintiff's land, was shown as a vacant space. This road was used by the public. One of the conditions embodied in the building scheme was that the vendors reserved power to allow variations in the plans and conditions.

Held, first, that in these circumstances the plan alone did not amount to a representation that the road should always remain a road, and that a purchaser could not be restrained from building thereon; and, secondly, that, in absence of active dedication, mere user by the public was not sufficient evidence of dedication.

Attorney-General v. Antrobus, [1905] 2 Ch. 206, 53 W. R. Dig. 174, followed.

Action.

This was an action by which the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from building on a roadway adjoining the plaintiff's land in contravention of a building scheme adopted by the Birkbeck Freehold Land Society in 1878. The plaintiff also alleged that the said roadway had been dedicated to the public.

The roadway in question was a short one leading from Mackenzie-road, Beckenham, over a level crossing on a branch of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. It was little used and had never been metalled.

In 1885 the plaintiff purchased from the Birkbeck Land Society a freehold plot of land, numbered 352 on the society's plan. This plot, on which a house had been erected, was on the south-eastern corner of Mackenzie-road and the roadway in question. On the plan annexed to the plaintiff's conveyance the roadway was shewn as a vacant space between plots 352 and 355. This conveyance was made subject to certain conditions and stipulations, by the ninth of which the vendors reserved to themselves the power to allow variations in the plans and conditions.

In 1894 the building society came to an arrangement with the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway whereby the railway was released from maintaining the level crossing, and in 1897 the building society erected a wooden fence across the Mackenzie-road end of the roadway in question, and in the same year sold the two plots over which the roadway passed to a Mr. Willard, the defendant's predecessor in title, as building land.

In 1894 Mr. Willard sold 21, Mackenzie-road, which was erected on plot 355, and the two plots over which the roadway passed to the defendant, who, in the month of November, commenced to erect two houses thereon.

Stewart-Smith, K.C., and Todd, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff bought his house relying on the building scheme being carried out. That scheme is binding on the land society and on all persons claiming through them. The roadway in question was part of that scheme, and the defendant cannot now treat the roadway as building land: Heriot's Hospital v. Gibson, 2 Dow. 301; Tucker v. Vowles, 41 W. R. 156, [1893] 1 Ch. 195; and In re London School Board and Foster, 87 L. T. 700, 51 W. R. Dig. 88. In addition to this there has been dedication of the roadway in question to the public.

Lawrence, K.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the defendant.—The Birkbeck Society have reserved power to vary the scheme, and this is a variation that the society have allowed. There has never been a sufficient dedication to the public: Attorney-General v. Antrobus, [1905] 2 Ch. 206.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, said: The plaintiff first puts his case on this, that the plot of ground in question was shown as a road on the plan attached to his conveyance, and that the building society, who were the real defendants, were obliged to maintain it as a roadway. But in the first place this plot of ground is not described on the plan as a road, but is merely shown as a vacant space, and, further, it is admitted that no case can be found in which a plan alone, such as this is, has been held sufficient ground for saying that the vendor could not alter what appears on the plan. I have been referred to the case of Heriot's Hospital v. Gibson, which seems to point the other way, and to Tucker v. Vowles, which also seems to point in the same direction; indeed, the latter case is almost a decision on the point. In In re London School Board and Foster, to which I have been referred, there certainly appear to be some expressions which seem to show that representations might possibly be inferred from a plan that a particular scheme should be followed without variation. I will pass that case by with merely an indication that in my opinion a plan alone would not be sufficient. I therefore hold against the plaintiff, that there was no representation that there was a road or that this vacant place should remain vacant. But, besides this, the conveyance was made subject to the condition which reserved to the land society power to allow any variation in the plans and conditions. The relations between the parties in all these building scheme cases is contractual, and if one of the parties reserves to himself power to alter the contract, then that reservation becomes part of the contract itself, whether the contract was expressed or implied. Now, in this case I do not think that vendors could say that they would not make the roads specified in the scheme or would make them in a different way. But why should they not allow someone to build on this vacant space? The only answer that can be given is that it is not strictly a vacant space but a road; and if it is not so shown on the plan, it is a road in fact. That, in my opinion, is not a sufficient answer. A mere private road may be converted into anything else. It may be converted into a playground or into anything else convenient to the vendors. I therefore hold that the plaintiff cannot say that the vendors could not allow the defendant to build houses on this plot, and that consequently the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from so building.

(a.) Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But, further, it has been said that the roadway was dedicated to the public, and, having been so dedicated, no building can be allowed thereon to the plaintiff's detriment. I will assume that, without the plaintiff showing special damage, this question can be tried in the absence of the Attorney-General. It is important to consider the position of this road. It is a road leading up to a railway and there is no dedication of any part of the railway line to the public use. There was merely a private right of way over the railway, and that right has now been released. The result is that the road in question is in the nature of a cul-de-sac. It has been said that this road has been converted into a public road by user. But in Attorney-General v. Antrobus, Farwell, J., said that, in the absence of any active dedication, mere user by the public has never been held sufficient to constitute dedication in the case of a cul-de-sac. There is nothing here but a mere user by the public of a vacant space which the building society might allow anybody to use. On this point, in my opinion, the plaintiff's case completely breaks down. There must therefore be judgment for the defendant with costs.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, James Powell.

Solicitors for the defendant, Rubinstein & Co.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 3, 4.
Farwell, J. }

In re FRIEND'S SETTLEMENT.
COLE v. ALLCOT. (a.)

Settlement — Construction — Survivors — Stirpital survivorship.

Real estate settled by deed upon trust for seven tenants in common for life with remainder to his or her children attaining twenty-one or marrying—proviso that if any one or more of the tenants for life should die without issue or leaving issue which should die under twenty-one or unmarried, the share of such tenant for life should be divided between "the survivors and survivor of them and their issue in all respects as the original shares."

Held, that the same principles apply in the construction of a deed and of a will.

Held, that "survivors and survivor" must be construed "others and other," and that children of tenants for life who had attained twenty-one and died took accrued shares, although they did not survive the tenants for life whose shares had accrued to them.

Cole v. Sewell, 2 H. L. C. 186, followed.

Waite v. Littlewood, 21 W. R. 131, 8 Ch. 70, and Lucena v. Lucena, 26 W. R. 254, 7 Ch. D. 255, discussed and distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

By a deed dated in 1836 W. Friend settled certain hereditaments, in the events which happened, to trustees and their heirs upon trust for the six daughters and the son of R. M. Morey for life as tenants in common, and from and after their respective deaths upon trust to convey the shares of them so dying unto and equally between their, his, or her child or children who being a son or sons should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry, and their respective heirs and assigns as tenants in common per stirpes: "Provided always that if any one or more of the said six daughters of the said R. M. Morey or the said James Morey shall die without issue, or leaving issue, and such issue being a son or sons shall die under the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall die under the said age of twenty-one years without being or having been married, then and in such case the share or shares of her, him, or them so dying, as also the share or shares which by virtue of this present proviso shall have survived to her, him, or them of and in the said hereditaments and the rents and profits thereof shall go to and be divided unto and equally between the survivors and survivor of them the said six daughters of the said R. M. Morey and the said James Morey and their, her, and his issue respectively for such estates and interests in such shares and proportions and in such manner in all respects as the original shares of the said six daughters of the said R. M. Morey and the said James Morey and their issue respectively are hereinbefore directed to be divided."

Four of the tenants for life died without issue. Another married and died leaving one son, who attained twenty-one, and then died in the lifetime of some of the tenants for life. Another married and died leaving several children who had attained twenty-one and were alive. The seventh tenant for life was still alive.

On the death of James Morey without issue in 1901 the question arose as to who was entitled to his share. By the summons the following questions were raised: (1) Whether the gifts over upon the deaths without issue of the tenants for life took effect in favour of the other tenants for life irrespective of such tenants for life or any children of them respectively being living when such gifts over took effect; (2) or whether such gifts over took effect only in favour of the tenants for life who, or the children of whom respectively were, living when such gifts over took effect; and (3) whether such gifts over took effect only in favour of children living when such gifts over took effect to the exclusion of children then dead?

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jenkins, K.C., and Paice, for the trustee of the settlement.

R. J. Parker, for the assignee of the share of the son of a tenant for life who had died after attaining twenty-one, argued that "survivors and survivor" must be construed as "others and other." This was not like In re Bilham, 49 W. R. 483, [1901] 2 Ch. 169, where "survivors" meant stirpital survivorship.

E. P. Hewitt, for a surviving child of a tenant for life of full age, submitted that this settlement must be construed literally, not being a will, but a deed, and that "survivors" meant survivors in stock.

F. E. Farrer in a similar interest.

W. R. Sheldon, for the surviving tenant for life.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The case of Cole v. Sewell, 2 H. L. C. 186, shows conclusively that the same principles apply in construing a deed and in construing a will. There, too, it was said by Lord Brougham that "survivor or survivors" may, regard being had to the circumstances, operate as the words "other or others." In the present case, therefore, I regard the question exactly as if I were construing a will. The accrued shares are directed by the settlement to go in all respects as the original shares. If I cut down the vested interests, which appear to me to be clearly given to the children of the son and of the six daughters so as to make them contingent on their surviving any one of the tenants for life, then the accrued shares would not go "in the same manner in all respects" as the original shares, and I should be disregarding the plain words of the settlement.

As to the case of Waite v. Littlewood, 21 W. R. 131, 8 Ch. 70, and Lucena v. Lucena, 26 W. R. 254, 7 Ch. D. 255, which were cited to me, the learned judges were trying to find elements of survivorship to justify them in reading "survivors" as "others," and suggested that it might be found in survivorship of stocks. But this survivorship may be that not of individuals, but of estates or interests. For instance, if the original gifts are to the life-tenants' children who attain twenty-one, then if A., a surviving life tenant, dies without issue, while B., another life tenant, has predeceased him leaving a child who attained twenty-one but predeceased A., then the stirpes of B., having acquired a vested interest under the original gift, has "survived" to take by way of accruer the share of A. The result in this case is that I hold that "survivors" means "others," and that the children of the tenants for life need not survive the last tenants for life, and the declaration will follow this.

Solicitors, Paice & Cross; Stow, Preston, & Lyttelton, for J. Leake, Shifnal.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Jan. 19, 24, 31.

YOUNG v. CUTHBERT. (a.)

Education — Public elementary school — Non-provided school—Mistress—Dismissal—Consent of local education authority—Education Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 42) —Powers of subcommittees.

The managers of a "non-provided" elementary day school, maintained by the local education authority under the Education Act, 1902, gave a teacher notice of dismissal without first obtaining the consent of the local education authority.

Held, that the notice of dismissal was valid, section 7, clause 1 (c), of the Education Act, 1902, only making the consent of the local education authority to the dismissal of a teacher a condition on observance of which the managers can require the school to be maintained by the local education authority, but not making its consent a condition precedent to a valid dismissal as between the managers and the teacher.

Action.

The plaintiff was on the 30th of November, 1905, in the employment of the defendants as head mistress of St. John's Home School at Clewer, in Berkshire, under the terms of an agreement containing a provision that the agreement might be terminated at any time by either party giving the other three calendar months' notice in writing.

The school is what is called a "non-provided" school, in other words it is a school "maintained," but not "provided," by the local education authority.

In October, 1905, no charges or complaints had been brought against the plaintiff by the defendants, who were the managers of the school, but they had come to the conclusion that she was out of harmony with them, and that this was detrimental to the best interests of the school. In these circumstances, on the 17th of October, 1905, there was a meeting of the managers, at which the plaintiff attended, and a resolution was passed that "in view of the evident friction with which the school was being conducted" the plaintiff should be asked to resign, and that if she refused, notice should be sent to the Berkshire Education Committee that the managers desired to terminate their agreement with her.

The plaintiff refused to resign, and accordingly a letter was written by the managers to the Berkshire Education Committee, to which a reply was received on the 28th of November. The reply stated that "the committee will approve the notice given by your managers to Miss Young to terminate her engagement."

On the 30th of November the managers gave the plaintiff notice of the termination of her agreement from the 1st of December, and enclosed with their letter a cheque for three months' salary in lieu of notice. They stated that this notice had the approval of the Berkshire Education Committee. The authority for this letter was this: the Berkshire County Council had, pursuant to section 17 of the Act of 1902, delegated their powers to an education committee, and that committee in exercise of the power given by Schedule I., A (6) of the Act had appointed a subcommittee to deal with, among other things, the appointment and dismissal of teachers. The subcommittee appointed a "section" to deal with the details surrounding the dismissal of teachers and to make recommendations to the sub-committee.

On the 25th of November the section gave its consent to the dismissal, and this was the consent referred to in the letter of the 28th of November.

(a.) Reported by T. PAKENHAM LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 9th of December the sub-committee approved and adopted the action of the section.

On the 18th of December the plaintiff issued her writ whereby she asked for an injunction to restrain the defendants from dismissing her until the consent of the education authority for the county of Berkshire had been obtained and until an opportunity had been given her to defend herself before the properly constituted authorities. On the same day she served a notice of motion in the terms of the writ, and on the 19th of January, 1906, the motion came on. Inasmuch as the education committee was to meet next day the hearing stood over till the 24th of January.

On the 20th of January the education committee gave their approval to the action of the sub-committee and the section.

The arguments are fully stated in the judgment.

Buckmaster, K.C., and A. A. Thomas, for the plaintiff.

W. F. Hamilton, K.C., and Edward Ford, for the defendants.

Arthur Underhill appeared for the Berkshire County Council.

BUCKLEY, J.—On the 30th of November, 1905, the plaintiff was in the employment of the defendants as mistress of the St. John's Home Day School, at Clewer, in Berkshire, upon the terms of an agreement, dated the 5th of July, 1900, which contained a provision that the agreement might be terminated at any time by either party, on giving the other three calendar months' notice in writing. The school is what is known as a "non-provided" school under the Education Act, 1902, that is to say, it is a school maintained, but not provided, by the local education authority. On the 30th of November, 1905, the defendants, as managers of the school, gave the plaintiff notice of the termination of her agreement from the 1st of December, and enclosed with their letter a cheque for three months' salary in lieu of notice. They stated that this notice had the approval of the Berkshire Education Committee. On the 2nd of December, 1905, the plaintiff wrote that she was advised that the notice was invalid and inoperative. The ground of her contention was that, having regard to the provisions of the Education Act, 1902, the managers could not dismiss her without the consent of the local education authority, and that that consent had not been obtained. On the 18th of December she issued the writ in this action, asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from dismissing her until the consent had been obtained, and until an opportunity had been given her to defend herself before the properly constituted authority; and on the same day she gave a notice of motion for an injunction in the same terms. That motion came on for hearing before me on Friday, the 19th of January, 1906. It then appeared that one question in dispute was whether the education authority had given their consent, and that a meeting of the education committee of the district was to be held the next day, Saturday, the 20th of January. I therefore directed the further hearing of the motion to stand over until Wednesday, the 24th of January, so that I might know what the committee would do. On the 24th of January it appeared that on the 20th of January the education committee passed a resolution "that the education committee consent to the dismissal" in question, "such dismissal having been given on the 30th of November last." Under these circumstances, I pointed out that an interlocutory judgment was impossible, and that the matter resolved itself into a question possibly of money and also of costs, which could only be determined at the trial. The parties, with great good sense, consented to treat the hearing of the motion as the trial of the action; and the plaintiff's counsel, upon my invitation, stated that the judgment for which under those circumstances he asked was a judgment for a declaration that the plaintiff had received no valid notice of dismissal and for the costs of the action. I have, therefore, now to give judgment at the trial of the action finally determining the plaintiff's rights in the matter.

The plaintiff contends that the consent of the local education committee is, under the Education Act, 1902, a condition precedent to dismissal by the managers, that such consent had not been given on the 30th of November, 1905, and that consequently the notice of that date is invalid. I will assume, in the first instance, that on the 30th of November, 1905, the consent of the authority had not been given, and upon that assumption will investigate what is the true construction of the section of the Act of Parliament bearing upon this matter. Section 7 of the Act of 1902 provides that the education authority shall maintain and keep efficient public elementary schools, but, in the case of a school not provided by them, only so long as certain following conditions and provisions are complied with. One of these conditions is (clause 1 (e)) that the consent of the authority shall be required to the dismissal of a teacher unless the dismissal be on certain grounds, being grounds not relevant to this case. The plaintiff argues that the conditions and provisions which are found in clauses (a) to (e) of section 7 are affirmative statutory provisions binding as such upon the parties affected—in other words, that section 7 is to be read as if clauses (a) to (e) formed independent affirmative sections of the Act and were then followed by another clause providing that the authority shall maintain and keep efficient the school only so long as clauses (a) to (e) are complied with. In my judgment this is not the construction of the Act of Parliament. The contract between the managers and the teacher is a contract to which the education authority is not a party. The question is whether that contract between the managers and the teacher is to be read as if, by virtue of the statute, it contained a clause to the effect that the managers will not dismiss the teacher without the consent of the authority. Does the Act of Parliament introduce such a stipulation into the contract? The answer, I think, is in the negative. Section 7 contemplates that the conditions may or may not be complied with; it cannot be, then, that the statute is to be read as requiring that they shall be complied with. Reading the section quite shortly, and introducing only the relevant words, its frame is as follows: The local education authority shall maintain and keep efficient the school only so long as the consent of the authority shall be required to the dismissal of a teacher—meaning, I think, only so long as the managers, as between themselves and the authority, observe the condition that without the consent of the authority they will not dismiss. Let me take another of the conditions—say clause (d)—and see what is the true construction of the Act in that case. Suppose the managers do not keep the schoolhouse in repair, what is the consequence? It will follow that the local authority will no longer be bound to maintain and keep efficient the school. But could proceedings be instituted against the managers for breach of a statutory duty by way of mandamus to compel them to keep the schoolhouse in repair or by way of consequences for misdemeanour? In my judgment, certainly not. Take again clause (b). Does that give the local authority statutory authority to inspect the school? I think not. The frame of the section is that the authority shall maintain the school so long as the authority shall have power to inspect the school. From this it results that if the managers refuse inspection the local authority ceases to be liable to maintain, but not that the school can be compelled to submit to inspection. There is another sub-section to be considered—viz., section 7 (7)—which provides that, subject as there mentioned, the managers shall have the "exclusive power of appointing and dismissing teachers." Exclusive of whom? Exclusive, I conceive, of the education authority. This shows that the managers have the dominant power, and that that is controlled only by the powers which the local education authority have under the section. If the consent of the local authority is a condition precedent to appointment or dismissal, the words "exclusive power" seem strangely inappropriate. The true meaning, I think, is that, unless the education authority intervene, the power of apppointment and dismissal rests with the managers, and that the consent of the authority is required in the sense that, if the education authority interpose, the managers must choose between two alternatives—viz., either to yield to the wishes of the authority or cease to receive maintenance from public funds. The words as to consent, whatever be their effect, are, I think, operative only as between the authority and the managers and do not give any right to the teacher. There is nothing in the Act to affect the contract between the managers and the teachers. The effect of the provisions of the Act is only to produce certain consequences as between the managers and the local authority, if the former act without the consent of the latter in any case in which such consent is required. Thus far I have assumed that the consent of the local authority had not been given.

The facts as to what had been done are as follows: The Education Act came into force in this district on the 30th of August, 1903. In October, 1905, no charges or complaints had been brought against Miss Young by the managers, but they had come to the conclusion that the teacher was out of harmony with the managers and that this was detrimental to the best interests of the school. Under these circumstances, on the 17th of October, 1905, there was a meeting of the managers, at which the plaintiff attended, and a resolution was passed that "in view of the evident friction with which the school was being conducted" the lady should be asked to resign, and that, if she refused, notice should be sent to the Berkshire Education Committee that the managers desired to terminate their agreement with her. The lady did not resign, and accordingly a letter was written by the managers to the Berkshire Education Committee, which evoked a reply of the 28th of November, 1905. That reply stated that "the committee will approve the notice given by your managers to Miss Young to terminate her engagement." Acting upon that letter, the notice of dismissal was given on the 30th of November. The authority for the letter of the 30th of November was this: The Berkshire County Council had, pursuant to section 17 of the Act of 1902, delegated their powers to an education committee, and that committee, in exercise of the power given by Schedule I., A (6) of the Act, had appointed a sub-committee to deal with, amongst other things, the appointment and dismissal of teachers. The sub-committee appointed a section to deal with the details surrounding the dismissal of teachers and to make recommendations to the sub-committee. On the 25th of November the section gave its consent. This was the consent referred to in the letter of the 28th of November. On the 9th of December the sub-committee approved and adopted the action of the section. The writ was issued, as I have stated, on the 18th of December. Subsequently, on the 20th of January, the consent of the education committee itself was given, as I have before stated. In my judgment the education committee, having regard to section 17 of the Act, could exercise all the powers of the local education authority. The education committee was for this purpose the original authority. Further, having regard to Schedule I., A (6), the sub-committee was, I think, a body which could determine, and not merely report to the committee upon, a question such as this consent. But I do not think that the "section" was other than a subordinate body. Its duty was to consider and recommend to the sub-committee. Its action required, I think, approval by the sub-committee. Under these circumstances it seems to me that on the 30th of November, 1905, the consent of the authority had not been obtained. But in my judgment this is not a matter on which the plaintiff can rely as invalidating the notice which was given her. This matter of consent was, as I have said, a matter arising only as between the authority and the managers. It was not a condition precedent to a good notice of dismissal. A subsequent consent by the authority to that which the managers had done under a provisional consent given by their subordinate section refers back, I think, and ratifies the act which the managers did, if any such ratification was required. Moreover, on the 9th of December, being before the issue of the writ, the sub-committee had approved the action of the section. Further, and as a separate point, absence of consent, if there was such absence at the relevant date, is not, I think, a matter which the plaintiff can set up. It gives her no right. It is a matter which would result only in consequences as between the school and the education authority. In my opinion the action fails and I dismiss it, and, as the defendants ask for costs, it must be dismissed with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors, Baker & Nairne; Freeman & Son; Dale, Newman, & Hood, for T. F. Morland, Reading.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Jan. 20.

In re CRIGGLESTONE COAL CO. (LIMITED).
STEWART v. THE COMPANY. (a.)

Practice—Debenture-holders' action—Property in danger—Motion for judgment on admissions—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 51, r. 1b.

Where debenture-holders brought an action for the realization of their security, and moved for judgment on admissions, the judge, in the absence of some of the third debenture-holders, directed a sale with the approbation of the judge.

This was a motion for judgment on admissions contained in the pleadings.

The plaintiffs in the action were, the holder of some of a first issue of debentures (who also held £3,000 of a third issue of debentures), on behalf of himself and all other first debenture-holders, and the trustees of a deed securing the first issue of debentures; and the defendants comprised the company, which was a colliery company, the holder of all the second debentures, and the holder of £19,000 out of £40,000 third debentures. The principal money of the first issue of debentures had not fallen due, and there were no arrears of interest.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged that the company's mine was in danger of destruction owing to flooding, and the proposed minutes contained a declaration to the effect that the plaintiffs were entitled to a charge upon the undertaking and property of the company, and directed that the receiver (who had been appointed upon the passing of a resolution that the company should cease to carry on business) should be at liberty to sell the property, assets, and effects of the company as a going concern. An affidavit by the receiver in support of the allegations contained in the statement of claim had been filed, as was required by Cozens-Hardy, J., in In re Day and Night Advertising Co., 48 W. R. 362.

The defendants by their defences admitted the allegations in the statement of claim.

An order for immediate sale was asked for under R. S. C. 1883, ord. 51, r. 1*b*, which directs that, in debenture-holders' actions, where the debenture-holders are entitled to a charge by virtue of the debentures or of a trust deed or otherwise, and the plaintiff is suing on behalf of himself and other debenture-holders, and where the judge in person is of opinion that there must eventually be a sale, he may in his discretion direct a sale before judgment, and also after judgment, before all the persons interested are ascertained, whether served or not.

Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, K.C., and H. M. Humphry, for the plaintiffs.

Manson, for the company.

Baden Fuller, for the other defendants.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—There must be a direction that the property be sold with the approbation of the judge, instead of a direction for the receiver to sell. This will overcome the difficulty of making an order in the absence of some of the third debenture-holders, who might dispute the right of the plaintiffs to a charge. There must be a declaration of charge, for upon that rests the jurisdiction to direct a sale under ord. 51, r. 1*b*.

By following this course, the absent debenture-holders can be brought in upon the making of an application to approve any conditional contract of sale.

In other respects the judgment will be in the usual form.

Solicitors, Gribble, Oddie, Sinclair, & Johnson, for Stewart & Chalker, Wakefield.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Darling, JJ.) Nov. 11.

FOWLER v. CRIPPS. (a.)

Trade-mark — False trade description — Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), ss. 2, 3.

The appellant sold in the ordinary course of business a hundredweight of soda, which was described in the invoices as "soda crystals." The mixture, when analyzed, was found to contain crystallized carbonate of soda mixed with Glauber salts, or crystallized sulphate of soda, varying in the different samples from 18 to 64 per cent. The evidence showed that the term "soda crystals" meant ordinary washing soda, and that that article consisted of crystallized carbonate of soda containing not more than 2 per cent. of sulphate of soda or Glauber salts. He was charged on an information with having applied to the goods a false trade description.

Held (Darling, J., dissenting), that the description of the mixture sold as "soda crystals" was a false trade description within the meaning of section 3 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, and that the appellant was properly convicted.

Case stated.

At a petty sessions held at Tunbridge Wells an information was preferred by the respondent on behalf of the Board of Trade against the appellant under section 2, sub-section 2, of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, charging that the appellant on the 1st of September, 1904, did unlawfully sell certain goods, to wit, a quantity of Glauber salts mixed with soda crystals, to which a false trade description, to wit, soda crystals, was applied contrary to the provisions of the Act. The following facts were proved in evidence:

The appellant is a retail oilman and hardware dealer carrying on business at Tunbridge Wells, and on the 1st of September, 1904, he sold in the ordinary way of his trade to William Gayton Butler, a traveller in the employment of Brunner, Mond, & Co. (Limited), manufacturing chemists, a hundredweight of soda which was described on the invoices delivered with the goods as "soda crystals." The price charged for the goods was four shillings.

A portion of the soda purchased by William Gayton Butler was analyzed and was found to contain soda crystals and crystallized carbonate of soda mixed with Glauber salts or crystallized sulphate of soda.

Analysis of six several samples were proved with the following results:

Soda crystals—(1) 64 per cent.; (2) 78·87 per cent.; (3) 35·10 per cent.; (4) 37·29 per cent.; (5) 86·8 per cent.; (6) 39·3 per cent.

Glauber salts—(1) 34 per cent.; (2) 18·78 per cent.; (3) 64·53 per cent.; (4) 61·87 per cent.; (5) 43·1 per cent.; (6) 60·7 per cent.

In explanation of the difference in the results of these various samples it was stated that the carbonate of soda and the sulphate of soda having been separately produced were mechanically mixed together subsequently to the manufacture, and consequently in their manufacture there might be more of one sort than of the other.

There are many salts of sodium which are prepared in a crystallized form. Seventeen salts of sodium are mentioned in the British Pharmacopœia, and one witness said there were as many as 3,000 salts of sodium. Carbonate of soda and sulphate of soda are only two of them. These are both usually prepared and sold in a crystallized form.

The process of crystallization is similar in each case. The result is a chemical combination in crystallized form of about 33 per cent. of carbonate of soda or sulphate of soda, as the case may be, and 66 per cent. of water.

Carbonate of soda is produced by various processes, and one of such processes, that employed by Messrs. Brunner, Mond, & Co., is known as the ammonia process. The crystallized carbonate of soda prepared by this process contains a small proportion of sulphate of soda. This small quantity is left in the manufacture, or is added to the soda ash in the process of crystallization for the purpose of hardening the crystals.

There are other processes by which crystallized carbonate of soda is produced different from the process adopted by Messrs. Brunner, Mond, & Co. These processes, two of which are known as the Leblanc and the Pernkoff processes, were referred to by the witness.

Both have a proportion of sulphate of soda. In the Leblanc process there is a trace and in the

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pernkoff process about 30 per cent., but not in the form of crystal. Carbonate of soda in the crystallized form and containing not more than 2 per cent. of sulphate of soda is the commodity commonly known as washing soda for domestic use, and is usually described as "soda crystals."

This description is not applied to sulphate of soda, nor usually to carbonate of soda containing more than 2 per cent. of sulphate of soda. All the witnesses who gave this evidence were (with one exception) analytical manufacturing chemists.

The market value of crystallized carbonate of soda is about double that of Glauber salts, a crystallized sulphate of soda.

Sulphate of soda, or Glauber salts, has no detergent qualities, but in appearance is exactly like carbonate of soda.

The appellant was not called as a witness.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that crystallized soda and soda crystals are the same; that when a description is true with regard to the material of which two or more things are composed, it cannot under any circumstances become a false trade description as to any one of them; that soda is a genuine term applicable to any preparation or compound of sodium, and cannot be a false description when applied to any one of them; that the word "soda crystals" when applied to crystallized carbonate of soda or to crystallized sulphate of soda is a true description of the material of which each article is composed, and therefore cannot be a false description when applied to a mixture of both; that there was no evidence of any false description within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the words "soda crystals" were only applicable to crystallized carbonate of soda containing not more than 2 per cent. of sulphate of soda and that it was therefore a false trade description when applied to a mixture of carbonate of soda and crystallized sulphate of soda when the proportion of the latter was more than 2 per cent. of the whole.

The justices held that "soda crystals" meant ordinary washing soda, and that on the evidence before them that article consisted of crystallized carbonate of soda containing not more than 2 per cent. of sulphate of soda or Glauber salts, and that the description was a false trade description when applied to the mixture of crystallized carbonate of soda and crystallized sulphate of soda. They accordingly convicted the appellant, and the question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices were right in convicting the appellant.

By the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 3, sub-section 1: "For the purposes of the Act 'trade description' means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect . . . as to the material of which any goods are composed. . . . And the use of any figure, word, or mark which, according to the custom of the trade, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters shall be deemed to be a trade description within the meaning of this Act. The expression 'false trade description' means a false description which is false in a material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied."

Avory, K.C. (Bonsey with him), for the appellant.—The magistrates were wrong. Glauber salt is a species of soda crystals, and the custom of the trade cannot make that a false description which, apart from the custom, is a true description.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (H. Sutton and Safford with him), for the respondent.—A description may be quite correct and yet false as a false description. Here the case finds that the words "soda crystals" means, according to the custom of the trade, ordinary washing soda. The description, therefore, of Glauber salt as soda crystals was a false description.

Avory, K.C., replied.

DARLING, J.—I am reluctant to differ from the rest of the court, but I am bound to express my view. The appellant is charged with selling a quantity of Glauber salts mixed with soda crystals under the false trade description of "soda crystals." The ground of the complaint was that, whereas, according to the custom of the trade, the term "soda crystals" means washing soda or carbonate of soda containing not more than 2 per cent. of Glauber salts; the mixture sold by the appellant contained a very much higher proportion of Glauber salts, varying from 18 per cent. in one of the samples taken to as much as 64 per cent. in another. It is said that this was a false trade description as to the material of which the mixture was composed. Now, there are many salts of soda in a crystallized form, and sulphated of soda or Glauber salts is one of them. It is in fact one of the many "soda crystals." And to describe it as what in fact it is cannot, in my opinion, amount to a false trade description; for I think that no amount of usage in the trade can give one species of the class the exclusive right to a description which, though true of that species, is not untrue in fact of the others. Then if it is equally true to describe carbonate of soda and sulphate of soda separately as soda crystals it cannot be a false trade description to apply that name to a mixture of the two. I think the appeal should be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I think this conviction must stand. The Merchandise Marks Act was passed, not to ensure scientific accuracy in trade terms, but to protect trade, and to ensure, as far as legislation can do so, that trade shall be carried on honestly, and that terms shall not be applied to substances where the application would, according to the common acceptation of those terms in the trade, lead the purchaser to assume that he was buying something different from what he was really buying. Section 3, sub-section 1, says that "the use of any . . . word which, according to the custom of the trade, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters," including paragraph (d), as to the material of which any goods are composed, "shall be deemed to be a trade description." Here we have the term "soda crystals" used, which is commonly understood to be a guarantee that the substance is carbonate of soda containing not more than 2 per cent. of the sulphate. And if, as here, the substance contains 18 per cent. or more of the sulphate the application to it of the term soda crystals is to my mind clearly a false trade description. The fact that a description as applied to particular goods is scientifically correct will not prevent it from being a false trade description. And the converse is equally true. Many trade terms are of very old standing, and it may be that with the advance of science some of them will become scientifically incorrect, but proof of that incorrectness will not cause them to be false trade descriptions if they continue to be understood in the trade as indicating the same substances which they did when those terms first came into use.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I agree with the view taken by my brother Wills. If I could come to the conclusion that all that is required to satisfy the statute is to show that the description is chemically true, I think it would be impossible to support this conviction. But I agree with Wills, J., in thinking that that was not the way in which the section was intended to be construed. The clause in section 3, sub-section 1, that the use of any figure, word, or mark which, according to the custom of the trade, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters, shall be deemed to be trade description within the meaning of this Act, in my opinion renders it impossible so to construe the section.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, Neve & Beck.

Solicitor for respondent, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (In Bkcy.). (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L JJ.) And K. B. D. (Bigham and Walton, JJ.). } Nov. 20; Dec. 4, 15.

In re BRINDLEY.
Ex parte TAYLOR & Co. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Petition—Deed of assignment—Acquiescence—Undue pressure—Sufficient cause for refusal of receiving order—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 7, sub-section 3.

A petitioning creditor in bankruptcy, who recognizes that a trustee under a deed of arrangement has a good title and who sells goods to the trustee and is paid by him therefor, is estopped from saying that the deed is a fraud upon creditors and an act of bankruptcy. A clause in a deed of arrangement authorizing the trustee by the direction of the committee of inspection or of the majority of the creditors to pay any creditor in full who does not execute or assent to the deed should not be inserted therein.

Appeal from the registrar of the County Court of Staffordshire holden at Hanley.

On the 7th of September, 1905, the debtor executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors which contained a clause giving a discretion to the trustee, with the assent of the committee of inspection, to pay in full any creditor or creditors who might decline to assent to the deed. On the date of the execution of the deed a circular was sent out informing the creditors of its execution and calling them to a meeting to be held on the 15th of September.

On the 11th of September the petitioning creditors wrote to Messrs. Alcock & Co., the solicitors to the debtor, and also to the trustee under the deed, stating that their claim amounted in all to £694 0*s.* 3d., but that as to two items amounting together to £238 they had serious grounds of complaint against the debtor. They had placed both these items in the hands of their solicitors, and would not consider any arrangement but payment concerning them; but as to the other items in the account they would be prepared to consider anything that was in the best interests of the debtor, and acceptable to the general body of creditors. The letter concluded: "We will not be present at the meeting, and our solicitors have instructions to press the matters in hand."

They also wrote to the debtor to the same effect. When they received from the trustee a report of the proceedings at the meeting they wrote that they had nothing to add to their former letter, and refused to assent to the deed of arrangement. They did, however, sell some timber to the trustee to enable him to carry out a contract of the debtors, and this dealing with the trustee was afterwards alleged, on behalf of the debtor, to amount to an acquiescence in the deed of arrangement.

On the 25th of September they presented a petition founded on the execution of the deed as an act of bankruptcy. Shortly afterwards they heard of the clause in the deed empowering the trustee to pay dissenting creditors in full, and on being asked by the debtor's solicitors to join in the deed of arrangement they wrote to the debtor that they would not take any composition or agree to any assignment unless the two items amounting to £238 were paid in full.

On the 6th of October the petition came on for hearing before the registrar, who dismissed it upon the grounds that the creditors' demand for payment of £238 in full as a condition of agreeing to the deed constituted undue pressure, and that their dealings with the trustee amounted to such acquiescence in the deed as would preclude them from founding a petition upon it. The registrar considered that he was bound by the decisions in In re Shaw, Ex parte Gill, 49 W. R. 264, and In re A Debtor, 53 W. R. 223.

The petitioning creditors appealed.

Nov. 20.—F. E. Smith, for the petitioning creditors, contended that those cases were distinguishable on the facts.

H. Reed, K.C., and B. C. Brough, for the debtor, relied upon the cases referred to by the registrar, and upon In re Hawley, Ex parte Ridgeway, 4 Mans. 41, 45 W. R. Dig. 9.

Judgment was reserved.

Dec. 4.—BIGHAM, J.—My brother Walton will read the judgment of the court.

WALTON, J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the registrar of the county court at Hanley, in Staffordshire, refusing to make a receiving order on a bankruptcy petition that had been presented against the debtor, on the ground that the correspondence between the debtor and the petitioning creditors, and the debtor and the trustee under the deed of arrangement, abundantly showed that the petitioning creditors made every attempt and used every exertion to obtain an undue preference as to payment of part of their debt; and further, that they acquiesced in the assignment within the meaning of the authorities by continuing to trade with the debtor's trustee. The registrar no doubt based his decision on sub-section 3 of section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which enacts that if the court is satisfied that for sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition. Now it is well established that the court will not allow proceedings in bankruptcy to be made use of by a creditor for the purpose of extortion or to obtain some unlawful or inequitable advantage. If, for instance, it is proved on the hearing of a petition that the petitioning creditor has by threats of bankruptcy endeavoured to induce the debtor to give him a secret preference over his other creditors whilst joining with them apparently on equal terms in a composition or deed of arrangement, the petition should be dismissed. This is the effect of the decisions of the court in the cases of In re Shaw, 49 W. R. 264, and In re A Debtor, 53 W. R 223. The registrar thought that the facts of the present case brought it within the rules followed in those cases and dismissed the petition. The facts appear from the correspondence and the question is whether the inferences drawn by the registrar from the correspondence can be supported. On the 7th of September, 1905, the debtor executed a deed of assignment to a trustee for the general benefit of his creditors. The deed contained a clause in the following words: "If the trustee in his own discretion shall think it expedient to do so, or if a committee of inspection shall be appointed by the creditors, then if a majority of such committee shall so direct, it shall be lawful for the trustee to pay in full or otherwise than by dividends under these presents any creditor or creditors who shall decline to execute or assent to these presents." On the same 7th of September a circular was sent by Messrs. Alcock & Co, then acting as the debtor's solicitors, to each of the creditors of the debtor stating that a meeting of creditors was to be held, and that the deed had been executed, and asking each creditor to let them know the amount of the debtor's indebtedness to him, and whether the creditor would be "disposed to agree to the method of dealing with the estate that may commend itself to the majority of the creditors present at the meeting." The petitioning creditors, in answer to this circular, wrote to the debtor's solicitors informing them that the debtor's indebtedness to them amounted altogether to £694 0s. 3d., and stating that as to two items (amounting together to about £238) included in the £694 0s. 3d. they had certain special grounds of complaint against the debtor, and concluding as follows: "Both these items are in the hands of our solicitors, Messrs. Quiggin & Co., and we will not consider any arrangement other than payment concerning them, but for the other items in the account we will be prepared to consider anything that is in the best interests of your client and that may appear acceptable to the general body of creditors. We will not be present at the meeting, and our solicitors have instructions to press the actions they have in hand." The petitioning creditors wrote to the debtor a letter to the same effect. At the meeting of creditors, which the petitioning creditors did not attend, a resolution was passed adopting the deed and providing for the appointment of a committee of inspection. Notice of this was given by circular sent to the creditors, and amongst them to the petitioning creditors, by Messrs. Alcock & Co., who appear to have also acted for the trustee and the committee of inspection. The petitioning creditors wrote in reply that they had nothing to add to their previous letter. Afterwards, on the 18th of September, a Mr. Arrowsmith and a Mr. Edge, friends of the debtor, had an interview with the petitioning creditors, and pressed them to assent to the deed of arrangement. The petitioning creditors, however, refused to enter into any negotiations or arrangement with either the debtor or the other creditors except upon the terms already mentioned. It is admitted that they not only threatened, but at or about this time commenced proceedings in bankruptcy against the debtor. On the 25th of September they appear to have heard for the first time of the clause in the deed which authorized the committee of inspection to pay the debt of any non-assenting creditor in full, if they thought it expedient to do so. They wrote to Mr. Arrowsmith suggesting that the terms upon which they were insisting might be carried out by the committee of inspection under the deed. This letter was handed to Messrs. Alcock & Co., who wrote to the petitioning creditors informing them that they could not advise the committee of inspection to assent to the terms proposed, and in reply the petitioning creditors refused in any way to modify their original requirements, and said that the bankruptcy proceedings would be carried on with due diligence. This completes the story, and I can find in it no indication of any attempt, or design, or intention on the part of the petitioning creditors to defraud or deceive the other creditors or to obtain a preference by any secret or improper means. They had a right to refuse their assent to the deed altogether; there was nothing wrong in itself in refusing their assent except upon the terms that the two items were paid in full; but it would, of course, have been fraudulent for them to have assented to the deed subject to a condition, kept secret from the other creditors, that part of the debt due to them should be paid in full. And if, in fact, they endeavoured by a threat of bankruptcy to induce the debtor to join with them in a scheme by which they should obtain such an unfair and fraudulent advantage over the other creditors, the decision of the registrar is right. It seems to me, however, that there is no evidence that the petitioning creditors intended that the terms upon which they insisted should not be disclosed to the other creditors. On the contrary, it seems to me reasonably clear that they were willing that every one interested should be informed of them. They were standing on their rights and insisting on having a part of their debt at all events paid in full. But there seems to me no evidence that they were attempting to take any undue or improper or inequitable advantage of the other creditors. The second ground upon which the registrar acted was that the petitioning creditors had acquiesced in the deed of arrangement. It seems that, after the deed was executed, they were asked to supply, and did supply or offer to supply, the trustee with some timber for the purpose of the business. This is not necessarily acquiescence in the deed. It is perfectly clear, in my opinion, that they, in fact, did not acquiesce. With all respect to the registrar, I am unable to adopt his construction of the undisputed facts of this case, and I think the appeal must be allowed.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE and HENRY STEPHEN, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

BIGHAM, J.—I have had an opportunity of considering my brother Walton's judgment, and I entirely concur in it. A receiving order will be made against the debtor as of the date when the registrar ought to have made it.

The debtor appealed.

Reed, K.C., and B. C. Brough, for the appellant, cited In re Stray, 15 W. R. 600, (1867) L. R. 2 Ch. 374; In re Goldberg, (1905) 91 L. T. 664; In re Hawley, (1897) 45 W. R. Dig. 9; In re Woodroff, 45 W. R. Dig. 9, (1897) 4 Man. 46.

F. E. Smith and G. H. Rittner, for the petitioning creditor.

Dec. 15.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The principle is that a man, who looks upon a deed as honest and unimpeachable and then takes an advantage under it, is estopped from thereafter saying that the deed was void. In this case the petitioning creditors recognized that the deed conferred a good title on the trustee and in such a manner that they were precluded from saying that it was a fraud upon creditors. They had sold timber to the trustee under the deed and been paid for it by him. In other ways they had also recognized the deed. The appeal must be allowed, and the receiving order should not have been made, for the reason that the petitioning creditors had by their acts so acquiesced in the title of the trustee that they were estopped from saying that it was void.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed. The deed was treated by the petitioning creditors as good.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., concurred. The last clause of the deed, empowering the trustee at his discretion to pay in full any creditor declining to execute or assent thereto, is most improper and might possibly invalidate the deed entirely.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, M. A. Orgill, for Alcock & Abberley, Burslem; Norris, Allens, & Chapman, for J. M. Quiggin & Co., Liverpool.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) July 10, 11, 13, 14, 17, 18, 20-22, 24-26; Aug. 11, 1905.

MERCER AND OTHERS v. DENNE. (a.)

Custom—Validity—Legal origin—Presumption—Right of drying nets on seashore—Character of accreted land — Evidence — Reputation — Depositions — War Office map and chart in possession of Admiralty.

It is a valid custom for fishermen to dry their nets on land situate near the sea in the parish which they inhabit, nor will a modern method of drying invalidate the custom so long as no unreasonable burden is thereby cast on the land. Accreted land is subject to customs binding on the land to which it is accreted. A survey not intended to affect the royal revenues but to serve temporary private purposes is not admissible as a public document, nor is one made by a deceased officer in discharge of his duty, when it is not shown that it was his duty to make it. Maps and plans made by the Board of Ordnance in the seventeenth century are not admissible as public documents nor as evidence of reputation. A chart in the possession of the Admiralty, but not an Admiralty chart, is not admissible.

Judgment of Farwell, J. (53 W. R. 55, [1904] 2 Ch. 534), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Farwell, J. (reported 53 W. R. 55, [1904] 2 Ch. 534).

The facts showed that the plaintiffs, who were fishermen and inhabitants of the parish of Walmer, had been in the habit of using a piece of ground, covered with shingle, situated near the sea, for the purpose of drying their nets by spreading them on its surface, and they claimed to do this by right and custom.

The defendant, who was a landowner in the parish, had denied the custom, and pleaded that the drying had been exercised only by leave and license, and that the ground used for the drying was not foreshore, but that it had been formed by gradual accretion to land of which he was the owner, and therefore belonged to him.

Farwell, J., rejected as evidence of reputation certain evidence tendered by the defendant which consisted of depositions taken upon an information in 1639, some War Office maps, and a chart in the possession of the Admiralty; and held that the custom set up by the plaintiffs was good, and granted the injunction claimed by them.

The defendants appealed.

Levett, K.C., Jenkins, K.C., and J. Gatey, for the appellants, cited Sturla v. Freccia, 5 App. Cas. 623; Price v. Torrington, 1 Salk. 285; Mellor v. Walmesley, 53 W. R. 581, [1905] 2 Ch. 164; Thomas v. Jenkins, 6 Ad. & E. 525; Hammerton v. Honey, 24 W. R. 603; Dyce v. Hay, 1 Macq. 305; Scratton v. Brown, 4 De G. & J. 485; Attorney-General v. Chambers, 4 De G. & J. 55; Foster v. Wright, 4 C. P. D. 438, 28 W. R. Dig. 94.

Upjohn, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the respondents, cited Doe v. Turford, 3 B. & Ad. 890; Chambers v. Bernalson, 1 C. M. & R. 347; Newcastle v. Broxtowe, 4 B. & Ad. 273; Pain v. Patrick, 3 Mod. 289; Fitch v. Rawling, 2 H. Bl. 393; Blundell v. Catterall, 5 B. & A. 268.

July 18.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree with Farwell, J., that the reports relating to Walmer Castle are not admissible in evidence. They are not records affecting the King's property or revenues, nor intended as such. Each of them was to serve a temporary purpose, and in no way affected Crown property, Crown revenues, or Crown grants when the respective purposes were served. None of the documents are admissible as coming within the doctrine of Price v. Earl of Torrington, as explained by Doe v. Turford, and Smith v. Blakey, 15 W. R. 492, L. R. 2 Q. B. 326. There is nothing to show that any of them were contemporaneous with a transaction which it was the duty of the deceased person to record. There is no evidence what the instructions were, or of the relation of those instructions to the document sought to be put in evidence, or of the source of the knowledge or information on which the contents of the report or estimate were based. Those reports were not like the field-book entries made by a deceased surveyor for the purpose of a survey on which he was professionally employed, which this court hold to be admissible in Mellor v. Walmesley, 53 W. R. 581; 1905, 2 Ch. 164. I agree with Farwell, J., that the depositions taken on the information of 1639 are not admissible as evidence of reputation, and also that the War Office maps and the chart in the possession of the Admiralty are not admissible.

STIRLING and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., agreed.

Aug. 11.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a difficult case. Most cases with regard to validity of a custom are difficult of decision. The fact is that reason recoils from the proposition that legal memory goes back to an arbitrary date at the beginning of the reign of Richard I., A.D. 1189, and if one finds proof of uninterrupted modern usage there is a natural inclination to presume the previous existence of the custom right back to 1189, even though the facts may be such as to force upon reason the conclusion that the modern usage could not in fact have been adopted for more than a few generations. Judges, therefore, presume everything possible which would give a custom a legal origin, and find in favour of a manifestly modern custom as being an extension which falls within the reason of so much of the modern usage as may well have existed throughout legal memory. I think that in the present case it is very difficult in reason to arrive at the conclusion at which Farwell, J., seems to have arrived—viz., that the drying of nets after cutching or oiling can be treated as a mere expansion, with the changes which take place in the circumstances of mankind, of the ancient custom of drying nets wet with sea water when taken out of the fishing boats on their return to the shore after fishing. Nor do I think that the validity of the latter custom, established by so many dicta in the books and old cases, is in any sense conclusive of the reasonableness or validity of a custom to dry after cutching or oiling nets in preparation for the user of them in sea fishing. It may be perfectly reasonable in favour of commerce and navigation to invade private property forming part of the beach, because it is so convenient to dry the nets wet and heavy with sea water on the nearest part of the beach suitable for such a purpose, since it is difficult to see how in many parts of the coast where cliffs or other causes make the inland difficult of access, sea fishing by nets could be carried on otherwise. But it by no means follows that it is reasonable in favour of commerce and navigation to bring from the land behind the beach nets which have been cutched or oiled at some inland spot and dry them on a part of the beach which is private property. The drying, at all events after oiling, burdens the land with the nets for a much longer period than the drying of the nets after being wetted with sea fishing does. But this difficulty arises: If the court treats the drying of the nets after oiling as a usage or custom to be tested as to reasonableness or unreasonableness, or whether or not it is contrary to the public good, or injurious or prejudicial to the many, the court will clearly be dealing with a modern usage arising within living memory. I am not at all sure that the proper inference to draw from the evidence and from the user of the word "cutching" (derived from "cutch," an astringent plant of great astringent power, imported in great quantities from the Malay Archipelago, which, as far as the evidence goes, seems to be still used to prepare and preserve the nets for fishing) is not that the process of cutching did not begin in the eighteenth or nineteenth century. But perhaps the court may assume without evidence that some process of tanning nets before using them for sea-fishing has prevailed ever since the date of legal memory. Of course, if these customs are to be treated otherwise than as the expansion of the old custom, the custom relied on by the plaintiffs could not be supported. But I have persuaded myself that the court may regard the custom (as Cozens-Hardy, L.J., says in his judgment) as a custom for fishermen "to dry nets at all times necessary or proper for the purposes of the trade or business of a fisherman," and the modern usage of drying after cutching or oiling as a development of an ancient custom to do all the drying necessary or proper for the trade or business of a fisherman on the beach, and may so regard the custom, notwithstanding the increase of the burden on the land resulting from the modern user. As to the contentions of the defendant based on the recession of the sea and usage of a part of the beach, now free of sea but formerly covered by sea-water, not raising a custom in respect of the land gained by the gradual and, as it proceeded, imperceptible recession of the sea, I think those contentions fail entirely, for the reasons given in the judgments of my brothers, which I have had the advantage of reading. But I wish to add this, that I think there is evidence in this case to show that the practice of drying nets has really in time gone by extended to any convenient places on the sea-shore, and not only to the eleven acres of land in question, although of late years the shingle beach, of which the eleven acres consists, has afforded the most convenient spot for drying after oiling and cutching, and has, therefore, come to be freer of weeds and vegetable growth than other parts where the beach adjacent to Walmer happens to be shingly. Moreover, it seems to me that the right of drying nets must have always been exercised on the shingly ground which happened for the time being to be nearest to the foreshore and yet generally free from overflowing by the sea at high tides. If this view were taken of the evidence the result would be that the drying would, by following the receding sea, always take place on the part of the beach convenient for drying nets next to the sea. This part of the beach, although covered by the sea in times gone by, would, on the principles which the court has recognized in respect of land gained by accretion, be subject to the custom in favour of drying nets, and the area subject to the custom would always be adjacent to the sea. Take the beach which is now nearest to the old Cinque Port of Rye, which is now miles away from the port, though the sea formerly was immediately adjacent, it would be difficult to my mind to avoid the conclusion that the drying area must in such a case follow the sea. The custom began at the boundary between beach and sea. As the sea imperceptibly retires the law does not recognize any alteration in the land owned, or that there are new boundaries further away from the centre of the close, and, on the same principle, the area of drying would always be adjacent to the boundary for the time being between the beach and the sea. Such a custom would obviously be more reasonable than that which we are supporting. But neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant put forward at the trial or since this view of the custom. On the contrary, when I suggested it during the argument, both sides rejected it. This being so, I do not think it ought to be taken into consideration in this case. The result is that I agree with the rest of the court that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, L.J.—In this case the plaintiffs, on behalf of themselves and all other persons carrying on the trade of fishermen in the parish of Walmer, claim a customary right to dry their nets over a piece of ground (called the "beach ground"), which is covered with shingle, and is situate near the sea, and lies between the grounds of a house known as Walmer Place on the north, the grounds of Walmer Castle on the south, a public road called Wellington-road on the west, and the foreshore on the east, and containing at the present time about eleven acres. The evidence of living witnesses shows that for a period extending over seventy years, and by reputation for many years earlier, the inhabitants of Walmer who are fishermen have used so much of this piece of land as was not for the time being covered by the sea for the purpose of drying their nets in the following way: Down to a period of from twenty-five to thirty-five years ago, immediately before the commencement of the mackerel and herring fisheries respectively, the nets intended for use in those fisheries were tanned or cutched and brought to the beach ground and there dried; and, at the close of each of these seasons the same nets were again brought there and dried before being put away until next required. From twenty-five to thirty-five years ago the practice of tanning or cutching nets was discontinued, and in lieu thereof the nets were oiled, and the oiled nets were taken to the beach ground and dried there in the same way as the cutched or tanned nets had previously been. As I read the evidence, sprat-nets were never taken there at all until the introduction of oiling; but from that period the sprat-nets, being oiled, have been taken there and dried. This user has extended over the whole eleven acres, except where they were for the time being covered by the sea. It was admitted in this court (and, in my opinion, rightly) that a custom for fishermen to dry nets, which had become wetted by use in fishing, on a particular piece of land was good; but it was said that a custom to dry nets, which had not been wetted by the sea, but only in the process of tanning, cutching, or oiling preparatory to use for fishing, was bad; and that, as the evidence showed that the alleged custom extended to that drying no less than to drying at the end of the several fishing seasons, the alleged custom was bad in toto. Now the ground on which the custom to dry nets in the strict sense has been upheld is that it is in favour of commerce and navigation—Bacon's Abridgment (vol. 2) p. 566—and see what is said by Tindal, L.C.J., in Tyson v. Smith, 9 A. & E. 421. The tanning, cutching, or oiling of nets belonging to fishermen tends to preserve the nets and make them useful for a longer period, and the subsequent drying of nets seems to me to fall within the reasons thus assigned for the custom. It is laid down by Holt, C.J., in City of London v. Vanacre, 12 Mod., p. 271, that general customs may be extended to new things which are within the reasons of those customs. There is not, in my opinion, evidence from which it ought to be inferred that the practice of tanning or cutching has arisen within the time of legal memory. But it was said that, so far as related to the drying after oiling, the user extended over a period of from twenty-five to thirty-five years only; and moreover, that this user was more burdensome than the old user for drying after tanning or cutching. I think, however, that the law as laid down by Lord St. Leonards in Dyce v. Hay, 1 Macq. 312, cited by Farwell, J., applies, and that those entitled to the benefit of a custom ought not to be deprived of that benefit simply because they take advantage of modern inventions or new operations, so long as they do not thereby throw an unreasonable burden on the landowner. The evidence does not convince me that an unreasonable burden has been cast on the owner. The practice has been in existence for twenty-five years at least, without any objection being raised until the land recently passed into the hands of the defendant, although, during the greater part of that time, the property belonged to one who seems to have stood on his rights, and objected to anything which went beyond the custom as stated: see the evidence of the defendant's witness, William Thomas Hoyle. It is next said that a considerable portion of the "beach ground" consists of an accretion during the last fifty or sixty years, and that the custom cannot extend to that part. Custom, it is argued, is a local law, which must have existed from time immemorial—that is, from the beginning of the reign of Richard I.—and cannot be applicable to land which can be shown to have emerged from the sea in modern times. In The King v. Lord Yarborough, 2 Bligh N. S. 147, it was established that lands found by allusion—that is, gradual and imperceptible deposit, on the shore of the sea, belonged, not to the Crown as owner of the foreshore, but to the owner of the demesne lands of a manor, which were formerly bounded by the sea, as parcel of those demesne lands. Every manor must have existed prior to the statute of Quia Emptores; but it was not suggested that the operation of the rule was excluded by reason of the accretions having taken place in modern times. The reason of that rule is stated by Baron Alderson in In re Hull and Selby Railway Co., 5 M. & W. 327, to be "that which cannot be perceived in progress is taken to be as if it never had existed at all." This was approved by Lord Chelmsford in Attorney-General v. Chambers, 4 De G. & J. 68, and has been applied in the present case by Farwell, J., who held that this accretion is to be treated as though it had occurred in 1186. It was insisted, however, that the doctrine of accretion is a rule of property law, and has nothing to do with custom, which is truly described as a local law. No authority was cited in support of this contention, and I am unable to agree with it. The local law points out the particular piece of land on which the right is to be exercised; and then the rule of the common law steps in and says that, where imperceptible accretion has occurred, the piece of land is to be treated as having been as it is from the commencement of legal memory. Lastly, it was urged that other lands in the neighbourhood of Walmer were subject to the same custom, and that the whole burden was being thrown on the defendant's land. The evidence does not appear to me to show with certainty that there are other lands subject to the custom; but, even if it were otherwise, all that the defendant would have to complain of would be an excessive use of his land, and this would not deprive the plaintiffs of the right to a reasonable use of the beach. I am, therefore, unable to differ from Farwell, J., and I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Farwell, J.'s, establishing the right of the fishermen of Walmer to dry their nets on some land known as the "beach ground," the property of the defendant. I might content myself with saying that I agree, not only with the judgment, but also with the reasoning upon which that judgment is based. The only exception or qualification I should make is, that, after the advice we have received from the officer sent by the Admiralty to assist us, I do not interpret Spence's chart of 1795 in the manner which, upon the expert evidence at the trial, Farwell, J., adopted. This, however, is not really of importance. The scale is so small that no safe inference can be drawn as to the precise line of high water at the spot in question in 1795. And, even if the sea has been steadily receding from 1795 to the present time, the result will not be affected, as pointed out by Farwell, J., when dealing with the law of accretion. Having regard, however, to the elaborate arguments addressed to us, and to the great importance of the case, I think it right to state in my own words, and as briefly as may be, why I think the appeal should be dismissed. The right asserted is based upon a custom extending beyond legal memory. Such a custom is often spoken of as a local law. Mr. Levett did not dispute, and in fact admitted, that a custom for the fishermen of a particular locality to dry their nets on the land of a stranger may be supported in law, though there is no actual decision to that effect. But, having regard to the numerous dicta referred to by Farwell, J., I feel no doubt that his decision on this point was correct. The persons, if any, entitled to the customary right are sufficiently ascertained—viz., the fishermen of Walmer. The real contest has raged over two points—viz. (a) over what land does the customary right extend, and (b) what is the extent of the right pleaded and how far its existence is justified by the evidence. (a) It is contended that the "local law" can only affect a definite close, which must have been available for the exercise of the customary right in the reign of Richard I., and that the evidence shows that a considerable part of the "beach ground," now eleven acres in extent, was at that time covered by the sea, and therefore could not have been used for drying nets. In my opinion this contention ought not to prevail. It appears certain, from the evidence of geologists and from the discovery of Romain remains immediately to the west of the "beach ground," that at least the western part of the "beach ground" existed in and long prior to the reign of Richard I. in substantially the same condition as at present. Within living memory the sea has gradually receded on this part of the coast, but there is nothing improbable in the suggestion that the reverse process may have gone on since the reign of Richard I., with the result that the line of high water is now practically the same as at that date, in which case the point under discussion would not arise. Assuming, however, that the sea has gradually and continuously receded, I think the land which has been added by accretion to the defendant's land must be subject to the customary right. The principle stated by Baron Alderson in In re Hull and Selby Railway Co, that "that which cannot be perceived in its progress is taken to be as if it had never existed at all"—a principle which is applied between two private owners, and between the Crown and a private owner—should be applied here. In the view of the law this is the same close as that affected by the local law in the time of Richard I. It is urged that this extension of area renders the custom uncertain, and, if the sea should still further recede, unreasonable. But I cannot assent to the argument. It must not be forgotten that the persons claiming under the custom are bound to exercise their rights reasonably and with due regard to the interest of the owner of the soil. (b) It remains to consider what is the custom pleaded, and how far it is supported by evidence. The custom pleaded is for the fishermen of Walmer at all times necessary or proper for the purposes of the trade or business of a fisherman to dry their nets upon the "beach ground," and for that purpose to spread those nets upon the surface thereof. The evidence proves that, so far as living memory goes, and by reputation prior to living memory, the "beach ground" has been used (1) for drying nets after fishing when wet with sea water, the nets being either taken from boats immediately in front of the "beach ground" or brought in carts from some more convenient landing place; (2) for drying nets which have been "cutched" in order to render them more fit for use, the nets being brought in carts from the place where the cutching process has been performed, and taken away when dry, so as to be ready for the fishing season. I think it probable that the dicta which recognize the validity of a custom to dry nets had reference only to drying nets after they have been used for fishing, and not to drying nets in preparation for fishing, though I do not feel certain of this. But every argument used to support the former seems to me equally valid to support the latter. It is equally "in favour of fishing and navigation." "Cutching" is merely another name for, and is equivalent to, tanning. What are the pricise ingredients put into the cutch-pot is nowhere explained. I see no ground for inferring that it is a comparatively modern process because "cutch" is a material used for tanning and imported from the Malay Archipelago. There is nothing to lead me to doubt that tanning nets in preparation for fishing is an ancient process, and if so it cannot be seriously urged that the fishermen are bound to use only tanning materials known in the reign of Richard I. and that by substituting "cutch"—if in truth they have substituted it—they have lost their right. Or, to put the proposition in another and perhaps more accurate way, I think the proved usage of cutching nets is sufficient evidence of a custom to dry nets treated with suitable materials in preparation for fishing. This brings me to the third branch of the usage proved. About thirty or thirty-five years ago it was found desirable to oil herring nets instead of cutching them. This change was probably due to the use of cotton, instead of flax or hemp, as the material from which herring nets are made. Since that date cutching has been applied only to mackerel nets. In my view this falls within the same principle. It is nothing more than the application of a new and improved method of securing the former result. It is consistent with and supported by the older usage. I have not overlooked the argument that oiling imposes a greater burden on the land, as the nets take longer to dry. But, unless I am prepared to confine the fishermen to the precise methods adopted tempore Richard I., I cannot yield to this argument. The illustration given by Farwell, J., of the game of cricket, which was justified in Fitch v. Rawling, 2 H. Bl. 393, although cricket was not known in the reign of Richard I., is much in point. It follows that, in my opinion, the custom as pleaded is sufficiently established by the evidence—viz., a custom to dry nets at all times necessary or proper (whether before or after the fishing season) for the purposes of the trade or business of a fisherman. If I had not taken the view of the evidence which I have indicated I should have desired time to consider whether section 2 of the Prescription Act does not apply. Farwell, J., necessarily held himself bound by Shuttleworth v. Le Fleming, 19 C. B. N. S. 687, and Mounsey v. Ismay, 3 H. & C 486. In those cases the Court of Common Pleas and the Court of Exchequer held that the Prescription Act applies only to easements strictly so called, where there is a dominant tenement and a servient tenement, and does not apply to a customary right claimed by inhabitants of a particular district, although the word "custom" is found in the section. Those cases are open to review in this court, but I do not think it necessary on the present occasion to express any opinion upon the important point there decided.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellants, Bower, Cotton, & Bower, for Mowll & Mowll, Dover.

Solicitors for respondents, Hare & Co., for F. W. Hardman, Deal.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Jan. 19, 23, 30.

In re BOSWELL.
MERRITT v. BOSWELL (a.)

Limitations, Statutes of—Solicitor's costs—Part payment—Retainer of moneys due to client.

Where a debtor owes a creditor several debts, some of which are statute-barred and some of which are not, and pays a sum without appropriating it to any particular debt, or the creditor retains moneys which he has collected on behalf of the debtor, no promise to pay the statute-barred debts can be inferred.

Waugh v. Cope, 6 M. & W. 824, followed.

Adjourned summons.

This was a claim brought in by a creditor on taking the accounts in a creditor's administration action commenced by originating summons on the 5th of August, 1904, in which the usual judgment was made on the 14th of November, 1904.

The testator was James Freeman Boswell, one of the plaintiffs in the prolonged and costly litigation known as Boswell v. Coaks. The claimant, Mr. Emerson, acted as the solicitor for the plaintiffs in that case, and he also acted as the solicitor for the testator in other matters until the date of the testator's death.

After the death of the testator the claimant brought in a claim for over £5,000 due on three bills of costs in relation to these various matters. It was admitted that nearly the whole of this claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations, unless certain alleged part payments took the claim out of the statute. These alleged part payments were as follows:

On the 1st of January, 1896, the testator made a payment to the claimant of the sum of £20.

In December, 1897, the testator owed certain moneys for which he had given security. The claimant, on behalf of the testator, obtained a larger loan on the same security, paid off the original creditors, and retained the balance, £63, on account, with the assent of the testator.

In January, 1902, the claimant, on behalf of the testator, recovered a small sum of money, and when his costs were paid there remained a balance of £2 4s. 2d. This amount the claimant, with the testator's assent, placed to his credit.

In September, 1902, on the death of a Mr. Greenwood, the claimant received from an insurance office the sum of £400 due on a policy on Mr. Greenwood's life, to which the testator was entitled, subject to a mortgage. After discharging the mortgage and making certain payments, the claimant retained the balance, £43 6s. 8d., with the assent of the testator.

The next transaction was in regard to a payment by a third party. Boswell v. Coaks was an action for the benefit of certain creditors, of whom Lord Walsingham was one, and in 1904 Lord Walsingham paid the claimant the sum of £20 as a contribution to the costs of that action.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Christopher James, for the claimant.—These payments kept alive the debts not statute-barred at the dates on which they were paid. The payment on the 1st of January, 1896, kept them alive until the 1st of January, 1902. There were payments again in 1897 which would go beyond 1902, and there were again payments in 1902: In re Friend, Friend v. Young, 46 W. R. 139, [1897] 2 Ch. 421; Cleave v. Jones, 6 Exch 573; and Thomas v. Cross, 7 Exch. 733.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Galbraith, for the plaintiffs in the administration action.—Payments without accounts stated do not keep alive a debt against the statute: Waugh v. Cope, 6 M. & W. 824; Nash v. Hodgson, 3 W. R. 590, 6 D M. & G. 474; and Mills v. Fawkes, 5 Bing. N. C. 455.

Armitage, for the defendants, the executors.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving a considered judgment, said: The general principle of the law, in respect of the doctrine that the effect of the statute may be avoided by part payment of principal or by part payment of interest, is stated in Darby and Bosanquet's book on the Statute of Limitations, p. 107, as follows: "The principle of this doctrine is that any such payment is an acknowledgment of the existence of the debt, and from it the law raises an implication of a promise to pay the residue or the principal, as the case may be, just as it does from a simple acknowledgment in writing." On the 1st of January, 1896, when a large portion of Mr. Emerson's claim was already statute-barred, but a large portion was not, Mr. Emerson pressed for a substantial payment on account of his costs, but the testator declared his inability to find at the moment more than £20, which sum was accordingly paid. This must be taken to have been an acknowledgment by the testator that more than £20 was due, and that from such acknowledgment there ought to be inferred a promise to pay. But what did the testator promise to pay—the whole balance or only so much of it as was not then statute-barred? According to the authorities the promise was only to pay so much as was not then statute-barred, the rule being that in order to give the payment a more extensive operation it must be shown to have been made expressly on account of the statute-barred debt. In respect to the item of £63 Mr. Emerson seeks to treat it as a payment by the testator from which a promise to pay ought to be inferred. There was nothing in the evidence to support the conclusion that this money was expressly devoted to any statute-barred debt, and it follows that if any promise to pay could be inferred that promise would extend only to so much of the debt as was not statute-barred. Even that ought not to be inferred. The testator, knowing that some balance was due to him on the completion of the transaction, assented to that balance being retained by Mr. Emerson, who, he knew, had claims against him, and he may have used some such expression as "Put the money to my credit or to my account." That is not enough. The circumstances of Waugh v. Cope, 6 M. & W. 824, were very like those now under consideration, and the entire judgment of the court, as reported on p. 829, is directly applicable to this case. The same result was expressed by Parke, B., in Thomas v. Cross. The £63 cannot, therefore, be properly treated as having been paid at all in the sense in which the word "paid" is used in this branch of the law. The evidence in regard to the retainer of £2 4s. 2d. is similar to that respecting the sum of £63, and the observations on the latter sum apply to this also. The same remarks apply to the transaction in regard to the insurance policy on Mr. Greenwood's life. With respect to the payment by Lord Walsingham, he recognized a moral obligation to contribute to the costs of the litigation in Boswell v. Coaks, and ultimately, after some correspondence, he sent a cheque for £20 to Mr. Emerson. No doubt to this extent the testator's liability to Mr. Emerson was reduced, but Lord Walsingham did not make the payment on account of the testator or in part payment of his debt, but in recognition of the moral obligation. In no sense can the payment be treated as one by the testator from which a promise to pay the balance of his debt can be inferred against him.

The result is that nothing has been done to take out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations the debts which were barred at the date of the judgment. This does not cover the whole of the debts, and there are a few items in respect of which Mr. Emerson is entitled to prove. He will be admitted a creditor for these sums, and be allowed such costs in respect thereof as the master thinks fit. He must pay the costs of the adjournment into court, but there will be no order as to the costs of the claim in chambers except that the parties opposing will be allowed theirs in the ordinary course out of the estate.

Solicitors, Whites & Co., for Emerson; C. G. Scott for the plaintiffs and defendants.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Jan. 29, 30; Feb. 5.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &C., OF MANCHESTER. (a.)

Corporation—Municipal corporation—Statutory powers—Tramway business—Common carrier—Incidental powers—Ultrà vires—General Tramway Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78)—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 86—Manchester Southern Tramways Act, 1903 (3 Ed. 7, c. cxciii.)—Manchester Corporation Tramways Act, 1889 (62 & 63 Vict. c. cclv.).

The defendants were incorporated by Royal Charter and subject to the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. The Manchester Corporation Tramways Act, 1899, enabled the Manchester Corporation to run carriages and take tolls on all the network of tramways mentioned therein, and to use such tramways for the purpose of carrying passengers and of conveying and delivering animals, goods, minerals, and parcels.

Held, it was not ultrà vires for the corporation to deliver by cart or otherwise at the consignee's house or to any other place authorized by him, including the station of a railway company, such goods as they have brought on their tram lines, such delivery being fairly incidental to their authorized business. There was nothing in the Acts relating to the Manchester Corporation which authorized them to act as carriers generally without reference to their tramways. The defendants were not entitled to expend money for the purpose of establishing or maintaining or carrying on the business of carriers, except as part of or in connection with their tramway undertaking, and in respect of articles carried along all or part of the tramways.

Action.

This action was brought by the Attorney-General on the relation of Thomas Watson, against the Corporation of Manchester. The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from acting as carriers or delivery agents, excepting on their tramways, and from expending any of the corporate moneys for that purpose.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts of the case are set forth in the judgment of Farwell, J.

Upjohn, K.C., Montague Lush, K.C., and Rowlatt, for the plaintiff.

Balfour Browne, K.C., Macmerran, K.C., and Hugh Moulton, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This is an action by the Attorney-General on the relation of a ratepayer against the Corporation of Manchester claiming, in effect, an injunction to restrain the defendants from acting as carriers or delivery agents, excepting on their tramways, and from expending any of the corporate moneys for that purpose, and for incidental declarations. The defendants were incorporated by Royal Charter dated the 23rd of October, 1839, and they justify the acts complained of both under the powers given to them by their private statutes and also under their common law rights and powers as a corporation by charter, and they claim the right to act generally as common carriers. The action is to a great extent quia timet, for the defendants commenced operations last year, and the writ was issued on the 5th of May, 1905. The defendants have called no evidence to show what business is actually done by them, and their acts and intentions are gathered from the documents put in evidence and their admissions and answers to interrogatories. Their intention is to put in operation a large and comprehensive scheme of parcels delivery and collection, and, as part of this scheme, they propose to accept "cash on delivery" parcels—i.e., parcels where the value thereof is to be collected by them on delivery, and subsequently handed to the senders; "express delivery"—i.e., parcels to be delivered by special messengers at special rates; and "to insure" parcels. They also propose to act as agents for all railway companies for the receipt of parcels, and to pay to the companies monthly all moneys due to them for the carriage of parcels in consideration of a payment to the corporation of a penny per parcel for collection. They propose also to collect and deliver parcels outside the radius of their tramway lines altogether, between places having no connection with their trams; and to collect and deliver goods which have never travelled, and are not intended to travel, by their trams at all. In April, 1905, they issued a book of rates and arrangements for the conveyance of parcels traffic from Manchester to all parts of the United Kingdom and abroad, and described themselves as agents for all railway companies, and they have spent several thousand pounds in plant, vans, and horses, and have engaged numerous agents and servants with a view to carrying on this business. All that expenditure has been or is intended to be entered in account and dealt with as part of the expenditure of the corporation in respect of their tramway undertaking, as part of the working and establishment expenses, and as part of the management of the tramway, &c. All the expenditure at present incurred in providing horses, vans, carts, stables, offices, and agencies used and to be used in connection with collecting, carriage, and delivery of parcels has been defrayed out of money borrowed by the tramway undertaking or capital applicable thereto. The charges for the services so proposed to be rendered will in many cases be in excess of the maximum charges authorized for the use of the tramways when the tramways are used, and in cases when the tramways are not used will be made without statutory authority.

Now the difference between a statutory corporation and a corporation incorporated by Royal Charter is well settled; the former can do such acts only as are authorized directly or indirectly by the statute creating it; the latter (speaking generally) can do everything that an ordinary individual can do. If, however, the corporation by charter be (as are the defendants) a municipal corporation, then they are subject to the restrictions imposed by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and will be restrained from applying their borough funds to purposes not authorized by that Act: Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Newcastle, 23 Q. B. D. 492, 38 W. R. Dig. 139. If the defendants in this case had no statutory powers, it is plain that they could not apply their borough fund either for the purposes of the tramways or of the business of general delivery agents or common carriers. Granting that theoretically a corporation by charter could lawfully run tramways or carry on such a business, they could not do so in practice without the expenditure of money, and it is accordingly argued in the present case that, if and so far as the defendants are carrying on business as carriers in excess of their statutory powers, they are doing so under their common law powers, and that the expense of such excess adds nothing to the expenses incurred in respect of the exercise of the statutory powers, and, therefore, cannot be restrained.

I will first consider the statutory powers of the defendants. Under the General Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), a local authority was authorized to acquire possession of a tramway, but, if they did so, could only lease it to a third person or allow it to be used by the public in respect of tolls; nothing in the Act authorized any local authority to place or run carriages upon such tramway and to demand and to take tolls and charges in respect of the use of such carriages (section 19). By a provisional order confirmed by an Act of 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. clxvii.), the defendants obtained powers (section 6) to construct and maintain the tramway therein described with all proper rails, plates, offices, weighbridges, stables, carriage-houses, warehouses, works, and conveniences connected therewith and for the purposes thereof and to work and use the same. Section 14 provides: "The tramways may be used for the purpose of conveying passengers, animals, goods, minerals, and parcels." Section 16 provides, under the head of tolls: "The promoters may demand and take for every passenger travelling upon any of the tramways or any part thereof and tolls or charges not exceeding one penny per mile (and for this purpose the fraction of a mile beyond an integral number of miles shall be deemed a mile), but the promoters may charge for any less distance than three miles any sum not exceeding 3d." Section 17: "The promoters may demand and take for all animals, goods, minerals, and parcels conveyed upon the tramways any tolls not exceeding the rates per mile specific in the schedule to this order annexed." Section 18: "If the promoters under the authority of the Tramways Act, 1870, demise the rights of user of the tramways and of demanding and taking in respect of the same tolls and charges authorized by this order, such tolls and charges shall include all charges which may be made for the use of the tramways and of carriages and for motive power and every other incidental expense"; and then a list of tolls is appended. It will be observed that if the corporation demise the right to use the tramways, reference is made to incidental expenses which is not to be found in section 16; and in the Provisional Order of 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. clxiii.), sections 14 to 18, the tramways being then in lease, a similar provision is inserted, and in clause 18 certain tolls and charges are authorized, and it is enacted that "such tolls or charges shall include all tolls and charges which may be taken or made for the use of the tramways and of carriages, wagons, or trucks, and for motive power, and every other expense incidental to such conveyance." Whatever may have been the reason for this distinction between the corporation and its lessees, the Manchester Corporation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. ccxli.), s. 20, clearly contemplates the working of the tramways by the corporation itself. It is common knowledge that by this time municipalities had in many cases been authorized to acquire works of a public nature within their boundaries with a view to working them at a profit. It is no part of the function of this court to consider whether municipal trading of this or any other kind is or is not politic; my duty is confined to construing the Acts by which the Legislature has conferred that power, and I know of nothing that would authorize me to apply principles of construction to an Act giving power to a municipality to carry on some trading operations differing from those applicable to an Act giving similar powers to any other corporate body. The next Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. ccliv.), is that on which the defendants mainly rely. It recites "and whereas it would be of public and local advantage if the tramways within the city were worked in connection with those in the adjoining neighbouring districts, and it is, therefore, expedient that the corporation should be empowered to take leases of and to work such last-mentioned tramways, and that further facilities as by this Act provided should be afforded for the working of tramways within and beyond the city," and then it defines in section 2—"'City tramway' means any tramway for the time being within the city; 'outside tramway' means 'any tramway for the time being in any district adjoining or near to or connected by tramway with the city'; 'tramway undertaking' includes 'any tramway for the time being in lease to the corporation and all rights and powers of the corporation over or in respect of 'outside tramway.'" Section 8 provides, "Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the Tramways Act, 1870, or in any other Act or order the corporation may place and run carriages on and may work any tramways for the time being belonging or in lease to the corporation or on which they may have any powers to place or run carriages, and whether within or beyond the city, and may take and demand tolls and charges in respect of such tramways and of the use of carriages thereon, and the corporation may reconstruct or alter such tramways and may provide all such buildings, cars, rolling-stock, engines, machinery, electric and other plant, apparatus, and appliances, horses, and stables, as they may deem requisite or convenient for the working or user by the corporation of such tramways by animal or mechanical power, and may sell or dispose of or exchange such of the before-mentioned articles and things as from time to time may no longer be required"; and section 22 provides, "Notwithstanding anything contained in any other Act or order relating to any tramways for the time being belonging or in lease to the corporation or on which they have power to place or run carriages, such tramways may be used for the purpose of conveying and delivering animals, goods, minerals, or parcels, provided always that the corporation shall not be under any obligation to carry on the tramways unless they think fit any animals, goods, minerals, or parcels except that every passenger travelling" may take 28lb. weight with him; and section 24 provides that, "subject to the provisions of this Act, part of section 18 and the schedule of the Manchester Corporation Tramways Order, 1878, shall apply to and in respect of the city tramways and outside tramways for the time being belonging or in lease to the corporation or on which the corporation have power to place or run carriages," and the provisions of section 18 as to tolls and charges for goods and parcels, and so on, are similar to those in the Manchester Corporation Tramways Order, 1875, above mentioned.

This Act, in my opinion, enables the corporation to run carriages and take tolls on all the network of tramways mentioned therein, and to use such tramways for the purpose of carrying passengers and of conveying and delivering animals, goods, minerals, and parcels. Mr. Upjohn pressed upon me that there is no power to carry or deliver, but merely a power to use the tramway for the purpose of carrying and delivering, but this appears to me too narrow a ground on which to found a decision. I refer to the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 86, and I find that there is no power to carry generally thereby conferred, but a power to "carry and convey upon the railway all such passengers, goods," &c. I am unable to see any real distinction between this and the power given to the corporation by sections 8 and 22 of the Act of 1899. But a railway company acting (as all railway companies now elect to act and as the defendants act) as carriers, and not as either toll takers or conveyers (see Wills, J.'s, judgment in Hall v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., 15 Q. B. D. 537), have undertaken the ordinary duties of a carrier, as Byles, J., put it in Taylor v. Great Northern Railway, 14 W. R. 639, L. R. 1 C. P. 385: "The first duty of a common carrier is to carry the goods safely; the second is to deliver them." This duty to deliver would exist without the express use of the word in section 22, and I cannot read that section as restricting the corporation to delivery from the trams. In the absence of custom or of special contract, I apprehend that a railway company is not bound to deliver at the house or shop of the consignee, but, if they do not, they are bound to keep the goods safely for a reasonable time and to deliver to the consignee or his agent when he calls for them. But there is nothing ultra vires in their delivering by cart or otherwise at the consignee's house or to any other place authorized by him, including the station of a railway company, such goods as they have brought on their tram lines; such delivery is fairly incidental to their authorized business. As Lord Halsbury puts it in Sowerby v. Great Northern Railway, 7 R. & C. Cases, at p. 170, "They (that is, the Great Northern Railway) are permitted by law to carry on the business not only along their line, but also in connection with it and as part of the same general undertaking by which they make profit—the business of distributing the goods which they so bring from distant points to the places where the different consignees intend they shall be delivered. For that purpose they have to build stations, both for the receipt and for the dispatch of goods which are so entrusted to them." It would be difficult in the present case to put any practical limit to the place of delivery. It cannot be at the terminus only—this is probably in the middle of the highway—some radius of space within which a receiving store may be situate must be allowed, and some means of conveying to this store must be permitted. There is no ground for confining it to manual labour; indeed, the weights mentioned in the schedule of tolls negative this; it must, therefore, be open to the defendants to use horses and carts even to get the goods to their own depôt, and, if they can do this, I see no reason why they should not be allowed to convey them to the consignee's address or some other place named by him. So far, therefore, as the expenditure complained of arises out of the working of their tramway undertaking, as explained above, I can see no objection to it. The defendants are empowered to build goods stations for the reception and for the delivery of goods; to provide and pay for carts and horses and the like for collection and distribution, and to pay wages to men employed for those purposes; to provide buildings to house the horses and carts so used; to receive and transmit goods by rail, and to insure; for inasmuch as a common carrier is an insurer of the goods entrusted to him at common law, it must be open to the defendants to make a bargain limiting such liability or undertaking it on special terms.

So far as regards "cash on delivery goods" I have no evidence that this is part of the business of a common carrier, and I can only say that if it is, then the corporation can accept goods for carriage and delivery on their trams on those terms. But this is all restricted to goods which travel along the trams, or some part thereof; there is nothing in the Acts to authorize the corporation to act as carriers generally without reference to their tramways. The question, as is pointed out in Attorney-General v. London County Council, [1901] 1 Ch. 781, 49 W. R. Dig. 97, is not whether the business can be conveniently or advantageously conducted with the tramway business, but whether it is by necessary implication incidental or accessory to it, and I think that it is not. To collect and deliver parcels for the tramway is fairly incidental; to collect and deliver parcels outside the radius of the trams, and without any connection with the trams, is not incidental to the tram business, but distinct from it. At the best it could only be said to be incidental to the incidental, and such reasoning would authorize a railway company to carry on a coal merchant's business, because they must buy coal, and this was restrained in Attorney-General v. Great Northern Railway, 8 W. R. 556, 29 L. J. Ch. 794. For the same reasons I hold that the corporation cannot act as general agents for the railway companies, but only in respect of tram-borne goods. The defendants, however, further contend, and I think rightly, that the corporation can so act by virtue of its corporate existence, and that this court will only interfere to prevent the expenditure of the borough funds on such a venture; but they say also that there is nothing to show that they have made any such expenditure. I have, however, already stated that they threaten and intend to do so, and I am not satisfied that they have not already done so. It is obvious that a delivery service by carts to and from villages not connected with the company, and a general agency for all railway companies, must entail expense, even if the same carts and men be used as are employed ordinarily in tram service proper; some of both are required, and there is wear and tear to be considered; the horse that delivered tram-borne parcels only might last for years, while the journeys between outside villages might break him down in a twelvemonth. I cannot believe that a large general delivery service and a general railway agency can be added to a service limited to the connection with trams without expense. No evidence has been given of the amount of such expenditure, but the plaintiff is, in my opinion, entitled to an account at his own risk of all sums so expended.

I have said nothing so far as to the charges which the corporation make for the services rendered by them in addition to the sums allowed by their Acts, and I do not think it is proper that I should express any opinion as to their legality in this action. The Attorney-General sues on the relation of a ratepayer to restrain the improper use of the borough fund; these charges when received are an increase to the borough fund; if any one can complain, it is the person against whom they are made; the relator profits by them. If they are wrongfully made, and litigation ensues, it is not a matter of course that the costs if the corporation fail, would be allowed out of the borough fund; but, however that may be, the question of their legality appears to me to be one of some difficulty, and I am not aware of any authority which would justify me in preventing the corporation from receiving payments simply because it may be doubtful whether they are properly recoverable or not. An individual can make such charges and receive them; if they are wrongfully made, he may be liable to an action. The corporation as a chartered corporation may do the same; there is no depletion of corporate funds by such receipt; whether or not there will be when the payments are successfully reclaimed I will leave to be dealt with when the question arises. Reference was made to the Manchester Southern Tramways Act, 1903 (3 Ed. 7, c. cxciii.), but no facts were proved to show that it had any operation, and I cannot read section 87, subsection 7, of that Act in the way proposed by the defendants. I think it must mean "any tramways, &c., now purchased by or leased to the corporation, or which they shall be entitled to purchase or lease, and shall have purchased or leased." It cannot have been intended to make tramways which the corporation had neither purchased nor leased part of the undertaking of the corporation.

I propose to make a declaration that the defendants are not entitled to expend any part of the city fund, or the receipts of their tramway undertaking, or the proceeds of any city rate, or any other moneys of the defendants, or of the city, for the purpose of establishing or maintaining or carrying on the business of carriers, except as part of and in connection with their tramway undertaking, and in respect of articles carried along all or part of the tramways for the time being belonging or in lease to the corporation, or on which they have power to place or run carriages, and to grant an injunction in similar terms. If the plaintiff desires it, I will also direct an inquiry on similar lines, reserving the costs of such inquiry. I have felt some difficulty as to the costs of the action. The plaintiff has failed in a part of his claim, but he has also succeeded to a substantial degree, and there are no issues of fact by which the costs could be measured separately; the only evidence adduced by the defendants proved abortive. The action was properly brought, and the plaintiff ought, I think, to have the general costs, but with some considerable deduction. I have come to the conclusion that justice will be done if I order the defendants to pay to the plaintiff one-half of his costs of the action, leaving the plaintiff to bear the other half, and the defendants will, of course, bear their own costs. I will suspend the operation of the injunction for fourteen days to give the defendants time to decide whether they will appeal or not.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Ince, Colt, & Ince.

Solicitors for the defendants, Austin & Austin, for W. H. Talbot, Manchester.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Jan. 16, 19, 30.

In re RATTENBERRY.
RAY v. GRANT. (a.)

Will—Legacy—Debt owed by testatrix to legatee—Satisfaction.

A testatrix bequeathed a legacy to a sister to whom she owed money at the time of her death. The amount of the legacy exceeded the amount of the debt. The sister, as an executrix, retained a sum sufficient to satisfy the debt with interest in addition to the legacy.

Held, that the legacy was in satisfaction of the debt.

Originating summons.

The plaintiff was a sister of the testatrix, who died on the 22nd of February, 1904. In 1899 the testatrix had borrowed from the plaintiff sums amounting in all to £150, upon which interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum had been paid by the testatrix during her life. At the time of the death of the testatrix these loans had not been repaid.

By her will, dated the 23rd of November, 1903, the testatrix had bequeathed to the plaintiff a legacy of £400, and had appointed her to be an executrix. The will contained no directions for the payment of debts.

The plaintiff, in her capacity of executrix, retained out of the testatrix's estate a sum sufficient to satisfy the debt with interest and also the legacy.

The object of this summons was to determine the question whether the legacy was in satisfaction of the debt.

Baden Fuller, for the plaintiff.—The fact that the legacy was given generally takes the case out of the general rule. The testator intended the legacy to be payable in addition to the debt. By paying interest the testatrix shows that she did not intend the debt to be paid by the legacy. The doctrine of satisfaction would not apply in the case of a debt after the date of the will. The debt was in the nature of a running account.

Austen-Cartmell, for the residuary legatees.—The legacy must be considered to be in satisfaction of the debt. The effect of the authorities in point is summed up in In re Horlock, 43 W. R. 410, [1895] 1 Ch. 516.

Jan. 30.—SWINFEN EADY, J.—The rule is that a legacy to a creditor of an amount equal to or greater than the debt is primâ facie to be considered a satisfaction of the debt. This rule was established two centuries ago; but no sooner was it established than it was frequently disapproved of, and exceptions were engrafted upon it. In In re Horlock, Calham v. Smith, 43 W. R. 410, [1895] 1 Ch. 516, Stirling, J., said that he joined with the many judges who had disapproved of the rule laid down, and that he equally disapproved of the exceptions which had been engafted on it, but that both were binding upon him. They are both equally binding upon me. The present case is, in my opinion, within the rule, unless there is sufficient indication of intention to exclude the rule. The debt was £150, money borrowed by the testatrix in 1899 from her sister, the plaintiff, upon which the testatrix paid interest at 5 per cent. during her life, and it was payable on demand. The legacy is a general pecuniary one of £400, without any time being specified for payment of it, and without any mention of interest. The will bears date the 23rd of November, 1903, and does not contain any direction to pay debts. It is sought to exclude the rule on the ground that the debt carries interest from the death and the legacy only from one year after the death. But it was decided by Lord Hardwicke in Clark v. Sewell, 3 Atk., at p. 99, that where the legacy is in satisfaction of a debt, and no time is fixed for payment of the legacy, it carries interest from the death of the testator. If the will mentions a date for payment, then interest will only run from that date; and this was the ground upon which Haynes v. Mico, 1 Bro. C. C. 129, and Adams v. Lavender, McCl. & Y. 41, were decided, as pointed out by Stirling, J. Indeed, in Clark v. Sewell, 3 Atk., at p. 97, Lord Hardwicke said: "According to the rule of this court, a legacy that ought to be deemed a satisfaction must take place immediately after the death of the testator; for the debt, whether of a principal sum or for interest, is due at the death of the testator, and therefore the legacy must be so too. . . . There is no case to make a legacy a satisfaction of a debt where the legacy is not due at the time of the testator's death, but is made contingent, and to take place at a future day. . . . Whether the postponing of the legacy is a month only, or a longer time, it makes no manner of difference." Lord Hardwicke, in referring to a legacy that "must take place immediately after the death of the testator," means a legacy the payment of which is not postponed by the testator. A legacy is within the rule laid down by Lord Hardwicke if it is an immediate legacy, although, of course, only payable in a due course of administration, and after debts and funeral expenses have been provided for. In Fowler v. Fowler, 3 P. Wms. 353, where the debt due at the date of the will was £200 for arrears of pin-money, and a general pecuniary legacy of £500 was given, Talbot, L.C., held that the legacy was a satisfaction of the debt. In Gaynon v. Wood, 1 Dickens 331, there was a bond debt of £200 and a legacy of £500 given to the creditor by a subsequent codicil, and the Master of the Rolls held that the legacy must be taken in satisfaction of the debt, and the fact that, since the death, the executor had paid the bond debt to the creditor made no difference in adjusting the rights of the parties. So again, In re Fletcher, Gillings v. Fletcher, 36 W. R. 841, 38 Ch. D. 373, before North, J., is an instance of a legacy being given in satisfaction of a debt, where the debt carried interest, and where no time was fixed for payment of the legacy. In that case the debt was in fact paid off by the testator in his lifetime, and the actual decision was that the legacy had been adeemed, but the learned judge first considered how the matter would have stood if the debt had not been so paid off. He said: "Suppose the debt had not been paid, could the widow have taken the debt as well as the legacy? I think clearly not." The fact, therefore, that the legacy is given generally, without any reference to time of payment or interest, will not exclude the rule. Reliance was also placed on the fact that the plaintiff was appointed executrix and could retain her own debt, but in my opinion this makes no difference. As I have already pointed out, in the case of Gaynon v. Wood the debt had been actually paid by the executor. I am, therefore, bound by the authorities to which I have referred to hold that, in the present case, the legacy is a satisfaction of the debt.

The distinctions between the cases on the satisfaction of debts by annuities are very slender, as may be seen by comparing Atkinson v. Littlewood, 18 Eq. 595, before Malins, V.C., and In re Dowse, 29 W. R. 563, 50 L. J. Ch. 285, before Hall, V.C., which latter case was followed by Stirling, J., in In re Horlock, 43 W. R. 410, [1895] 1 Ch. 516; but it is by the decisions on cases of legacies, which leave no room for doubt, that the present case is governed.

Solicitors, Gribble, Oddie, Sinclair, & Johnson; Langford & Fisher.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Warrington, J. } Jan. 13.

In re No. 9, BOMORE-ROAD. (a.)

Company—Trustee—Dissolution—Vesting order—Outstanding legal estate—Leaseholds—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), ss. 25, 26.

Where a company which up to its dissolution was trustee of property has ceased to exist, the court has power under section 25 of the Trustee Act, 1893, upon the application of the beneficiary, to appoint a new trustee or trustees of the property, and to make an order under section 26 of the Act vesting the property in the new trustee or trustees.

In re General Accident Assurance Corporation, 52 W. R. 332, [1904] 1 Ch. 147, followed.

In re Taylor's Agreement Trusts. 52 W. R. 602, [1904] 2 Ch. 737, distinguished.

In 1890 certain leasehold premises called 9, Bomore-road, Notting Hill, in St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington, were assigned to a company called Pitt & Norrish (Limited) for the residue of a term of ninety-nine years, subject to the payment of the rent and performance of the covenants reserved and contained in the lease.

In 1896 the company was wound up voluntarily and a new company of the same name formed, and in February of that year the liquidators of the old company entered into an agreement with the new company for the transfer to them of all the lands, buildings, and property of the old company for certain valuable considerations.

Under this agreement the new company were let into possession of the leasehold premises, 9, Bomore-road, and had ever since been in possession of them, but no assignment to the new company of the lease had ever been executed.

In October, 1896, the old company became dissolved under section 142 of the Companies Act, 1862, the liquidators having made the required return under section 143.

Upon the new company proposing to sell the property they discovered that it had never been legally assigned to them. They thereupon presented this petition in the matter of the property and in the matter of the Trustee Act, 1893, asking for a declaration that the old company was at and immediately before the date of its dissolution possessed of the leasehold premises as trustees for the petitioners upon a trust within the meaning of the Trustee Act, 1893, and that pursuant to section 25 of that Act a person who was named might be appointed trustee of the premises in the place of the old company, and that the premises might, pursuant to section 26 of the same Act, be ordered to vest in the person named for all the estate and interest therein vested in the old company immediately before its dissolution, upon the trusts upon which the same were held by the old company as aforesaid.

The petition was not served upon anyone.

J. G. Wood, for the petitioners.—Similar orders have been made by James, V.C., in The King of Hanover v. The Bank of England, L. R. 8 Eq. 350, 18 W. R. Dig. 110, by Malins, V.C., on the 19th of November, 1880, in the unreported case of In re Trusts of Land at Farnborough, Reg. Lib. A. 1882, p. 2297, and by Farwell, J., in In re General Accident Assurance Corporation, 52 W. R. 332, [1904] 1 Ch. 147. Buckley, J., refused to follow this last case in In re Taylor's Agreement Trusts, 52 W. R. 602, [1904] 2 Ch. 737, but Farwell, J., in In re Richard Mills & Co. (Brierley Hill) (Limited), W. N. 1905, p. 36, followed his own previous decision.

WARRINGTON, J.—The difficulty that arises is in consequence of some conflict of authority. In the first place, there is the case of The King of Hanover v. The Bank of England. In that case a large sum of Consols stood in the name of the Lords of His Majesty's Royal Regency of Hanover, and it appeared that on the taking over of the kingdom of Hanover by Prussia the body described in the report of the case as the corporation, or quasi-corporation, known as the Lords of His Majesty's Royal Regency of Hanover, ceased to exist, and it became necessary, as in this case, to do something to make a title to those Consols, and ultimately James, V.C., made an order under the section of the old Trustee Act corresponding to the 25th section of the Trustee Act, 1893, which order is set out at p. 352 of the report. It was to this effect. It declared that the body or person described in the bank books as "The Lords of His Majesty's Royal Regency of Hanover" were trustees of the £600,000 odd Bank Annuities mentioned in the pleadings for the persons entitled thereto under the family law in the Bill mentioned, and after declaring as follows: "And it appearing that it is expedient to appoint new trustees of the said sum of Bank Annuities and that such appointment cannot be made except by the order of this court" trustees were appointed and a vesting order was made. The next case is an unreported case, the note of which in the Record Office Mr. Wood has been good enough to give me, in which an order was made by Malins, V.C. That was a case relating to real estate, and the facts were for all practical purposes identical with the present. The estate had been vested in a company, the company was dissolved, and Malins, V.C., made an order appointing a new trustee, as I am asked to do in this case, and on that appointment making a vesting order in that new trustee. Then later on, in the year 1903, Farwell, J., in In re General Accident Assurance Corporation had to deal with a case on all fours with that with which I have now to deal, in which a mortgage of leaseholds had been vested in a dissolved company, and it was necessary to vest that mortgage in a purchaser from the dissolved company. In that case Farwell, J., was not asked to appoint new trustees; he was asked to act under sections 26 and 35 of the new Trustee Act, and to make a vesting order as on the footing that the premises had been vested in a trustee who could not be found. He thought it right to make the order. In a subsequent case of In re Richard Mills & Co. (Brierley Hill) (Limited), reported only in W. N. 1905, p. 36, Farwell, J., made a similar order. So far the authorities seem to authorize me to do what I am prepared to do, and I should have no hesitation at all but for the decision of Buckley, J., in In re Taylor's Agreement Trusts. I think that I need say very little about that case, because the subject-matter was different from that with which I have to deal. The learned judge was dealing there with a patent, and I think that his decision was determined largely by that fact. He was dealing with letters patent granted by the Crown to a patentee who had ceased to exist, and consequently the letters patent might be said to have merged and to have disappeared altogether. He did deal in a few words with the 25th section, on which I am asked to act, but I think that in his dealing with that section his judgment was directed, as was natural, mainly to the facts with which he had to deal. Now, section 25 is expressed in perfectly general terms. It empowers the court whenever it is found expedient, difficult, or impracticable so to do without the assistance of the court, to make an order for the appointment of a new trustee or new trustees. Now, is it expedient in this case to appoint a new trustee? There can be no doubt about that. Here is a property vested in a purchaser in equity with a legal estate outstanding; nobody knows where the legal estate is; and except by appointing a new trustee it is impossible to get that estate vested where it ought to be—namely, in the purchaser or a nominee of the purchaser. That being so, the section enables the court to do that which it is expedient to do, where it cannot, as in the present case, be done without the assistance of the court. The words "although there is no existing trustee," which are added, do not limit the powers given to the court in the previous part of the section, or make it incumbent upon persons who apply to the court to exercise its power to show that there is no existing trustee. The words merely prevent any limitation of the general power in the earlier part of the section in a case in which it is shown that there is no existing trustee. I think that there is no existing trustee at the present time, because even if these leaseholds vest in the Crown as trustee, we know that the Crown does not recognize its position as trustee where the legal estate is outstanding. But whether that is so or not, I think this is a case where it is expedient that a new trustee should be appointed, and that I can make the appointment. And if I appoint a new trustee there is no question that I may make a vesting order. It is not necessary that this order should be served upon the Crown.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application granted.

Solicitors, Edell & Gordon.

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) May 23, 24; June 3, 1905.

PHŒNIX ASSURANCE CO. (LIMITED) v. SPOONER. (a.)

Insurance (Fire)—Subrogation of rights—Indemnity—Compulsory purchase of insured premises—Notice to treat—Fire after notice—Payment by insurers—Acceptance by vendor (assured) of a sum less by the amount paid for the loss.

During the currency of a policy against fire a corporation served on the assured a notice to treat for the purchase of the insured buildings, under the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Subsequent to the notice, but before anything further had been done under the notice, the premises were destroyed by fire. The insurers paid the agreed amount of the loss to the vendor. The corporation and the vendor agreed the amount of the purchase price, and in so doing took into account the amount which the insurers had paid the vendor, reducing the purchase price by that amount. The insurers sued the vendor to recover the amount which they had paid, alleging that the vendor might have received that amount from the corporation.

Held, that the corporation were not entitled to the benefit of the policy issued to the vendor. The contract was a personal one, and did not pass to the corporation. The contract being one of mere indemnity, the insurers, upon payment of the loss, became entitled to all the rights then vested in the vendor in respect of the destroyed property. Those rights included a right to be paid by the corporation the value of the property as at the date of the notice to treat. It was not legally possible for the vendor to deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of this right by any agreement with the corporation, and the insurers were entitled to recover the amount.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs' claim was for the sum of £925 as money received or which might have been received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiffs or as the equivalent of the benefit received or which might have been received by the defendant from the Corporation of Plymouth or other persons in respect of a loss by fire against which the defendant was indemnified by the plaintiffs under a policy of fire insurance effected by the defendant, or of a right against the Corporation of Plymouth or other persons whereby the defendant might have protected or reimbursed herself for the loss, but which she renounced or had prejudiced to the damage to the plaintiffs.

The defendant owned a house and two shops in Plymouth. Those premises were insured against fire with the plaintiff company. During the currency of the policy the Plymouth Corporation, desiring to acquire the property, served, on the 1st of August, 1900, a notice to treat on the defendant under powers conferred by the Local Government Board's Provisional Order Confirmation Act, 1897, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Before any further steps were taken the insured premises, on the 14th of June, 1902, were destroyed by fire, and the plaintiffs, on the 2nd of July, 1902, paid £925 as the agreed amount of the loss. The corporation and the defendant finally agreed upon the purchase price. That sum was arrived at by taking into account the £925 paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant, the corporation agreeing to indemnify the defendant from any claims made by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs knew of the notice to treat when the loss was paid by them. The defendant continued paying premiums after the notice to treat was given.

Cohen, K.C., and Wood Hill, for the plaintiffs.—When the loss was paid by the insurers they were subrogated to all rights which the assured had as against the corporation to the extent of £925. Those rights could not be renounced or prejudiced by the assured. If those rights were so renounced or prejudiced the insurers could recover a sum equal to the amount of the right so renounced or prejudiced: West of England Insurance Co. v. Isaacs, [1897] 1 Q. B. 226, 66 L. J. Q. B. 36, 45 W. R. Dig. 74. The assured became, as it were, a trustee of the rights for the insurers, when the latter paid the loss: West of England Insurance Co. v. Isaacs. The corporation cannot take the benefit of the policy. The assured could have recovered the value of the premises as and from the notice to treat; the assured could have recovered the value of the premises rebus sic stantibus at the time of giving the notice to treat: Haynes v. Haynes, 9 W. R. 497, 30 L. J. Ch. 578; Morgan v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 17 W. R. 261, L. R. 4 C. P. 97; and Penny v. Penny, 16 W. R. 671, L. R. 5 Eq. 227.

Foote, K.C., and Percival Clarke, for the defendant.—In Castellain v. Preston, 31 W. R. 557, 11 Q. B. D. 380, there was an endeavour to keep the insurance money twice over; in the present case the assured has not been paid twice. This case is distinguishable from West of England Insurance Co. v. Isaacs. The statutory rights arising under a notice to treat are different to the contractual rights of vendor and purchaser. Rayner v. Preston, 29 W. R. 547, 18 Ch. D. 1, and Castellain v. Preston, are cases referring to vendor and purchaser, and therefore not in point. It is not clear what date is to be taken for the purposes of valuing the property. Assuming that the date is that when notice to treat was given, the assured, in effect, held the money as trustee for the corporation, and there was a settlement in account. The facts in the case of Penny v. Penny were different from those in the present case. The corporation, giving the notice to treat, is entitled to the property and to the benefit of contracts relating thereto, being placed in the same position as to existing contracts as the assured, to whom the notice was given. If the insurers, instead of paying the loss, had rebuilt the premises they could not have recovered the value paid by the corporation for the buildings so erected. The corporation could have insured, or insured in the defendant's name, and could have recovered. The defendant continued paying premiums to the insurers, and the insurers are therefore estopped from saying that the mere omission on the corporation's part to tell the defendant to continue insuring on behalf of the corporation would prevent the corporation from recovering. The insurers cannot recover the amount claimed.

(a) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cohen, K.C., in reply.—The assured might have ceased paying the premiums. Rayner v. Preston is in point and is a complete answer to the defendant's contentions.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 3.—BIGHAM, J.—The facts in this case are not in dispute. They are to be found in the pleadings, and, shortly stated, they are as follows: The defendant, Mrs. Spooner, owned a house and two shops in Plymouth. These premises were insured by her against fire with the plaintiff company. During the currency of the policy the Plymouth Corporation determined to acquire the property, and on the 1st of August, 1900, by virtue of the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, they served on the defendant a "notice to treat." Before anything had been done under this notice a fire took place, the buildings were destroyed, and the plaintiffs paid to the defendant £925, the agreed amount of her loss. After the fire the agreed amount to be paid by the corporation on taking over the property pursuant to their notice to treat was agreed between the defendant and the corporation at a sum arrived at by taking into account the money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant under the policy, the corporation agreeing to indemnify the defendant against any claim which might be made against her by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs now bring their action against the defendant, alleging that she has, or but for her wrongful act would have, received from the corporation the £925 so taken into account, and that the money is, or would have been, money received by her to the plaintiffs' use. The action is defended at the cost of the corporation, and in substance the question is whether the corporation are entitled to the benefit of the policy issued to the defendant. It appears to me that they are not. The plaintiffs' contract was a personal contract with the defendant; it never passed, either by assignment or by operation of law, to the corporation, and it amounted to nothing more than a promise to pay Mrs. Spooner a sufficient sum to indemnify her from any loss she might sustain by reason of her property being damaged by fire. The contract being one of mere indemnity, the plaintiffs, the assurers, upon payment of the loss became entitled to all the rights then vested in Mrs. Spooner in respect of the destroyed property. Those rights, in my opinion, included a right to be paid by the corporation the value of the property as at the date of the notice to treat—that is to say, the value before the fire; and it was not legally possible for her to deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of this right by any agreement with the corporation. The arrangement made by her with the corporation was no doubt made at the instance of the corporation, and was entered into for the purpose of securing to the corporation the benefit of the insurance contract. But the risk of fire was the corporation's risk from the time of the notice to treat, and they must be satisfied to bear it. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Dawes & Sons.

Solicitors for the defendant, Crowders, Vizard, Oldham, & Co.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div.
Admiralty.
(Gorell Barnes, P.)

Oct. 30; Nov. 9.

"THE MARPESSA." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Demurrage—Principle of compensation for loss.

The defendants' vessel collided with and damaged the plaintiffs' dredger, which caused her to be laid up, and in respect of which damages were claimed.

The Court, following the principle laid down in The Greta Holme, [1897] A. C. 596, held that the basis of the compensation for demurrage for detention of the dredger should be to award such a sum as would be sufficient to meet the out-of-pocket expenses properly chargeable against the dredger during the period and by reason of her detention, plus depreciation and loss of interest on capital, depreciation and interest being estimated on the value of the dredger at the time when the accident occurred.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship G. B. Crow, a suction dredger, which at the time that she was built was valued at £56,700.

She was regularly employed night and day throughout the year (Sundays, Christmas Day, and Good Fridays excepted).

The defendants were the owners of the steamship Marpessa, and on the 6th of October, 1904, the detendants' vessel collided with The G. B. Crow, in respect of which collision the plaintiffs commenced an action.

That action was, however, settled on the defendants admitting liability to the extent of 90 per cent., subject to the usual reference.

The claim by the plaintiffs amounted to £1,275 odd, and all the items were agreed to except for demurrage for nine days at £104 per day. The district registrar, however, only allowed £35 per day, and inasmuch as that item was the only item in dispute, he ordered the plaintiffs to pay the costs of the reference, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Aspinall, K.C., and Leslie Scott, for the appellants, cited The Greta Holme, [1897] A. C. 596, 46 W. R. Dig. 157.

Pickford, K.C., and Greer, for the respondents, cited The Harrington, 13 P. D. 45, 36 W. R. Dig. 187.

GORELL BARNES, P.—This was a motion in objection to the report of the district registrar of Liverpool, dated the 13th of July, 1905, upon a reference in an action brought by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, owners of the sand-pump dredger G. B. Crow, as plaintiffs, against the owners of the steamship Marpessa, defendants, so far as the same awards the sum of £315, or £35 per day, to the plaintiffs in respect of item No. 11 in the particulars of the plaintiffs' claim, and finds that the plaintiffs should bear the costs of the reference. The claim arose out of a collision between the dredger G. B. Crow, belonging to the plaintiffs, and the steamship Marpessa in the River Mersey in October, 1904. The defendants admitted liability to the extent of 90 per cent. of the plaintiffs' claim, to be assessed in the usual way. The only item in the claim which was disputed was No. 11, and the dispute resolved itself into a question of the principle upon which demurrage for the detention of the dredger should be calculated. The claim for demurrage was for nine days at £104 per day, making in all £936, of which the district registrar has allowed £315. The G. B. Crow is a suction dredger employed in dredging operations at the bar at the entrance to the River Mersey, and is a valuable vessel for the purpose. She is one of the largest dredgers in Europe, the other two being also owned by the plaintiffs. On the occasion of the collision the dredger was sheltering from the weather, but would have been set to work again immediately after the weather moderated. This dredger was built in the year 1895, and, according to the evidence, her life would have been about fifteen years, so that she had about five or six years more work in her. In consequence of the collision she was delayed nine days undergoing repairs, and her use to the plaintiffs was lost during that time, unless any part of the period would have been affected by her being prevented from being used by the weather. The contention on the part of the plaintiffs was that the value of the dredger to the plaintiffs at the time in question was the amount which they considered it proper to expend on her for maintenance and working expenses, in addition to sums to cover insurance, depreciation, and owners' profits, and upon this basis the actual claim presented at the reference amounted to £102 4s. 5d. per day. The contention on the part of the defendants was that the principle upon which the plaintiff's claim was put forward was wrong, and that the claim ought to have been based upon the principle indicated in the judgment in the House of Lords in the case of The Greta Holme, [1897] A. C. 596. In that case, owing to a collision with a ship, a steam dredger belonging to the present plaintiffs was injured, and the owners were deprived of the use of it for some weeks, and the dredging works were delayed. A claim was made for £1,500, being a sum calculated at the rate of £100 per week for the fifteen weeks during which the dredger was under repair and could not be used for any purpose by her owners, and £91 8s. 6d. as an allowance for a period of sixteen days, during which she could only be used as a hopper barge. The registrar reported against both these items of claim, and his report was sustained by the President of the Probate Division, whose decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, but the decision was reversed by the House of Lords as to the items of damage, and a sum of £500 was fixed upon by the learned lords in the House of Lords. The broad contention on the part of the defendants in that case was that the plaintiffs could recover no damages for the loss of the use of the dredger, but the learned lords held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages, and perhaps the nearest indication of the principle upon which these damages should be assessed is to be found in the judgment of Lord Herschell, at p. 605, where he says: "How can they the less be entitled to damages because instead of hiring a dredger they invested their money in its purchase? The money so invested was out of their pockets, and they were deprived of the use of the dredger, to obtain which they had sacrificed the interest on the moneys spent on its purchase A sum equivalent to this at least they must surely be entitled to, but I think they are also entitled to general damages in respect of the delay and prejudice caused to them in carrying out the works entrusted to them. It is true those damages cannot be measured by any scale, but that would be equally true in a case of damages in respect of the deprivation of an individual of a chattel which he had purchased for the purpose of comfort and not profit." The district registrar has considered that the basis upon which the plaintiffs in the present case have put forward their claim is erroneous, and has, in substance, based the allowance which he has made to the plaintiffs upon the principle indicated by Lord Herschell in the case of The Greta Holme above referred to, and has allowed the plaintiffs demurrage at the rate of £35 a day; that is to say, for the nine days the sum of £315. Prior to the decision of the House of Lords, in the case just referred to, it had been held that damages for detention in such a case as the present could not be recovered; but that decision overruled this view. The case was primarily concerned with that broad question, and in the judgments there is not much to be found indicating any very precise method of ascertaining the damages. The passage above quoted from Lord Herschell's judgment seems to come nearest to doing so. Now, the method contended for by the plaintiffs was expressed by their counsel before the district registrar thus—he said: "If the board consider it worth their while to incur all the expenditure which they have to incur for the sake of the benefit which they derive, surely the benefit they derive is valued by the amount of expenditure they incur, and the damage to that through the loss of service is similarly calculated." Further on he argued that the plaintiffs were entitled "to see what the dock board think worth while to spend upon the vessel, because the vessel must be worth to the dock board at least not less than the amount they have thought it worth while to spend on keeping her up, and the measure of what they think worth while to spend on keeping her up is given by the working expenses, including superintendence and general charges of the engineer's department, and in effect depreciation." The same method was contended for by counsel before me. The defendants, on the other hand, maintained that the report allowed sufficient damages, and that nothing more was proved. The whole difficulty in this case arises from the practical impossibility of proving what is the actual loss sustained by the plaintiffs in such circumstances as those in question. No evidence was forthcoming of the exact monetary effect upon the plaintiffs' position of the work being done by dredging, or of any definite loss caused by the delay; indeed, such evidence would naturally be very difficult to give with certainty, and Mr. Lyster, the principal witness for the plaintiffs, appears to have admitted that he could not point to any definite injury or inconvenience occasioned by the loss of the services of the vessel. It is very clear that dredging operations must have the effect of improving the navigation, of preventing the channels from silting up, of deepening the channels and thereby permitting vessels to navigate them at times of tide at which they could not otherwise move and enter, and generally of increasing the facilities and capacities of the port. The plaintiffs' counsel therefore asked the court to make the assumption that the benefit which is derived by the plaintiffs from these operations must be at least equivalent to the expenditure upon them which the board consider it worth their while to make; in other words, that the benefit was measured by the expenditure which would have produced it. The basis for making this assumption was not rested upon any evidence of statistics or calculations of increased dues or other benefits to be derived, or of any materials which the board may have had before them when deciding to incur and continue their expenditure, but was practically rested on argument, and the assertion that it must be so because the board consider it so. It is probably not unreasonable to suppose that the board are not likely, as a matter of business and good sense, to spend more on dredging than will result in producing an equivalent benefit to them, but I shall point out later that this assumption is of a very vague and ambiguous character, and moreover it must not be forgotten that the net or real benefit derived is only the excess of the benefit produced over the expenditure which produced it, and even if the assumption aforesaid be made, it is clear that, if the work should be stopped, while on the one hand the benefit produced by it being done is lost, or perhaps only retarded, on the other hand the expenditure is to a certain extent saved. I think that counsel for the plaintiffs in their arguments omitted to give full weight to this latter consideration, and also failed to notice the difference between expenditure which does not cease on an accident happening and expenditure which does. To take an illustration, if the dredger had been sunk and totally lost by the collision, it seems to me clear that the plaintiffs could only recover from the wrongdoer the value of the vessel at the time of the loss, whereas the plaintiffs' counsel contended that they could not only recover in such a case the vessel's value, but, in addition, the loss equivalent to the whole of the expenditure which would have been incurred by them from the time of the collision up to the time when they could have replaced her by some other vessel competent to do her work. Upon the assumption aforesaid, the benefit to be derived is to be treated as equivalent to the expenditure, but when a vessel is lost the wrongdoer in paying her value replaces at once the capital which then remains invested in the vessel, and all the expenditure from that moment ceases, so that while on the one hand the benefit of continued working is lost, any further expenditure equivalent to the benefit is entirely saved. Here one may ask why should damages for delay be charged on a greater value than the value which would be considered in case of total loss? Again, if a vessel or other property of a certain value is used for business purposes the cost of gaining any benefit by its use is measured by the outgoing current expenditure, together with depreciation upon the property and interest upon the value of the property, and if the only benefit to be produced by working the property is to be equivalent to the expenditure then it is obvious that by a cessation of the work the current expenditure would stop —except so far as is necessary to keep the property in safety—while on the other hand the depreciation—except so far as effected by the vessel or property being laid up—and the interest on capital continue to run on; so that, in my opinion, in a case like the present the out-of-pocket expenses which the owner is compelled to incur, notwithstanding the stoppage, and the depreciation and loss of interest on capital, measure his loss by the delay, assuming, of course, that the benefit derived by working is only to be treated as equivalent to the expenditure. Applying this reasoning to the present case and for the moment making the main assumption asked for by the plaintiffs, it follows that by the delay in question they lost the actual cost for insurance, wages, general charges, &c., properly chargeable against the dredger, during the delay, and the depreciation and loss of interest on capital for that time. The registrar has given them an allowance for these, and the only question really seems to be whether it is enough. No evidence was given before him, as I understand, as to the actual out-of-pocket cost, but he has taken certain figures from averages given by the plaintiffs and has probably exceeded the real cost. He has apparently based his allowance for depreciation and interest on the value of the vessel at the time of the delay, and I think the only real question in the case is whether he has allowed sufficient under these last two heads. This turns upon whether the vessel's value at the time of the loss ought to be regarded as her value based upon the original amount of capital invested in her, and here comes in a difficulty arising from the vagueness and ambiguity of the assumption which the plaintiffs ask the court to make. The plaintiffs start by asking the court to make the assumption that the benefit derived in the year 1904 from the working of the dredger is exactly the same as the benefit derived in the first year when the vessel was new, because they contend that, as the dredger, although depreciated in value, is doing as good work now as she was when first built, the benefit they are deriving from her now is to be taken as equivalent to the benefit which they derived from her when she was first built. They say that the benefit when she was first built if measured by the expenditure must be considered having regard to the original value of the vessel, and so taking the actual working expenses as about the same on the average they wish to charge, as expenditure in 1904, the annual average working expenses and also depreciation and interest or owners' profits practically on the original cost of the ship. When the whole claim is resting on hypothesis and assumption, I fail to see why the court should make any such assumption, especially as all the plaintiffs can really say is that the board think it worth while to make certain expenditure, and it ought logically to follow from that that the inquiry should be what expenditure was the board making in the year 1904. The plaintiffs, however, then say, "At any rate it should be assumed"—though, again, I say there is no evidence to support the assumption—"that the benefit is measured by the actual expenditure from time to time, and then the benefit for the year 1904 should be measured by the expenditure incurred in that year." The plaintiffs then, to support their claim, are driven to contend that the expenditure for the year 1904 is the same as the expenditure for the first year of her working, and they treat the value of the vessel as not diminishing, and base their claim upon some bookkeeping figures. It appears to me that if the expenditure is to be considered at the time in question their argument is wholly unsound, because if the matter is looked at from the ordinary point of view of business accounts, in keeping such accounts when a vessel is being worked for the purpose of producing profits it is usual to charge the profits first with depreciation, and secondly with interest on the capital before arriving at any net result. If there is no profit, then the depreciation and loss of interest are clear loss; if the profit is equivalent to them, then there is no net profit, because these losses exhaust the profit obtained. But, assuming that there are profits obtained equivalent to them, when the depreciation and interest are charged against these profits (observe it is only the excess, if any, which should be divided as profits), the sum charged for depreciation and interest is money in hand, which can be utilized in any other business manner, leaving the capital in the vessel merely the depreciated value of the vessel. So in this case the plaintiffs treat themselves as year after year making a benefit out of the working of their dredger equivalent to the expenditure upon her, and if they do so they will have to write off each year so much for depreciation and charge the depreciation and interest against the benefit received, so that they must be treated as having that amount in hand, just as an owner of a ship, having charged his profit and loss account with depreciation and interest, has the amount in hand if he has made enough profit to cover the same. The expenditure, therefore, for the last year of the dredger's working, prior to the accident, would be the out-of-pocket expenses, the depreciation on her then value, and the interest on the capital remaining as representing her depreciated value. In the course of the evidence the vessel's depreciated value appears to have been worked out by figures, showing a result of some £33,300, but as she would have become useless and obsolete, according to the evidence, in about five years more, it would seem to me that her real value to the plaintiffs was considerably less, and that upon some fair actual value the registrar must have based the figures for depreciation and loss of interest. It appears to me not reasonable to ask the court to act upon the large assumption which the plaintiffs require to be made. It omits to take into account any depreciation of the vessel at all; it omits to take into account the chapter of accidents; it omits to take into account the possibility that a mere trifling delay of a few days will not substantially affect the ultimate operation of the works; and it leaves out of sight that no real evidence was given as to the exact benefit derived from the works, and the time at which that benefit will be received, or of any actual loss; and it seems to me, on the whole, reasonable to consider that where the damages are not really proved, the court is at liberty to assess them by awarding to the plaintiffs sufficient to compensate them for their actual out-of-pocket expenses, depreciation upon the vessel, and loss of interest upon the capital. The very wide claim made by the plaintiffs, as shown in their statement of working expenses, gives the benefit derived by them for owners' profits at 25 per cent. on the original value of the ship, though if they are obtaining from their work a benefit equivalent to expenditure, ordinary depreciation and interest on capital if charged annually would replace the capital and interest, and if this claim which they make were to be considered as a fair measure they would be in a position to supply themselves with a new dredger practically every few years out of profits. With regard to the evidence about other dredgers, that is of very little use in the present case, as it does not appear to have been suggested that the board ever really contemplated hiring a dredger in place of The G. B. Crow. I do not think that the point decided in The Harrington, 13 P. D. 48, 6 Asp. M. C. N. S. 282, and the similar point in The Greta Holme in the Court of Appeal, have any real bearing upon the present question, and in reading the judgments of those cases it is not at all clear to me whether the effect of annually charging interest and depreciation against profits was fully considered. I may also observe that in the passage above quoted from Lord Herschell's judgment, where he refers to interest on the money spent on the purchase of the dredger, I do not believe he had present to his mind any question of depreciation, otherwise he would have noticed that the money remaining invested in the dredger is arrived at by the depreciation being written off out of the profits of previous years. I am not quite clear how the figure allowed for depreciation by the district registrar has been arrived at, but I take it that he has based it on the value to the plaintiffs of the vessel at the time of the delay, which, I am informed, is in accordance with the practice in the principal registry, and it may be open to question whether for the very short delay there was any substantial deterioration, as the vessel was laid up. The deterioration is theoretical rather than real. He appears to have given more than the actual figures would probably show for out-of-pocket expenses. The item for insurance is taken from the plaintiff's tables, where the rate would seem to be given as if she were insured on the original value of the dredger, instead of on her value at the time of the accident. The item for wages is also taken from the same tables, and is the average cost of the wages when the vessel is at work, and is evidently not the actual wages paid while she was laid up, and while she was laid up the men appear to have been employed on useful work, so that their labour was not lost. The item for supplies is stated to be largely in excess of what the merchants considered would have been expended in supplies to a vessel in dock, but a liberal allowance has been made to cover superintendence and sundries. I notice, however, that a charge for superintendence and other general charges had been made and allowed in an undisputed item of the claim (No. 8). It may perhaps be said that depreciation ought to be calculated on the original cost, as the plaintiffs by their tables appear to spread the total depreciation from original value to nil over the estimated life of the dredger, but in my opinion this is unsound in principle. The plaintiffs, for their book-keeping purposes, spread the depreciation equally over the whole period, but this does not affect the question of what real depreciation is caused by the defendants to a vessel of the value which the vessel had at the time of the disaster, when once that value has been arrived at. Even if this point were conceded it would only add £5 or £6 a day to the amount allowed, but if the amount allowed for insurance, wages, and supplies should be reduced by more than this addition, which I think on the evidence ought in all probability to be the case, then this point is unimportant. I do not feel satisfied that the plaintiffs have made out any case for a larger allowance than that which the district registrar has made to them. Looking at this case broadly, the plaintiffs, without any evidence of distinct money loss, are seeking to recover for the loss of the use of the dredger at a rate which, leaving entirely out of consideration the insurance and other actual out-of-pocket expenses, would amount, in one year, to nearly, if not quite, the value of their dredger; and unless the court is to embark upon a sea of assumptions and possibilities I conceive that, applying the principles in the case of The Greta Holme, a business and reasonable view to take is that when the plaintiffs content themselves with such evidence as they gave in the present case, this tribunal, in assessing their damages, may say, as a jury would do, we must act with some reasonable certainty, and you, the plaintiffs, are reasonably compensated by being awarded a sum which we are fairly satisfied you may have lost, but we cannot follow you into mere speculation. The motion must be dismissed with cost.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitor for the appellants, W. C. Thorne, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondents, Hill, Dickinson, & Co., Liverpool.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). — Nov. 14.

PADDINGTON, MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Local government—Open space—Hoarding or screen—Adjoining landowners—Access of light—Building—

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 35), s. 1; 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 34), s. 5; 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 32), s. 4—Disused Burial-grounds Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 72), s. 3.

Under the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877, 1881, and 1887, and the Disused Burial-grounds Act, 1884, a local authority is entitled to erect a screen upon an open space of which it has the control, and thereby prevent an adjoining owner from acquiring by prescription a right to an access of light to his windows over such open space.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 114, [1903] 2 Ch. 556) reversed, and that of Buckley, J. (51 W. R. 109, [1903] 1 Ch. 109), restored.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 114, [1903] 2 Ch. 556) (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of Buckley, J. (51 W. R. 109, [1903] 1 Ch. 109).

The respondent Boyce was the owner under a long lease of land in the parish of Paddington abutting on the churchyard of St. Mary's, Paddington, and he had erected blocks of flats which had numerous windows overlooking the churchyard. This churchyard had become a disused burial-ground within the meaning of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877, 1881, and 1887, and of the Disused Burial-grounds Act, 1884; and by virtue of those Acts, and of an indenture of April, 1892, and of a faculty granted by the Bishop of London, the Vestry of Paddington (now represented by the appellant borough) had the control and management of the churchyard.

In January, 1901, the borough council proposed to erect a screen in the churchyard in front of the windows of the respondent's flats, which would have interfered with the usual access of light, and the respondent thereupon brought this action for an injunction to restrain the council from erecting any screen, &c., so as to occasion nuisance, annoyance, or damage to him and the tenants of the flats.

By section 5 of the Act of 1881, the open space, &c., is to be held "in trust to allow, and with a view to the enjoyment of such open space, &c., in an open condition, free from buildings, and under proper control and regulation, and for no other purpose."

Haldane, K.C., and H. Terrell, K.C. (J. A. Nash and C. A. M. Barlow with them), for the appellants.

Astbury, K.C. and Mark Romer, for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I confess I should have been better satisfied if the parties had thought it right to come to some agreement in this case, but of course they have a right to have the judgment of the court; and while on the one hand certainly there are public rights involved, on the other the question, as it arises here, is a question between a private speculator who wants to make the best of his buildings, and a public body whose only interest is to preserve that which is committed to their charge in as unincumbered a position as they received it.

Now in the first place I think it is necessary to consider what is the meaning of the prohibition contained in the Acts referred to. I am of opinion that it meant what it said—that the space was to remain unbuilt upon. Its use as a burial-ground is to cease, but it is not to be used as building ground—that is the meaning of it; and it appears to me that anything that approaches to the character of a building, whether temporary or permanent, is obviously within the prohibition. I entirely agree with Buckley, J., that in the books there may be found a great variety of cases where, with reference to the subject-matter of the covenant, and the meaning of what was in question between the parties, a screen or some erection of that nature might be considered a "building" with reference to some covenants, and might not be considered a building with reference to others. The subject-matter to be dealt with, and the subject which the covenant is supposed to be applied to, are all to be looked at in order to see what the word "building" means in relation to that particular subject-matter. It is impossible to give any definite meaning to it in the loose language which is used in some cases. Anything which is in the nature of a building might be within one covenant, and the same erection might not be a building with reference to another covenant. I think Buckley, J.'s, observation was very well founded.

But now I have to look at the word "building" here with reference to this subject-matter, and with reference to what the Act of Parliament was doing. It is very obvious, I think, that what was intended was to keep this disused burial-ground from being used as building ground, to keep it as a place of exercise, ventilation, and recreation, and what not; to prevent anything from being done in the nature of building which would interfere with or restrict the free and open use of these spaces, as constituted under the statute. But when I look at the question here, I am bound to say that I have to look at it under some difficulty, because I have not only to consider whether a screen is a building, but I have to consider whether an undescribed screen, of which neither the size nor the nature has been specified, would be a building within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. All I can say at present is, if you put the proposition in the abstract in that way, without any reference to any concrete facts, it must be put thus: That any screen is a building within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. I am not prepared to affirm that proposition. I think Buckley, J., was perfectly right I think it is not a building; and the decision that it is not a building appears to go to a great part of the argument, because the only mode in which it had been suggested that this injunction should be maintained—namely, that the ground should not be used for any other purpose than that which the Act of Parliament provides—seems to me to add nothing whatever. "Any other purpose" than what? Any other purpose than open ground—any other purpose than as a place for recreation, enjoyment, or what not. I find nothing in the letters which have been referred to which indicates the slightest restriction of any one of these purposes in the use of this ground.

If one looks at what is the real substance of the matter, it is obviously this—that this public body was doing what every private proprietor would do under the circumstances, because every private proprietor would prevent certain rights from being acquired over this space which would both prejudice the value and prevent the full use of it in future. If this particular space can be built round and rights acquired, you might have it so completely surrounded by houses of any height, that the light and even ventilation itself might be very seriously interfered with by the rights acquired by twenty years' user. Under these circumstances it appears to me that this public body was perfectly entitled for the protection of that which is under their guardianship to prevent this from being done. The parties may perhaps be commended for not having actually erected the screen, but for having raised the question on a mere threat; because, of course, where the object is simply to prevent the acquisition of a right, it would be convenient first of all to test the question of law; and although, as I have pointed out, it is rather inconvenient to have to pronounce judgment upon a hypothetical screen, on which the learned counsel has indulged his imagination as to a screen going completely round a space of about a quarter of a mile, yet I think perhaps it was the most convenient form not to attempt to put the screen itself in operation, but to try the question of law whether any screen of any sort or kind would be admissible for the purpose of preventing prejudicial rights from being acquired.

I must say I lament that the parties should not have arrived at an agreement between themselves about this matter; but looking at the whole question, looking at what the meaning of the statute is, and at the condition of things that now exists between the parties, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is unsound. The learned Lords Justices appear to me to assume a state of things which I do not find to be established here. I think the judgment of Buckley, J., is perfectly right; and under the circumstances I move that the judgment appealed from be reversed.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I agree with the Lord Chancellor that the case was rightly decided by Buckley, J. I think that there is great force in his initial observation, that it would be an extraordinary proposition that because an open space has been available to the public for enjoyment in an open condition, free from building, the result should be to give immediately or by the unavoidable operation of the Prescription Act, to the circumjacent owners, as a matter of right, an easement of light which theretofore they had not enjoyed. When these sections are examined, I find it impossible to trace the bringing about of that extraordinary result.

In the first place, I think that the vicar has never been ousted of his proprietorial rights; and when I turn to the administration of the body which is charged with preserving the place as an open space, it seems to me that, so far from being extraneous to the scope of that administration, what is proposed to be done is completely within it. I think that the erection of a screen is, or may be, entirely consistent with the purpose of maintaining this place as an open space for public enjoyment, and in furtherance of that purpose. No one can say that a recreation ground surrounded by flats seven storeys high, and looked into from all the windows of that building, is necessarily as good a recreation ground as one more open to the sun and less overlooked. Accordingly, just as Cozens-Hardy, L.J., says that these administrators could erect a tool-house, that being in furtherance of the primary purpose of the administration, so I think this erection is within that purpose. Of course I do not imply that it is the duty of all administrators of open spaces to surround their open spaces with screens; all that I say is, that it is within the rights which have never been taken away from the proprietors and administrators of these grounds; and it may be a step to be taken in furtherance of the purpose with which they are charged. I need hardly say that what I have said bears relation directly to the argument of Cozens-Hardy, L.J., which, indeed, was maintained by counsel for the respondents at the bar.

On the other question as to whether any screen is necessarily a building which, as the Lord Chancellor has pointed out, is the condition of the argument, I can only say that that proposition seems to me to be entirely inconsistent with the most obvious physical facts.

On these grounds I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal was wrong and the judgment of Buckley, J., right.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The injunction granted by the Court of Appeal, to my mind, goes a great deal too far. There is not the slightest evidence to warrant the notion that the defendants, or any of them, intended to erect a building on this land, and accordingly the Court of Appeal have put in words which would cover building or screen. Screens are of all sorts and kinds, and I can imagine screens which are obviously not buildings, and which would obviously be justified by the statutory powers conferred upon these public bodies. This open space may be preserved, and primâ facie ought to be preserved, as a place of recreation, and as more or less of a garden. Now, just fancy an injunction to restrain these defendants from planting biggish trees in front of these windows which would interfere with already acquired rights of light. How could it be possible to maintain an injunction to restrain them from such planting? That shews that the Court of Appeal has gone too far.

I entirely adopt the view taken by Buckley, J. I think that he has put the true construction on the Acts, and I agree that the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs here and below.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for appellants, J. H. Hortin.

Solicitors for respondents, Cheston & Sons.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) — Feb. 6.

PLYMOUTH MUTUAL CO-OPERATIVE AND INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY (LIMITED) v. TRADERS' PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice — Discovery — Interrogatories — Libel — Action against proprietor of newspaper—Plea of fair comment—Information on which libel founded—Name of informant.

Where in an action of libel against the proprietor of a newspaper the defendant pleads fair comment, the plaintiff is entitled to interrogate the defendant as to the information on which the alleged libel was founded, but not as to the name of the informant.

Appeal by the defendants, the Traders' Publishing Association (Limited), from an order made by Sutton, J., at chambers directing them to give further and better answers to certain interrogatories administered to them by the plaintiffs.

The action was brought to recover damages for libel.

The plaintiffs, a society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, carried on a large and extensive business for the supply and manufacture of all kinds of food, clothing, and household and other goods at about sixty shops and sundry farms, works, and factories situate in Plymouth and other places in the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The defendants the Traders' Publishing Association (Limited) were the proprietors and publishers of a weekly newspaper called The Tradesman and Shopkeeper. The Argus Printing Co. (Limited), who were the printers of the said newspaper, were also defendants to the action.

The issue of the said newspaper published on the 25th of February, 1905, contained the following article which the plaintiffs complained of as being a libel:

"Speedy Retribution.—Last week I predicted an early crisis in the affairs of the Plymouth Society, and it has come even more speedily and more dangerously than I had dared to anticipate. At this moment the concern is in the throes of bankruptcy. An ugly run on it has set in, for a large section of the better informed portion of the membership have discovered the true state of affairs, and are naturally anxious to save themselves before the seemingly inevitable crash comes. During the last two or three weeks the run has been extending, and there appears to be no possibility of stopping it, all the indications tending rather to belief that it will get worse. Already immense sums have been drawn out, and the officials are at their wits' end for money. The enormous new bakery, which is being built at a cost of over £30,000, has had all work stopped upon it owing to the financial difficulties, and the machinery has not been put in, though it has been ready for some time past. I understand that an endeavour is being made to dispose of, either by letting or selling, the warehouse recently erected at North Quay, at a cost of about £12,500. No stone is being left unturned to obtain money with which to meet the terrible drain of withdrawals which is taking place. More to follow. The worst has yet to come, however. A number of committee meetings have been held during the last week in reference to far more serious questions. An employé of the society has been found to have misappropriated a large sum of money, and the directors dare not risk further frightening the members by instituting a prosecution. The committee have also discovered an enormous discrepancy in the last (December, 1904) balance-sheet, which I am given to understand, but cannot say definitely, involves thousands of pounds. It is more probable that these revelations are only the forerunners of much more terrible ones. A steady drain upon the society's resources has been going on for a long time, both in the matter of sales and share withdrawals, and now, when this has developed into a positive panic, none can say what will happen. It has been obvious for the past two years that the concern was rushing headlong to disaster, and the members who get hurt in the eventual climax will do me the justice to acknowledge that they have not been without warnings. The present position is only the realization of what I have foretold dozens of times since first my attention was drawn to the business more than two years ago."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants the Traders' Publishing Association by their defence pleaded, inter alia, that, in so far as the words complained of consisted of expressions of opinion, they were fair comment made in good faith and without malice on a matter of public interest, and, in so far as they consisted of allegations of fact, they were true in substance and in fact.

The plaintiffs administered a set of interrogatories to the defendants containing, inter alia, the following: "(5) What information had you when you wrote or printed or published or caused to be written or printed or published the words and figures which induced you to believe that the expressions of opinion or any and which of them in the said words and figures contained, and which you allege in paragraph 5 of the defence herein are fair comment made in good faith and without malice, were true? Did you then in fact believe that the said opinions were true? . . . (7) From whom did you obtain the information upon which you relied in writing or printing or publishing the said expressions of opinion or any and which of them?"

The answers filed on behalf of the defendants the Traders' Publishing Association contained the following: "(5) In answer to the fifth interrogatory, I say that the defendant association had information of the facts alleged in the said words and figures, and those responsible for the publication of the said words and figures believed the said information, and that the said opinions were justified, and therefore true. . . . (7) I object to answer the seventh interrogatory on the ground that the same is irrelevant, and not administered bonâ fide for any purpose of this suit."

On the application of the plaintiffs, Sutton, J., made an order that the defendant association should give a further and better answer to the fifth interrogatory and should answer the seventh interrogatory.

The defendant association appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Frank Dodd, for the defendant association.—Neither of the interrogatories is admissible. As to the fifth interrogatory, where the defendant in an action for libel pleads privilege, he may be asked on what information he published the libel, as such an interrogatory is relevant to the issue of malice: Elliott v. Garrett, 50 W. R. 504, [1902] 1 K. B. 870; White & Co. v. Credit Reform Association and Credit Index (Limited), 53 W. R. 369, [1905] 1 K. B. 653. But where the plea is fair comment, such an interrogatory is irrelevant, there being no issue of malice. Fair comment is distinct from privilege and is really a defence of no libel: Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 11 W. R. 569, 3 B. & S. 769; McQuire v. Western Morning News Co., 51 W. R. 689, [1903] 2 K. B. 100. Where a defendant pleads fair comment, his state of mind is not in question; he must shew that the words in themselves are nothing more than fair comment, and he does not get rid of the libel by proving good faith. As to the seventh interrogatory, it is a well-settled rule that in an action of libel against the proprietor of a newspaper, the defendant cannot be ordered to disclose the name of his informant: Hennessy v. Wright (No. 2), 36 W. R. 879, 24 Q. B. D. 445n; Hope v. Brash, 45 W. R. 659, [1897] 2 Q. B. 188.

They also cited Parnell v. Walter, 38 W. R. 270, 24 Q. B. D. 441; Caryll v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 90 L. T. 307, 52 W. R. Dig. 134; Joynt v. Cycle Trade Publishing Co., [1904] 2 K. B. 292, 52 W. R. Dig. 87; Edmondson v. Birch & Co. (Limited), 54 W. R. 52, [1905] 2 K. B. 523.

Clavell Salter, K.C., and Bartley Denniss (C. W. Mathews with them), for the plaintiffs.—The fifth interrogatory is clearly relevant to the main issue in the case—viz., whether the words complained of were fair comment made in good faith and without malice. If the fifth interrogatory is admissible, it follows logically that the seventh must be admissible also: see the judgment of Collins, M.R., in White & Co. v. Credit Reform Association and Credit Index (Limited). There is no ground for the suggestion that a proprietor of a newspaper who is sued for libel is legally in a different position from any other defendant.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The only question argued before us has been whether or not two of a set of interrogatories which have been administered by the plaintiffs to the defendants are interrogatories which ought to have been put. One of the interrogatories—viz., No. 5—has been answered without objection. The other—viz., No. 7—the defendants have objected to answer on the ground that it is irrelevant and not administered bonâ fide for any purpose of the suit. We are not now discussing in any way the sufficiency of the answer to No. 5. The only question is as to the right to put each of the interrogatories. I will first deal with No. 5, and I will do so on the assumption that the only question we have to discuss is whether such an interrogatory ought to be allowed. [His lordship read the fifth interrogatory.] Before I deal with the question whether this interrogatory ought to be allowed I will state shortly the nature of the action. It is brought by the Plymouth Mutual Co-operative and Industrial Society (Limited), and the defendants are the Traders' Publishing Association (Limited) and the Argus Printing Co. (Limited). The paper of which the first-named defendants are the proprietors is not in the ordinary sense a newspaper; it is a periodical trade publication, and we have only to read the description of the plaintiff corporation and of the first-named defendant corporation to see that there would naturally be a certain amount of rivalry and hostile feeling between them. The alleged libel consists of a strong statement to the detriment of the plaintiffs. I do not propose to read it at length; it is sufficient to say that in substance it imputes that the plaintiffs' business is in a very bad way, that they are in the throes of bankruptcy, that they have spent enormous sums for which they have got no just return, and that the committee are aware of the state of things, and have discovered an enormous discrepancy in the balance-sheet, but do not dare to lay the truth before the shareholders. The defendants have put in a defence, the fifth paragraph of which is the only one material to the question. By that they plead that, so far as the words complained of consist of expressions of opinion, they are fair comment made in good faith and without malice on a matter of public interest, and, so far as they consist of allegations of fact, they are true in substance and in fact. That is a plea of fair comment coupled with a justification. I will not go into the question how far such an interrogatory as I am now considering would have been admitted years ago, when the only possible pleadings in an action of libel were, as far as the plaintiff was concerned, publication of the libel and its falsity, and, as far as the defendant was concerned, not guilty. I desire to guard myself against being supposed to say that such an interrogatory as No. 5 would clearly not have been allowed in those days. We are dealing with a case in which the defence is not, strictly speaking, that of privilege, but that of fair comment. I will not discuss how far fair comment is privilege; there is a difference of judicial opinion on that point. But this is certainly plain, that, if a plea of privilege is raised, the existence of express malice becomes a question of fact raised by the issues, and, if the defence is fair comment, then fairness is a question in issue. I will not go at any length into this question, but in the case of Campbell v. Spottiswoode Crompton, J., said that fairness or unfairness was always in issue where the defence of fair comment was raised. Therefore, the issue of fairness being raised in this case, the fifth interrogatory is plainly a question as to a matter relevant on this issue of fairness. I will only say further as to this, that if we look at Elliott v. Garrett, we find that in that case, where the defendant raised the plea of privilege, and an interrogatory similar to this was asked, it was allowed. The interrogatory there was this: "What information, if any, had you that induced you to believe that the words were true, or what steps, if any, had you taken before speaking the words to ascertain whether they were true or not?" That was allowed as being relevant to the issue of malice raised by the pleadings and directed to support the plaintiff's case. That case was followed and approved of in the case of White & Co. v. Credit Reform Association and Credit Index (Limited). In my opinion, such an interrogatory as we are now dealing with is just as relevant where the defence is fair comment as where the defence is privilege. In either case there is an issue as to the state of mind of the defendant when he published the libel. In one case the question is asked whether the libel was published in a spirit of malice, in the other case the question is whether it was published in a spirit of unfairness. I am of opinion that in either case the interrogatory is admissible. Interrogatory No. 5, therefore, was rightly put.

I will next deal with interrogatory No. 7, which raises a much more difficult question. [His lordship read the seventh interrogatory.] If the only test that we had to apply in considering whether a particular interrogatory ought to be answered was the test whether it asked a question which was relevant to an issue in the action, it would be difficult to say that this interrogatory did not ask such a question. But besides the rule that a party is not entitled to put an interrogatory which is not relevant, there is also the rule that a party is not entitled to put an interrogatory the answer to which would be oppressive to the answerer, or to have answered interrogatories put for some purpose outside the action, such, for instance, as for the purposes of some other action. That is not disputed where it is plain that the interrogatory is put for some purpose outside the action. But it is argued by those who say this interrogatory ought to be allowed, that it is sufficient to show that it is relevant to the present action, and that it is no objection to putting it that the answer may possibly be used for other purposes. There is thus raised a dispute as to onus. The plaintiffs say that primâ facie and in the absence of any proof that such was the intention, this interrogatory ought to be allowed. The defendants, on the other hand, say that the onus is the other way, and that the primâ facie rule, at any rate with regard to interrogatories in actions of libel against newspapers, is that names ought not to be given. That is based on observations in the case of Hope v. Brash, where the plaintiff in an action of libel against a newspaper sought inspection of the original manuscript of the alleged libel. There Lord Esher said: "It appears to me that in the case of Hennessy v. Wright the very same question in substance as that in the present case came before the Court of Appeal—namely, whether the defendant in an action for a libel published in a newspaper ought to be forced to disclose who it was that supplied him with the materials for the libel which had been published. To the judgment in that case I was a party; and Lindley, L.J., after being informed that the general practice of the judges of the common law courts had been for a long series of years not to order inspection in such a case, or to force the defendant to disclose who gave the information on which the libel was published, accepted that practice as binding upon him, and did not dissent from the view taken by myself and Lopes, L.J. Therefore in that case the Court of Appeal recognized the existence of a general rule that inspection of such a document as this should not be given to the plaintiff in an action for libel. It is not necessary to say that the court will never under any circumstances allow such inspection, but, in the exercise of its discretion, it will not, as a general rule, in the absence of any special reason to the contrary, allow it." And A. L. Smith, L.J., said: "It has been the ordinary rule of practice, as laid down by Lindley, L.J., in Hennessy v. Wright, that in a case such as this an order will not be made by which the plaintiff may obtain discovery of the name of the person who originally wrote the libel published in a newspaper. I do not say that the rule so laid down is one which can never be departed from, but there must be something exceptional to take a case out of it." And Bigby, L.J., said: "Independently of the law laid down in Hennessy v. Wright, I doubt whether a case for inspection was here made out; but in that case an exception from the general law as to discovery was made in the case of libel, and I am bound by the rule there laid down." It seems to me that we ought to ask ourselves whether there are any special circumstances in this case to justify us in departing from the general rule of practice as to refusing disclosure of names in an action of libel against the proprietors of a newspaper, and whether there is an exception to that rule where a periodical trade publication sets up a plea of this sort. I do not myself find any such special circumstances here. It is true that in this case the natural rivalry to which I have referred between the plaintiffs and the defendants does to a certain extent take the defendants out of the class of persons to whom the rule applies. But the defendants' paper is a periodical publication which is of interest to a great number of persons, and, in my opinion, it ought for this purpose to be treated as an ordinary newspaper. And I find nothing else in the case which constitutes any special circumstances requiring departure from the rule to which I have referred. I am therefore of opinion that interrogatory No. 7 ought not to be allowed. The result is that the appeal is allowed as to No. 7 and dismissed as to No. 5.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action of libel against the proprietor of a newspaper, and the defendants plead that the words complained of were fair comment made in good faith and without malice on a matter of public interest. Good faith and absence of malice, therefore, constitute part of the defence. What interrogatories are the plaintiffs in such a case entitled to put to the defendants? I will refer to the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in Hennessy v. Wright. He said: "The objection taken by the defendant is that the answers to the interrogatories in question cannot disclose anything which can be fairly said to be material to enable the plaintiff either to maintain his own case or to destroy the case of his adversary. It must be admitted that if the answers could be material for either of these purposes, the interrogatories ought to be answered, but I think it must equally be admitted that, if the answers could not be material for either of these purposes, we ought not to order the defendant to answer." Interrogatories, then, are admissible, if they are directed to destroying the case of the defendants—that is, to showing that the fair comment was not made in good faith or without malice. Nothing contrary to the idea that malice is in issue where fair comment is pleaded was said in McQuire v. Western Morning News Co. In that case there was no evidence of malice. Collins, M.R., in his judgment said that it was not suggested that there was any evidence of actual malice, and he proceeded to discuss the case as one from which the question of malice was eliminated. How are we to apply the rule that interrogatories are admissible which are directed to showing that the comment was malicious as to the two interrogatories in question? The fifth interrogatory asks what information the defendants had when they published the libel which induced them to believe that the words complained of were true. Interrogatories of that kind were allowed in the two cases of Elliott v. Garrett and White & Co. v. Credit Reform Association and Credit Index (Limited), as being relevant to the issue of malice. Further, the defendants have chosen to answer this interrogatory, and their answer is insufficient. I think they must make a further and better answer. As to the seventh interrogatory, which asks from whom the information was obtained, I agree that it falls within the rule laid down in Hennessy v. Wright and Hope v. Brash. In my opinion we are not at liberty to depart from the rule there laid down, as no special circumstances have been disclosed.

MOULTON, L.J., concurred.

Order varied.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Law & Worssam, for Bond & Pearce, Plymouth.

Solicitors for the defendants, Sydney T. James.

From K. B. D. (In Bkcy.).
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 15, 18.

In re MILLS.
Ex parte MILLS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Deed of assignment—Petitioning creditor—Estoppel by assent to the deed—Petition founded on act of bankruptcy other than the deed.

A creditor who has assented to a deed of assignment but who is not bound by it, although he may be prevented from alleging that the assignment for the benefit of the creditors was an act of bankruptcy, is not prevented from presenting a petition founded on an independent act of bankruptcy.

Appeal from a receiving order made by one of the registrars in bankruptcy.

The receiving order was made on the petition of L. C. Baines for noncompliance by the debtor with a bankruptcy notice to pay a judgment debt, which was served on the 28th of July, 1905.

The petition was presented on the 5th of August, and the receiving order was made on the 16th of November.

On the 25th of July a resolution of the creditors was passed, that the debtor should assign his property to a trustee for the benefit of the creditors. Baines was present, but did not vote one way or the other, though he expressly stated he would not assent to the deed. A trustee was proposed by the solicitor on behalf of the debtor, but upon the suggestion of Baines a Mr. Berry was duly elected. There was a conflict of evidence on this point, it being asserted that the resolution appointing Mr. Berry was actually proposed by Baines, although he did not vote on the resolution, whereas Baines asserted that he only suggested the name of an independent chartered accountant. The deed of assignment was executed on the 27th of July.

The registrar having made the receiving order, the debtor now appealed.

Pollock, K.C. (Hansell with him), for the debtor.—The petitioning creditor was estopped by his conduct from bringing his petition. He would clearly have been prevented from treating the assignment itself as an act of bankruptcy: Ex parte Alsop, (1859) 1 D. F. & J. 289, 298; Ex parte Stray, L. R. 2 Ch. 374; In re Woodroff, 4 Manson 46; and Ex parte Mendelsohn, [1903] 1 K. B. 216; 51 W. R. Dig. 158.

McCall, K.C., and Cooper Willis were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I will deal with this case upon the basis that the petitioning creditor did something more than shout out at the meeting that a nominee of the debtor was not a proper person to be appointed trustee of the deed; that he went on to offer his advice that Mr. Berry was a proper person to appoint, and that his advice was acted upon by the creditors. It may be that the effect of that conduct was to make the petitioning creditor a privy to the execution of the deed in this sense—that he could not afterwards use the execution of the deed upon which to found a bankruptcy petition against the debtor. But one thing, to my mind, is plain —viz., that the petitioning creditor did not in any way so act as to be bound by the deed, and if he is not bound by the deed there is nothing to prevent him from recovering any debt due to him in any way that he legally can, and therefore in my view there was nothing to prevent him from presenting a petition in bankruptcy founded upon any independent act of bankruptcy. I expressed an opinion to that effect in In re Woodroff. That observation of mine was not necessary to the decision in that case, but I think it was well founded, and I am prepared to act upon it now. I am confirmed in that view when I look at the judgment of Lord Cairns, L.J., in Ex parte Stray, in which he said, at p. 381, this: "I have no doubt at all that the facts I have thus stated bring the case entirely within the principle of the cases to which I have referred, and I cannot look upon Mr. Goody otherwise than as a person who assented to the execution of this deed, was taking advantage of the deed for the purpose of shielding the estate for a certain length of time, and was willing, if certain other arrangements such as were contemplated could have been made, to take still further advantage from the deed. I again repeat that I think nothing passed actually to bind Mr. Goody entirely to abide by the deed and to come in under the deed as a person who would take no other proceedings for the recovery of his debt; but what I think Mr. Goody is estopped from saying is, that this deed, at the moment it was executed under the circumstances I have mentioned, was a fraudulent deed and one of which he can complain for the purpose of alleging an act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor." In my opinion that observation of mine in In re Woodroff is entirely supported by the passage in the judgment of Lord Cairns, L.J., which I have just read.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING and COZENS-HARDY, L JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, Culross & Holt.

Solicitors for respondent, Goldberg, Barrett, & Newall.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 28, 29; Dec. 16.

In re ALSOP'S PATENT. (a.)

Patent — Specification — Amendment — Disclaimer — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 19.

Where there is an application under section 19 of the Patents Act, 1883, for leave to apply to the Patent Office for leave to amend a specification by way of disclaimer, and the court is not satisfied that the amendment is not by way of disclaimer, leave should not be refused to apply to the Patent Office, which is the statutory tribunal for the decision of the question.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

It appeared that the owner of letters patent for a process of treating flour by air had alleged in his specification that by his treatment the proteids which the flour contained increased in quantity and the flour was purified; the owner of another patent petitioned for the revocation of the other patent on ground that the allegations of the specification as to the increase of the proteids was not correct.

At the hearing of the petition the owner of the first patent applied under section 19 of the Patents Act, 1883, for liberty to apply to the Patent Office for leave to amend the specification by way of disclaimer by striking out therefrom the claims as to increased formation of proteids and admitting that the claim therefor was incorrect.

Buckley, J., held that it was not an amendment by way of disclaimer and refused leave.

The patentee appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Bousfield, K.C., and J. C. Graham, for the appellant, cited In re Armstrong's Patent, 14 R. P. C. 753; In re Chatwood's Patent, 16 R. P. C. 370; In re Dellwick's Patent, 13 R. P. C. 591; In re Geipel's Patent, 21 R. P. C. 379; In re Owen's Patent, 15 R. P. C. 755.

Moulton, K.C., Astbury, K.C., and A. J. Walter, for the respondents, cited Cropper v. Smith, 33 W. R. 338, 28 Ch. D. 148; Luddington Cigarette Machine Co. v. Baron Cigarette Machine Co., 48 W. R. 505, [1900] 1 Ch. 508, 17 R. P. C. 745.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 16.—COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is an appeal from Buckley, J., who in a proceeding for revocation of a patent has declined to give liberty to the patentee to apply at the Patent Office for leave to amend his specification by way of disclaimer. The application was made under section 19 of the Patents Act, 1883. It has been held that the power given by that section is limited to amendment by way of disclaimer as distinct from correction or alteration. Now, it is plain that the court, which cannot itself amend a patent, has a discretion in the matter, and in order to guide the court in the exercise of this discretion it is convenient, and indeed necessary, that the court should be informed generally as to the nature of the amendment desired. If the court sees clearly that what is proposed is not an amendment by way of disclaimer, the court ought not to give leave. If the application is made at a stage in the proceedings when the court has had evidence and is in a position fully to appreciate the nature of the invention, the court may reasonably refuse leave if satisfied that the desired amendment by way of disclaimer can produce no good result to the patentee. It was argued that the court has no jurisdiction to grant the application unless it is satisfied affirmatively that what is desired will be amendment by way of disclaimer. I feel no doubt of our jurisdiction to give leave in the precise language of section 19. In my opinion it is not desirable where the court feels uncertain whether the proposed amendment is by way of disclaimer to refuse to send it to the proper tribunal appointed by statute to decide that question. This was the view of Byrne, J., in In re Chatwood's Patent, 16 R. P. C. 371. In the present case there are six claims in the patent, and the patentee wishes to strike out three of those claims, and also to strike out certain passages in the body of the patent relating to the claims so struck out. Primâ facie this will be an amendment by way of disclaimer. It is, however, contended that the patent is really for one single process, and that the disclaimer will leave the process just where it was before without in any way reducing the ambit of the claim, and that the patentee wants only to say that one of the two results which he asserted that his process would produce cannot in truth be produced. Buckley, J., has adopted this view, and has in effect held that what is desired is amendment by correction or explanation, and not by way of disclaimer. I am not satisfied by the mere reading of the specification that this is so. And I think the patentee ought to be allowed to apply to the proper tribunal—that is, the Patent Office—where there will be the opportunity of securing such explanation of the process and of the language used as may be necessary to enable the tribunal to decide whether amendment by way of disclaimer only ought to be allowed. This being so, I think it better not to indicate any view of my own. The application will be dealt with on its merits and without any intimation from this court as to the course the Comptroller ought to take. It will be necessary for us to hear arguments upon the terms as to costs and otherwise which ought to be imposed upon the patentee as a condition of this liberty.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, L.J.—I entirely agree. I think that upon an application to the court under section 19 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, for liberty to apply at the Patent Office for leave to amend a specification by way of disclaimer the court has no concern with the terms of the proposed disclaimer except for the purpose of guiding it in the exercise of the discretion conferred by the section as to whether liberty shall or shall not be given; for the decision whether a disclaimer shall be allowed or not, rests with the Patent Office, and not with the court. I understand that this was the view taken by Kekewich, J., and the Court of Appeal in In re Armstrong's Patent, 14 R. P. C. 753, and Byrne, J., in In re Chatwood's Patent, 36 R. P. C. 371, and I did not intend to take any other view in the case of In re Owen's Patent, 15 R. P. C. 755, to which I still adhere. I should like also to point out that disclaimer is, according to the definition given by Lord Chelmsford in Ralston v. Smith, 11 H. L. Cas. 223, p. 254: "The renunciation of some previous claim actually or apparently made or supposed to be made." In the present case the patentee proposes to disclaim three out of six heads of claim contained in the specification, and the proposed disclaimer primâ facie falls within the definition. But whether this be so or not, and I am not expressing any concluded opinion upon it, I am unable, from mere perusal of the specification, to satisfy myself that the proposed amendment is not one by way of disclaimer within the meaning of the statute. And in these circumstances I think the patentee ought to be allowed to submit the question to the statutory tribunal by which such questions are to be decided.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., agreed.

Appeal allowed with costs on terms.

Solicitors for the appellants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitors for the respondents, Wilson, Bristows, & Carpmael.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Nov. 10.

RISDON IRON AND LOCOMOTIVE WORKS v. FURNESS. (a.)

Conflict of laws—English company—Business carried on in foreign state—Debts incurred abroad—Company wound up—Shareholder personally liable for debts under law of foreign state—Attempt to enforce payment in English court.

An English company, incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Acts as a limited company, was formed for the purpose of acquiring and working mines in (among other countries) the United States of America. By the articles of association the directors were empowered to do all things necessary to comply with the requirements of the law of any country where the company might carry on business. The company acquired and worked mines in the State of California, and for that purpose the company had to be registered and was duly registered there, and it incurred debts there in the purchase of machinery from the plaintiffs in that state. By the law of the State of California each stockholder of a corporation is made individually liable for debts contracted for by the corporation according to the proportion which his holding bears to the whole of the subscribed capital of the company. The company having become insolvent, the plaintiffs sued the defendant, a shareholder of the company, in this country, for his proportion of the price of the machinery.

Held, that the defendant was not liable, as the facts did not show that he authorized the company to enter into contracts in California so as to pledge his personal credit for the price of the goods supplied, and the general power given by the memorandum and articles of association to the directors to carry on business in foreign countries was subject to the fundamental condition of a limited liability on the part of the shareholders, the company being registered in England as a limited joint stock company.

Decision of Kennedy, J. (1 K. B. 304, 53 W. R. Dig. 26), affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Kennedy, J.

The plaintiff company sought to recover from Sir Christopher Furness, M.P., as a shareholder in the Copper King (Limited)—a company incorporated and registered in England as a joint stock company under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1898, which owned mining property and carried on business in California—a sum of money in respect of work done for, and goods supplied to, that company in California by the plaintiff company.

The plaintiff company was incorporated in California and there carried on the business of general machinery manufacturers.

In 1902 the plaintiff company supplied machinery to and did work for the Copper King (Limited) to the value of 10,000dols. which had not been paid for when that company was wound up. According to Californian law a shareholder, although he had paid all his calls, remained personally and individually liable in proportion to his holding for the debts of the company in which he was a shareholder; and the plaintiff company claimed that the Copper King (Limited) having conformed to the laws of California, Sir Christopher Furness as a shareholder was responsible for his portion of the debt mentioned above.

For the defence it was contended that the question of liability must be determined entirely by English law, and that as the liability of the shareholders in the Copper King (Limited) was limited strictly to paying up in full for their shares under the Companies Acts, the action was not maintainable.

At the trial Kennedy, J., held that the defendant's liability was limited by the Companies Acts under which the Copper King (Limited) was registered, and that an English court could not recognize, therefore, as a valid cause of action a claim in respect of debts of the company arising by virtue of the law of a foreign country which was inconsistent with the shareholders' liability according to English law, and that any proceedings by the plaintiff company to enlarge the liability of a shareholder beyond that fixed by the constitution of the company must be held in an English court to be ultra vires. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

From that judgment the company appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Ernest Pollock, K.C., for the plaintiffs.—The cause of action against the defendant is a transitory cause of action, and as he clearly would be liable to contribute to the debt in California, he is clearly liable here. Under the laws of that state a company must be registered there before it is allowed to carry on business, and the Copper King (Limited) was so registered. Instead of adopting the roundabout procedure of obtaining a judgment against the defendant in California and then suing on that judgment here, the plaintiff company have brought the action here. The articles of association "empower the company to carry on business abroad and to take any such step as might be necessary to comply with any statutory enactment, rule or regulation in any country, colony, or place where the company might carry on business." The articles of association are binding on the defendant, and by those articles, the company being empowered to carry on business in California, and for that purpose being registered there according to Californian law, the defendant along with the other shareholders is rendered liable personally for the debts of the company contracted there in accordance with Californian law. The fact that the company had been registered and was carrying on business in California would per se be sufficient to make the defendant as a shareholder personally liable for its debt without any specific notice being given him as to his increased liability: Bank of Australasia v. Harding, 9 C. B. 661; Bank of Australasia v. Nias, 16 Q. B. 717; Copin v. Adamson, 24 W. R. 85, L. R. 9 Ex. 345, 1 Ex. D. 17. The defendant in fact made the company his agent to incur legal liability on his behalf. The memorandum of association is wide enough to support this proposition, for it includes power to do "all other things incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects"—i.e., the carrying on of the mining business in, among other parts of the world, the State of California. In Lindley on Companies (6th ed.), vol. 2, p. 1222, it is said "the right of a corporation to sue in a foreign country, as well as its right to contract in a foreign country, are both based, not on the law of the state creating the body corporate, but on the extent to which the foreign country chooses to recognize that law." The learned author adds "that it is curious, however, that this point should never have been discussed or formally decided in this country": see also Story on Conflict of Laws (8th ed.), s. 106, p. 175, note. The point that has really to be decided is whether the law of California imposed upon the defendant a liability inconsistent with the constitution of the company; for, if it was inconsistent, it would not be enforceable in this country. It is impossible to hold that the law of California is inconsistent with the constitution of the company, having regard to the object with which that company was formed. The case of Pinney v. Nelson, (1901) 183 U. S. Rep. 144, is in point. Kennedy, J., overlooked a passage at p. 146 of the report which shows that under the law of the State of Colorado there is a limitation of liability of shareholders of a company. It is clear that if the defendant knew the law of California and agreed to the company trading there, he would be bound by that law, although it was not expressly mentioned in the articles of association. The defendant as a shareholder authorized the directors to take all necessary steps to comply with any statutory enactments in any country where the company might carry on business, and whether the defendant knew of this personal liability cast on him by the law of California or not he is bound by it: Lloyd v. Guibert, (1865) L. R. 1 Q. B. 115; Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 1 Smith's Leading Cases (11th ed.), p. 627.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and D. C. Leck, for the defendant, were not heard.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Kennedy, J., upon what is the modern equivalent for a demurrer, as a question of law has been raised upon the pleadings before the facts of the case are definitely ascertained. We have, therefore, to decide this point upon the facts as they are stated in the pleadings, and those facts are shortly these: The defendant was a member of a limited company registered under the Companies Act, 1862-1898, and among the objects for which the company was incorporated were these: "(a) To acquire any gold, copper, silver, or other mines, mining rights, and auriferous land in the United States of America, Australasia, and elsewhere, concessions, grants, decrees, rights, powers, privileges, or contracts from any government, company, state, sovereign, or authority, supreme, municipal, local, or otherwise, which might seem to the said company capable of being turned to account and to work, develop, carry out, exercise, and turn to account the same; (b) to search for, prospect, examine, and explore any territories and places in the United States of America, Australasia, and elsewhere, and to employ and equip expeditions, explorers, experts, and other agents; (c) to search for, crush, win, get, quarry, smelt, calcine, refine, dress, amalgamate, manipulate, and prepare for market, auriferous quartz and ore and mineral substances of all kinds, whether auriferous or not, and to carry on any metallurgical operations which might seem conducive to any of the said company's objects; (d) to purchase, hire, or otherwise acquire, use, maintain, sell, exchange, or otherwise deal with or dispose of and turn to account engines, wagons, steam and other ships, barges, plant, machinery, live and dead stock, hides, skins, fat, and other animal products, implements, stores, and materials of every kind requisite for any of the purposes of the said company, and to acquire by purchase, lease, or otherwise any lands or buildings, real or personal property, easements, rights, or privileges which the said company might think suitable or convenient for any purposes of its business; (e) to carry out all or any of the foregoing objects in any parts of the world, and either as principals or agents, or in partnership or conjunction with any other person, firm, association, or company; (f) to do all such other things as were incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects."

By article 87 of the articles of association the directors were empowered (D) "to appoint, in order to execute any instrument or transact any business abroad, any person or persons, the attorney or attorneys of the board or the said company, with such powers as they deem fit, including power to appear before all proper authorities and make all necessary declarations so as to enable the company's operations to be validly carried on abroad. (L) To do all such other things and take such steps as might be then or might at any time become necessary so as to comply with any statutory enactment, rule, or regulation in any country, colony, or place where the company might carry on business, or where all or any of the property and undertaking of the company might be situate."

The company, with a view to carrying on business in California, caused itself to be registered there, and the law of that state imposes on companies trading there certain conditions, one of which is that no corporation organized outside the limits of the state shall be allowed to transact any business within the state on more favourable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of the state. Therefore the company, as a condition precedent to its carrying on business in California, had to be, and was, registered in California. Another condition was that each stockholder was individually and personally liable for such proportion of its debts and liabilities as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital, stock, or shares of the corporation, and any creditor of the corporation may institute joint or several actions against any of its stockholders for the proportion of the claims payable by each. There is, further, a provision to this effect: "The liability of each stockholder of a corporation formed under the laws of any other state or territory of the United States, or of any foreign country, and doing business within this state, shall be the same as the liability of a stockholder of a corporation created under the constituti n and laws of this state."

It appears, therefore, that by the law of the State of California a remedy is given to a creditor of a company not merely against the company with which the contract was made, but against the individual shareholders in proportion to their holdings in the company. That individual liability could not, and does not, arise by reason merely that the person is a shareholder of the company, and if it is to be held that by reason of the company of which he is a member entering into contracts and carrying on business in California, his liability as a member of that company is altered, it must be on the ground that he had authorized the company to carry on business there on the terms that he should become liable according to the law of California, and not according to the constitution of the company of which he was a member. I do not express any opinion as to how the case would stand if the defendant were shown to have in fact assented to the company carrying on business in California on the the terms that he should incur personal liability in accordance with the law of that state. If it were shown, or if facts were proved from which it could be inferred, that he had authorized the mode of trading under the particular conditions which imposed liability on him, the case might be different. It is not, however, necessary to decide that point, because in this case it is sought to infer liability merely from the provisions in the memorandum of association under which the company caused itself to be registered in California and carried on business there. But can the court from the provisions in the memorandum and articles of association of the company, and the fact that the company did carry on business in California, infer there is this personal liability on the defendant? In my opinion, upon these facts the court cannot do so, and ought not to infer that the defendant had given authority to the directors to pledge his credit, as has been suggested by Mr. Lush for the plaintiffs. In my opinion it is not proved as a fact, nor do the facts as stated ground any such inference. I entirely agree with my brother Kennedy that it might be that there was a general power given to the company to carry on business in a foreign country, but underlying that power was the fundamental fact that the company was a limited liability company, and that such power must be taken as not inconsistent with the constitution of the company. It could not be inferred from the mere fact of those powers that the company was released from the underlying condition of its existence. The memorandum and articles of association of the company authorized the limited company to carry on business abroad, and they only authorized it subject to that condition of limited liability. Certain authorities have been cited. All the English authorities are consistent with the view which I have expressed. In two of the cases—Bank of Australasia v. Harding and Bank of Australasia v. Nias—the shareholders were held liable, but in each case the shareholder was made liable as having expressly authorized the act. In Copin v. Adamson it was held that the defendant's liability was to be measured by the authority given by him to the company or its directors. It was then said that a decision in the American courts went the other way. That case—Pinney v. Nelson—is distinguishable, in my opinion, upon the ground stated by Kennedy, J. There, by the constitution of the company itself, there were provisions from which the court inferred an express contract that the business of the company should be carried on in a named foreign state, and every member of the company must be taken to have authorized the company to carry on business there with all the attendant liabilities. That was the inference of fact which was drawn in that case, whether it was right or wong. There are no facts here from which we can, or ought to, draw such an inference. It seems to me, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge was right and this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the judgments of my brother Kennedy and my lord. The sole question is whether in the circumstances stated in the pleadings the defendant must be taken by implied authority to have contracted with the plaintiffs to be liable individually for a portion of the debt due to them from the Copper King Co., of which he was a shareholder. I need only say that in my opinion the facts fail to establish any such authority or contract. There are, admittedly, no facts that could be relied upon in support of that proposition beyond the mere fact that the defendant became a shareholder in the company with the powers conferred upon it by the memorandum and articles of association, and that the company carried on business in California. In my view the memorandum and articles of association, rightly construed, cannot be treated as an authority by every shareholder of the company to the company or its directors or agents to carry on business in a foreign country so as to make the shareholder liable beyond the limited liability under which he came as a member of the company by virtue of the English law. If this be the correct view—and it appears to me clear that it is—the appeal fails. If there was no authority to the company to enter into a contract with the plaintiffs so as to render the defendant liable as suggested, there is clearly no contract rendering him liable to the plaintiffs; and, if so, there is no way by which the defendant can be made liable in this country. As has been frequently pointed out, the shareholder and the company are different entities. A judgment obtained against a company does not affect the shareholder. It is not a judgment against the shareholders. If the shareholders and the company are regarded as two different entities, no foreign country could make a law which would be enforceable in this country if the company traded in that foreign country, to the effect that the shareholders would from that fact alone be held to contract personally so as to render themselves liable upon the engagements of the company. The decision of the learned judge appears to me to be perfectly right, and consequently the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The fundamental rule under which the company of which the defendant is a member is carried on in England is that the personal credit of a shareholder cannot be pledged. It is said that the memorandum and articles of association rescind that fundamental principle and enable the company to carry on its business abroad as if the company were not registered in England as a limited company, and therefore as if the liability of the shareholders was unlimited. To establish that proposition—and I will assume that it could be established—it would be necessary to show an implied authority—for there is clearly no express authority—given by the shareholders to the company to enter into contracts abroad so as to render them personally liable thereon to the foreign creditors. The plaintiffs in this case fail to show even knowledge on the part of the defendant of the existence in California, where the work of the company was being carried on, of a law having that effect, and they are unable to show any request or assent by the defendant. I am wholly unable to find any implied authority of that sort, much less any request to the company to enter into contracts abroad with that result. That being so, it seems clear that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Balfour Allan & North.

Solicitors for the defendant, W. A. Crump & Son.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Jan. 26; Feb. 1.

In re GASKELL AND WALTERS' CONTRACT. (a.)

Convict—Felony—Administrator of convict's property—Estate tail—Power of administrator to disentail—Forfeiture Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23), ss. 10, 12.

A person appointed under the Forfeiture Act, 1870, to be administrator of a convict's property for the term of the convict's disability is not competent to disentail an estate tail vested in him as administrator.

Adjourned summons.

This was a purchaser's summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874.

The facts were as follows:

On the 15th of March, 1905, Charles Francis Thomas was convicted of felony and sentenced to three years' penal servitude.

On the 1st of June, 1905, the then Home Secretary committed the custody and management of the convict's property to Frank Hill Gaskell (hereinafter called the vendor) during his Majesty's pleasure for the purpose of dealing with the estate and interest of the convict in the manner prescribed by the provisions of the Forfeiture Act, 1870. The property of the convict at the date of his conviction included a rent-charge of £300 a year to which he was entitled for an estate tail.

By an indenture of the 5th of July, 1905, the vendor purported to bar his estate tail in this rent-charge.

By a contract for sale dated the 3rd of November, 1905, the vendor agreed to sell, and William Walters agreed to purchase, the rent-charge in fee simple.

The said William Walters objected to the title of the vendor on the ground that the Forfeiture Act does not confer power on the administrator of a convict's property to disential an estate tail of the convict, and he took out this summons for a declaration that the vendor had not shown a good title.

The question to be decided turned upon the construction of sections 10 and 12 of the Forfeiture Act. Section 10 provides that "upon the appointment of any such administrator in manner aforesaid all the real and personal property, including choses in action, to which the convict named in such appointment was at the time of his conviction, or shall afterwards, while he shall continue subject to the operations of this Act, become or be entitled, shall vest in such administrator for all the estate and interest of such convict therein."

Section 12 provides that "the administrator shall have absolute power to let, mortgage, sell, convey, and transfer any part of such property as to him shall seem fit."

Tyldesley Jones, for the purchaser.—Express words are necessary to enable the administrator of a convict to disentail his estate tail. Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the trustee in bankruptcy is given the power by section 56, sub-section 5, to deal with the estate tail of the bankrupt "in such manner as the bankrupt might have dealt with it." It is evident, therefore, that the Legislature considers such express words to be necessary. In the Forfeiture Act no such express words are used, and the vendor was not, therefore, competent to disentail the estate tail: In re Starkie, 3 Myl. & K. 247; Sturgis v. Morse, 8 W. R 737. 2 D. F. & J. 223.

S. R. Earle, for the vendor.—The powers given to the administrator of a convict's estate by the Forfeiture Act are very wide and must be taken to include the power to disentail an estate tail. The clause in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, appeared in the first Bankruptcy Act, and has been copied into every Bankruptcy Act since. No inference can, therefore, be drawn by its appearing in the Act of 1883: Carr v. Anderson, 51 W. R. 165, [1903] 1 Ch. 90.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving a considered judgment, said that the proper answer to the objection depended on the construction of the statute. It was competent for Parliament to provide that the administrator should have the right claimed by him, but undoubtedly express words were required for the purpose. What was vested in the convict was an estate in fee determinable by the entry of issue, and according to all canons of construction no general words would suffice to vest in the administrator a fee simple absolute. As a general rule, in construing an Act of Parliament purporting to amend the law, it is right to ascertain and bear in mind what the law was prior to the amendment, but in this case the old law does not render much assistance in determining the intention of the Legislature. The old law, which will be found stated in Viner's Abridgment under the head of "Forfeiture (k)" does not lend any countenance to the view that the Legislature contemplated the vesting in the administrator the extensive power which is contended for on his behalf. Section 10 of the Act provides that all the real and personal property of the convict shall vest in the administrator for all the estate and interest of such convict therein, and section 12 gives him absolute power to sell, convey, and transfer any part of such property. It is clear on the construction of section 12 that the administrator can sell, convey, and transfer only that which is vested in him, and that, according to the equally clear construction of section 10, is only the real and personal property of the convict which is vested in the administrator for all the estate and interest of such convict therein, and not for any other estate or interest. The legal consequence of this is that the administrator has vested in him and can sell a fee simple determinable and not a fee simple absolute. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, following the lines of such preceding statutes as contain similar provisions, expressly enables the trustee to deal with any property to which the bankrupt is beneficially entitled as tenant in tail in the same manner as the bankrupt might have dealt with it, and it is a sound argument that this would not have been done if the provision for vesting the property of the bankrupt in the trustee, which is couched in as wide language as that employed in the Forfeiture Act, had already given the trustee the power thus conferred. This view is strongly confirmed by the authorities: see In re Starkie and Sturgis v. Morse, and especially the concluding remarks of Turner, L.J., in the latter case.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Objection upheld.

Solicitors for the purchaser, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Collins & Woods, Swansea.

Solicitors for the vendor, Gibson & Weldon, for Gaskell, Cardiff.

Chan. Div. Swinfen Eady, J. } Jan. 16, 20, 30; Feb. 8.

In re LONDON UNITED TRAMWAYS ACT, 1900. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Vendor and purchaser—Sale of copyholds—Vendor dying before completion—Fine on admittance of vendor's heir—Vendor's costs of title—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 82.

A company agreed to purchase copyholds under the Lands Clauses Acts. Vendor died before completion.

Held, that the company were bound to pay the costs of constituting a proper person to convey, including the costs of procuring the admission of the vendor's heir as tenant and the fine payable thereon.

In re Liverpool Improvement Act, 16 W. R. 667, 5 Eq. 282; In re Dublin (South) City Market Co., 25 L. R. Ir. 265; In re Lloyd and North London Railway Act, 1861, 44 W. R. 522, [1896] 2 Ch. 397; and In re Bear Island Defence Works and Doyle, [1903] 1 Ir. R. 164, applied.

Summons to review taxation.

This was a summons asking that it might be decided whether the master was right in allowing in the taxation of a purchase under the Lands Clauses Acts a sum of £255 16s. 6d. paid for fine and fees to the Steward of the Manor of Hampton Court on the 30th of December, 1904.

By an agreement dated the 16th of February, 1903, and made between Charles Kernot Butt as vendor of the one part and the London United Tramways (1901) (Limited) of the other part, the vendor, as trustee of the will of William Babb, agreed to sell and the company agreed to purchase the inheritance, according to the custom of the Honor and Manor of Hampton Court, of certain lands. The premises were expressed to be sold subject to all quit and other rents and incidents of tenure affecting the same, and the purchase was to be completed by the 4th of April, 1903, and, if not then completed, the company were to be at liberty to take possesion at any time after that date upon depositing the purchase-money and compensation in Parr's bank. Lastly, the company were to pay "the vendor's costs of title and conveyance as provided by the Land Clauses Act, 1845."

The purchase was not completed on the 4th of April, 1903, but the company took possession of the property under the contract. The reason for the delay was chiefly that on delivery of the abstract objections were taken to the title which the vendors alleged were unnecessary.

On the 27th of October, 1903, the vendor died, and on the 20th of December, 1904, the vendor's customary heir was admitted in order that he might surrender to the use of the purchasers. The fine payable thereon was £250, and there were also costs of the admittance.

The question raised was whether this amount came within the expression in the contract "vendor's costs of title and conveyance as provided by the Lands Clauses Act, 1845."

Christopher James, for the company, contended that the fine and fees were expenses which must have been paid by the vendors even without a sale and were not costs incurred for the purpose of making a good title only, and were thus costs to be paid by the vendors: Paramore v. Greenslade, 1 Sm. & G. 541. Secondly, the fine was not payable until after admittance; so soon as a tenant had been admitted there was a person qualified to convey and title could be given. The payment of the fine was an ulterior matter of no concern to the purchaser.

L. Mossop, for the executors of the vendor, argued that the fine was part of the necessary costs of conveyance and could not be disassociated from the act of admission to the roll, which it was admitted was a necessary preliminary to conveying to a purchaser. The fine and fees were on the same footing as the costs of taking out administration, which had been held to be a part of the purchaser's liability in several cases.

Cur. adv. vult.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in a considered judgment, stated the above facts, and then continued: It has frequently been held in purchases under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, that the company is bound to pay the costs of constituting a proper person to convey the property to them. Thus in In re Liverpool Improvement Act, 16 W. R. 667, L. R. 5 Eq. 282, where the corporation took some leasehold property after the death of the testator's executor and executrix, and it was necessary to obtain a grant of administration de bonis non in order to constitute a person to convey, Lord Romilly held that the corporation were bound to pay the costs of taking out this administration, and he overruled his own previous decision in In re The South Wales Railway Co., 14 Beav. 418. In this latter case the trustee of copyholds had died, leaving an infant as his customary heir; proceedings were taken to obtain the appointment of a proper person to surrender the property in place of the infant, and the property was surrendered to one Henry Young, who was admitted feoffee in trust for the tenant for life and remainderman. The taxing-master allowed the costs of all the proceedings to obtain a conveyance, which amounted to £55. I have endeavoured to ascertain whether this amount included the fine payable on Henry Young's admittance, but I have been unable to do so, as the order does not appear to have been drawn up. Lord Romilly overruled the taxing-master and said that he ought not to have allowed these costs. When, however, on a subsequent occasion, Lord Romilly stated that he had come to the conclusion that the case of In re The South Wales Railway Co. was wrongly decided, and in terms overruled that decision, which he said he believed stood alone, it was a distinct statement of his opinion that the £55 ought to have been allowed. The Master of the Rolls in Ireland took the same view of the statute in In re The Dublin (South) City Market Co., Ex parte Keatley, 25 L. R. Ir. 265. In that case a vendor of leaseholds in possession, in order to make a title, had to procure a grant of administration de bonis non to a former assignee of the lease, and an assignment from such administrator de bonis non to himself. The taxing-master allowed the costs of taking out administration, but not of the assignment; the Master of the Rolls, reversing the taxing-master, allowed also the costs of the assignment, as a formal link requisite to complete the title, stating that the costs of formally completing the title should be borne by the company. This decision was followed in other Irish cases, and these again were followed by Stirling, J., in In re Lloyd and the North London Railway (City Branch) Act, 1861, 44 W. R. 522, [1896] 2 Ch. 397, where the costs payable by the company were held to include the costs of taking out administration de bonis non to the testator, and administration to each of eleven legatees who had died. The learned judge there said (p. 402): "It is very desirable that the practice should be the same in both countries and I therefore follow the Irish courts." This decision came before the Court of Appeal in Ireland in In re Bear Island Defence Works and Doyle, [1903] 1 Ir. R. 164. The Master of the Rolls, affirming the taxing-master, had allowed, as part of the costs of deducing title under section 82, the costs of taking out probate or letters of administration, where necessary, and also the death duties. The War Department appealed to the Court of Appeal as regards the death duties, but the appeal was dismissed. Holmes, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, referred to Lord Romilly's decision in 1868 in In re Liverpool Improvement Act, which he said had been followed in Ireland again and again. He then referred to Stirling, J.'s, decision in In re Lloyd and the North London Railway (City Branch) Act, 1861, and added that notwithstanding Stirling, J.'s, doubt, he had been unable to find any trace of difference in the practice of the two countries. He further said that the attempt to distinguish between the duty paid to the Crown and the other costs of administration, on the ground that the former is a charge on the property, had, he believed, never been suggested before, and was wholly illogical. Under these circumstances I consider that the construction of the statute is too well settled to be now open to question, at all events before me, and that the company is liable to pay the costs and expenses of proceedings taken for the purpose of constituting a proper person to convey or assure the property to them, including the costs of procuring the admission of a tenant of copyholds in order that he may surrender to them. A distinction was sought to be drawn between the steward's fees and the fine, on the ground that the latter did not become payable until after the admittance, and that, as soon as there was an admitted tenant, a person had been duly constituted to surrender to the company, and that the payment of the fine was a subsequent matter with which the company had no concern. In my opinion this distinction is not well founded. The fine which becomes payable on admittance is as much part of the expenses of procuring a proper person to surrender as the steward's fees and legal expenses. A trustee, taking admittance and paying the fine, is entitled to have the fine declared a charge upon the copyhold estate—Cole v. Jealous, 5 Hare 51—and could not be required to surrender the property to a purchaser or to the company without provision being made for the payment of the amount. The result is that the summons fails and must be dismissed with costs.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Stanley, Wasbrough, Doggett, & Baker; T. G. Bullen.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Feb. 1, 2.

In re PARKER'S POLICIES.
PARKER v. PARKER. (a.)

Married woman—Life assurance—Policy—Appointment—After-married wife—Married Women's Property Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 93), s. 10.

Policies were taken out by a married man with trusts (expressed to be in accordance with the Married Women's Property Act, 1870) for his "widow or widow and children" as he should appoint. He appointed to an after-married wife.

Held, that she was a "wife" within the statute.

Held, also, that if she was not within the statute then the policies were not within the Act either, and she took by appointment without reference to the Act.

In re Browne's Policy, 51 W. R. 364, [1903] 1 Ch. 188, followed.

Adjourned summons.

The question asked to be determined by this summons was who was entitled to the moneys secured by two policies upon the life of Robert William Parker, a solicitor, effected with the Scottish Provident Institution.

The policies were taken out on the 6th of May, 1879, and it was recited that Parker had been duly admitted a member of the institution and that he was desirous of insuring his life in accordance with the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, for the sum of £1,000 on each policy. The policies further certified that, under the provisions of the said Act his "widow or widow and children or some or one of them in such share and proportions and interest and generally in such manner as the said Robert William Parker shall by any will or codicil thereto or by deed revocable or otherwise appoint shall be entitled to receive out of the funds of the said institution at the end of six months after the decease of the said R. W. Parker the sum of £1,000."

When the policies were effected Parker was married to a wife who died in 1881 leaving three children, the defendants to the summons. In 1886 Parker remarried, and his second wife, Louisa Agnes, survived him and was the plaintiff in this summons. There was one child of the second marriage.

In 1903 Parker by deed appointed the policy moneys to his wife Louisa Agnes Parker if she should survive him and become his widow for her own use and benefit absolutely, with gifts over on the failure of this event to the daughters of the appointor. Parker died in 1905.

R. Hughes, for the plaintiff.—These policies are taken out in accordance with section 10 of the Married Women's Property Act of 1870, which provides that "a policy of insurance effected by any married man, and expressed upon the face of it to be for the benefit of his wife, or of his wife and children, or any of them, shall enure and be deemed a trust for the benefit of his wife for her separate use and of his children or any of them according to the interest so expressed, and shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains, be subject to the control of the husband or to his creditors or form part of his estate." This is not confined to a wife living at the date of the policy. The words of the policy itself are "widow or widow and children," and if the second wife is outside the Act, then the policy, though expressed to be made in accordance with the Act, is also outside it, since "widow" must include an after-married wife, and the widow takes the policy money in either event.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

F. Russell, for the defendants.—The appointment to the second wife is bad as not being under the Act, and the children take as in default of appointment. "Wife" in post-nuptial settlement has been decided to mean existing wife only.

R. Hughes in reply.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, stated the facts and continued: It is admitted that the child of the second marriage takes with the children of the first marriage. The question therefore is whether the widow takes the fund as appointed, or the children take it equally as unappointed. Now it was contended that "wife" under the statute of 1870 meant wife at the date of the policy only. But there would be as much reason, so far as the statute is concerned, to make provision for a later wife as for an earlier one. Kekewich, J., decided in In re Browne's Policy, 51 W. R. 364, [1903] 1 Ch. 188, that a second wife was within the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75). Now there are small differences between the corresponding sections of the two Acts; section 10 of the earlier Act speaks of a policy of insurance effected by "any married man," whereas section 11 of the Act of 1882 says "any man." The language has been pruned in the latter Act, but I can make no difference between them. If a subsequent wife is thus within the statute, the appointment in this case is valid. But if my view is wrong, and the second wife is not within the terms of the Act, what is the alternative? The only alternative is that the settlor has introduced into the policies a stranger who is not a wife within the meaning of the Act, and has attempted to make provision for a stranger. This would not be within the Act of 1870 at all, though it would be within the words of the trusts of the policy—namely, "widow or widow and children." In that case the policy, though expressed to be in accordance with the Act, is not so, since it includes a class not included by the Act, for in my judgment "widow" means the person who at the death shall become the widow. The assured has appointed to the plaintiff by deed, and so, quacunque viâ, whether she is or is not within the statute she takes by appointment, and I so decide.

Solicitors, Hughes & Masterman.

Chan. Div. } Warrington, J. } Feb. 8.

HASKELL GOLF BALL CO. v. HUTCHISON. (a.)

Practice — Costs — Taxation — Patent — Infringement — Pleas of invalidity and non-infringement — Action dismissed with costs — Costs of issues — Patents Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 29 (6)—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 32, r. 4; ord. 65, r. 2.

Where in an action for infringement of a patent the defendant pleads both invalidity and non-infringement, and is successful upon the former plea but not upon the latter, in the case of a judgment dismissing the action with costs, it is the duty of the taxing-master to tax the defendant's costs as in an ordinary action, and to allow his costs not only with regard to the items in the particulars of objections certified by the judge under section 29 (6) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, but also with regard to the plea of non-infringement and all the other costs incurred by the defendant, except such as relate to the particulars of objections as to which no certificate is given.

Summons to review taxation.

The question raised by the summons was whether the master had properly disallowed the costs of the defendants in an action for patent infringement, in which the defendants were successful upon the plea of invalidity, except the costs of the pleadings, and with regard to two of the particulars of objections, as to which a certificate was granted at the trial.

On the 23rd of December, 1904, the plaintiffs commenced an action to restrain the defendants from infringing their patent, No. 17,554 of 1898, for "improvements in the manufacture of golf balls." The defendants raised four grounds of defence—namely, (1) That the plaintiffs were not the registered owners of the patent; (2) that the original claims in the specification were not framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge; (3) that they (the defendants) had not infringed or threatened to infringe the letters patent; (4) that the letters patent were invalid for the reasons set out in the particulars of objections.

In their particulars of objections the defendants objected to the validity of the patent upon three grounds:

1. Prior publication (a) by prior specifications and a dictionary, (b) by the manufacture of similar balls suitable for golf, racquets, and other games, and by the sale and use thereof in public by certain specified persons at certain specified dates and places, (c) by the exhibition and use in public of balls made according to the plaintiffs' alleged invention, which were imported into this country shortly prior to the date of the plaintiffs' letters patent by the plaintiffs or their agents or other persons.

2. That the specification did not sufficiently describe and ascertain the nature of the invention upon certain specified grounds.

3. For want of sufficient subject-matter to support letters patent.

Under objection 1 (a) and (b) a mass of particulars were set out particularizing specific prior publications and instances of prior user.

The action came on for trial on the 29th of May, 1905, and on the 28th of June, 1905, Buckley, J., held that the plaintiffs had failed upon the issue of novelty, and dismissed the action with costs. His lordship also granted a certificate under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 29 (6), that two of the instances of prior user by G. F. and D. S., numbered 1 b 10 and 1 b 15, in the particulars of objections, were proper and reasonable.

The defendants subsequently carried in their costs for taxation, the bill as delivered amounting to the sum of £4,283. The plaintiffs objected to certain of these costs, and in the result the taxing-master allowed the bill at £796 or thereabouts. The defendants objected to the taxation upon the ground: (1) That such costs only had been allowed "as would have been incurred in an action where the sole issue was the question of prior publication of the plaintiffs' invention by G. F. and D. S."; (2) that the taxing-master had not allowed the defendants the costs of proving certain facts which they had given a notice to the plaintiffs to admit.

In his answer to these objections the taxing-master stated that he had taxed the costs on the footing that there were more issues than one of prior publication, and that he had held that the defendants were entitled to the general costs of the cause, but had found the amount to be a comparatively small one having regard to the fact that the defendants had not recovered on the two important defences set up in the statement of defence (paragraphs 3 and 4) as to non-infringement and invalidity. The taxing-master also stated that he had read the judgment and thought it clear that the judge considered that the defendants did infringe, but that there was practically no contest at all under this head. In his (the taxing-master's) opinion, the defendants had not succeeded on the issue of infringement, and the evidence of Professor B. and other witnesses of that class dealt with matters mentioned in the third head of the particulars of objections and in respect of which no certificate had been given.

(a.) Reported by E. WAVELL RIDGES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

With regard to the facts, which the defendants had given notice to admit, the taxing-master stated that the admission of certain of them should not have been asked for, as the plaintiffs had already admitted them, whilst with regard to the remainder they had not been admitted but were proved at the trial by witnesses whose names (with one exception) were in the particulars of objections, and in respect of whom no certificate had been given. He had therefore disallowed the costs in respect of such witnesses.

On the 21st of November, 1905, the defendants issued this summons asking that their objections to the taxation might be allowed, and the matter referred back to the taxing-master to vary his certificate accordingly.

Bousfield, K.C., and J. C. Graham, for the defendants.—This is an objection to the principle of the taxation, and therefore under ord. 65, rr. 39, 41, there is no need to set out particular items. The taxing-master has no power to say that the defendants should be deprived of the costs of the issue upon which they failed. He should have followed the formal order which dismissed the action with costs, and not have referred to the oral judgment. He has no power to say "the court found against you on certain issues." Jenkins v. Jackson, 37 W. R. 253, 40 Ch. D, 71, is not an authority in point, because in that case there were two distinct causes of action, as shown by the plaintiff's statement of claim, and the defendants were successful upon one issue only. Here there is only one main issue and the defendants succeeded upon it. The general costs of the evidence relating to the general state of public knowledge and other matters bearing upon the construction of the patent cannot be excluded, because they are necessary to put the judge into a state of knowledge with regard to the facts. It would be impossible to fight a patent action without going into the construction of the patent. Here very difficult questions as to the nature of the plaintiffs' ball arose, and a large part of the brief was concerned in considering what the patent really was, so as to put the court into a position to construe the specification. In Holliday v. Heppenstall Bros., 37 W.R. 662, 41 Ch. D. 109, the Court of Appeal said that you must not give particulars in the particulars of objections as to the state of general knowledge, but that is not saying that you must give no evidence at all with regard to it. All that section 29 (6) of the Patents Act, 1883, says is that the costs only of the uncertified particulars should not be allowed. But if witnesses whose names appear in the particulars of objections are used to prove the state of general knowledge and matters relating to the construction of the specification, the costs relating to that part of their evidence should be allowed. In any case the taxing-master should have construed the order as it stood, and should not have gone into the reasons of the judge.

Norton, K.C., and A. J. Walter, for the plaintiffs.—The taxing-master was quite right in disallowing all costs except those with regard to the two certified items and the costs of the pleadings. It was open to the defendants to have pleaded invalidity only, but by their defence they raised the distinct issue of non-infringement. When that is done, and the defendants, as here, are not successful on the ground of non-infringement, they cannot have the costs occasioned by the plea of non-infringement: Phillips v. Ivel Cycle Co., 62 L. T. 392, 38 W. R. Dig. 52. By ord. 65, r. 2, "the costs of the several issues respectively, both in law and fact, shall, unless otherwise ordered, follow the event." Jones v. Curling, 32 W. R. 651, 13 Q. B. D. 252, was an action for the recovery of several closes of land, and it was held that the costs of the different issues were distributable. Here, as in that case, the defendants have succeeded upon one issue, but they have failed upon others; therefore the costs of the various issues are distributable. The taxing-master has only followed the rule adopted in Jones v. Curling and also in Jenkins v. Jackson.

Bousfield, K.C., replied.

WARRINGTON, J.—This is an application to review the taxation of the defendants' costs in an action for patent infringement, the taxing-master having treated the matter as if the only issue was whether the patent was anticipated by two of the instances of prior user set out in the particulars of objection. Is that the right principle? In their defence the defendants deny that the claims in the plaintiffs' specification were framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge; they also deny infringement, and allege that the patent is invalid for the reasons set out in the particulars of objections. [His lordship read the particulars of objections as set out above.] In the result the plaintiffs failed on the issue of novelty, and the action was dismissed with costs, the judge granting a certificate that two of the items in the particulars of objections relating to prior user—namely, 1 b 10 and 1 b 15, were proper and reasonable. By section 29 (6) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, it is enacted that "they" (the plaintiff or defendant) "respectively shall not be allowed any costs in respect of any particulars delivered by them unless the same is certified by the court or a judge to have been proven or to have been reasonable and proper without regard to the general costs of the case." What is the result of this sub-section in the present case? I think it was the taxing-master's duty to tax the costs just as in an ordinary action, except that he must not allow the costs with regard to the particulars not certified. His duty as to disallowances is limited to that. Here the taxing-master has considered not only the formal order, but the judge's reasons, and although the general costs were given to the defendants he has disallowed all except those which relate to the two particulars certified. Ord. 65, r. 2, has been cited in support of the plaintiff's contention, and this is a composite order. The first part dates from 1883, and was intended to be merely declaratory of the previous practice. The second part was introduced in 1902, and provides for the case where a party is given costs except "so far as they have been occasioned or incurred by or relate to some particular issue or part of his proceedings." It is the first part of the rule which relates to the present question, but I do not think the rule has any application at all to a case like this. "The costs . . . shall . . . follow the event," means that where there is a distinct issue the costs of proving all facts material to that issue follow the event of the issue. Jones v. Curling was an action with regard to several closes of land, and the defendants were right with regard to some and wrong with regard to others. Such a case would clearly be within ord. 65, r. 2. It is suggested here that where the defence consists of two parts, non-infringement and invalidity, that the defendant has raised two distinct issues. I do not think that is so; there is only one issue—namely, has the defendant infringed the plaintiffs' legal right?—though the action is defended upon two grounds. The taxing-master has disallowed all the costs of the professional witnesses, though part might have been allowed without reference to the particulars of objections. I think the taxing-master should look further into this matter. The taxing-master has also disallowed the costs of proving certain facts which the defendants gave notice to admit, and which the plaintiffs did not admit, on the ground that these facts were proved at the trial by witnesses whose names appeared in the particulars of objection. I do not understand what the taxing-master means. If the facts as to which the notice to admit was given were in connection with the objections set out in the particulars, then I think he would have been right. But if the defendants were right in giving the notice to admit, and if, through the plaintiffs not having admitted them, they were forced to call witnesses to prove them, then I think it is immaterial whether the names of the witnesses appear in the particulars of objections or not. I must, therefore, remit the matter to the taxing-master for reconsideration, and to allow the defendants' costs except those incurred with respect to the particulars of objections as to which no certificate was granted. The plaintiffs may have leave to appeal.

Solicitors, Burton, Yeates, & Hart; Wilson, Bristows, & Carpmael.

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) — Nov. 27, 28.

JAMES JOICEY & CO. AND EDEN'S EXECUTORS v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Compensation for leaving coal unworked under railway—Basis of compensation—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 78.

Where the lessee of coal mines lying under or adjacent to a line of railway is desirous of working such mines, and the railway company has, under section 78 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, notified him that they are willing to pay him compensation for not working such mines,

Held, that the measure of compensation payable by the railway company was the profit which would have been made on the reserved coal, and not the loss which the owner or lessee might suffer by reason of the interference of the railway company with the working of the mine.

Award stated by an arbitrator in the form of a special case.

By the North-Eastern Railway Act, 1887, the railway company were authorized to make and maintain a railway upon certain lands in the county of Durham, of which the predecessors in title of S. A. D. Eden were the owners for an estate for life. Messrs. James Joicey & Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called the coal company) were by virtue of a lease dated the 6th of February, 1886, entitled to hold and to win, work, and carry away all the coal within and under the said lands for a term of twenty-one years from the 1st of January, 1886.

The Act incorporated (inter alia) the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the railway company duly took a portion of the said lands and constructed a railway thereon.

On the 11th of August, 1892, the coal company being then desirous of working the coal under or within the prescribed distance from three separate bridges forming part of the said railway, duly gave notice to the railway company in conformity with section 78 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the railway company, on the 2nd of November, 1892, by notice required the coal company to leave certain percentages of coal unworked as mentioned in the said notice for the support of the said railway (thereinafter called the reserved coal), and expressed their willingness to pay to the persons entitled all such compensation as might be payable according to law.

At the dates at which the right to such compensation accrued, the reversion expectant on the determination of the said lease (thereinafter referred to as the said reversion) was vested in the said S. A. D. Eden as owner in fee, and he and the coal company according to their respective interests claimed compensation from the railway company for the reserved coal.

S. A. D. Eden died on the 15th of July, 1904, and the claimants were his executors. The quantity of the reserved coal is 6,156 tons, and forms part of a seam called the Shield Row Seam. If the reserved coal had not been required to be left unworked it would in the ordinary way and regular course of working have been worked by the coal company at various dates previous to the 31st of December, 1903, and the coal company would have made out of the working of such coal a profit of £730, and the said S. A. D. Eden would also have received as rent in respect thereof the sum of £155.

The special case proceeded in the following terms:

"(11) The average annual quantity of coal produced by the coal company out of the said seam continued unaltered until about the month of May, 1894, but since that month the output has been sensibly diminished. A diminution of output would have occurred in the ordinary course, even if the reserved coal had not been required by the railway company to be left unworked, but the effect of leaving unworked the reserved coal has been to accelerate such diminution, and also to accelerate the time when it became necessary for the coal company in the ordinary prosecution of their workings to work coal more expensive to get. It is admitted that the effect of such acceleration has been to subject the coal company to increased expenses and loss, and for the purposes of this case these are agreed at £100. There is left unworked in the said Shield Row Seam under the said lands a quantity of coal which the coal company would not in the ordinary course be able to exhaust within the term of the before-mentioned lease, which expires on the 1st of January, 1907.

12. Under these circumstances the railway company contend that the coal company have only suffered loss to the extent of £100, and that this amount and no more is the compensation to which the coal company are entitled in respect of the reserved coal having been left by them in conformity with the requirements of the railway company.

13. The coal company, on the other hand, contend that the proper measure of compensation which they are entitled to receive from the railway company is the amount of money which they would have made by the working of the reserved coal if such coal had not been required by the railway company to be left unworked—viz., the above-mentioned sum of £730.

14. The railway company admit that the persons entitled to the said reversion are entitled to compensation in consequence of the service of the said notice of the 2nd of November,

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1892; but they contend that the measure of such compensation is not the rent which the said S. A. D. Eden would have received in respect of the reserved coal if it had been worked, but the diminution in the value of the said reversion at the date of the service of the said notice in consequence of such service, that it is to say, the difference between the value of the said reversion on the 2nd of November, 1892, had the said notice not been served, and the value of the said reversion immediately after the service of the said notice.

15. It is admitted by all parties that if the contention of the coal company set out in paragraph 13 is well founded, the executors of the said S. A. D. Eden are entitled to receive the sum of £155, and no more, being the rent or royalty which would have been payable by the coal company to the said S. A. D. Eden in his lifetime in respect of the reserved coal, if that coal had been worked by them, and that nothing is payable to the other persons interested in the said reversion.

16. If the contentions of the railway company as set out in paragraph 14 are well founded, the compensation payable in respect of the lessors' interest is for the purposes of this case agreed at £310, but it is a question to whom such compensation ought to be paid.

17. If the court should be of opinion that the contention of the coal company set out in paragraph 13 is well founded, then I award that the railway company shall pay to them the sum of £730 and shall pay to the said executors the sum of £155.

18. If, on the other hand, the court should be of opinion that the contentions of the railway company set out in paragraphs 12 and 14 are correct, then I award that the railway company should pay to the coal company the sum of £100, that the railway company shall pay to the person interested in the said reversion the sum of £310, and I submit to the court whether such compensation is payable to the said executors, or to the tenant for life, or to the trustees of the estates settled by the will of the said S. A. D. Eden as capital moneys."

By the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 78: "If the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the railway or any of the works connected therewith, or within the prescribed distance, or where no distance shall be prescribed forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier shall give to the company notice in writing of his intention so to do thirty days before the commencement of working, and upon the receipt of such notice it shall be lawful for the company to cause such mines to be inspected by any person appointed by them for that purpose, and if it appear to the company that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railway, and if the company be willing to make compensation for such mines or any part thereof to such owner, lessee, or occupier thereof, then he shall not work or get the same; and if the company and such owner, lessee, or occupier do not agree as to the amount of such compensation the same shall be settled as in the cases of disputed compensation."

C. A. Russell, K.C. (W. D. Benson with him), for the claimants.—Section 78 provides that the railway must pay compensation for "such mines." The claimants are, therefore, entitled to recover the amount which they would have made by working the reserved coal.

He cited Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co., 52 W. R. 193, [1903] A. C. 426, and Smith v. Great Western Railway Co., 26 W. R. 130, 3 App. Cas. 165.

Cripps, K.C. (Ryde with him), for the respondents.—The measure of compensation due is not the amount of profit which would have been made on working the reserved coal. The coal company are entitled to be compensated for the increased cost incurred in working other coal, and the reversioners are entitled to be compensated not only for the mere loss of royalties on the reserved coal, but for the injury to the reversioner due to the fact that the coal company have taken an amount of coal which would not have been reached if the coal company had been able to work out the reserved coal.

He cited Great Northern Railway Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 49 W. R. 261, [1901] 1 K. B 416.

BIGHAM, J.—This case is one of difficulty, but I do not think that it would be of any advantage if I were to take time to consider my judgment. The question that I have to decide turns on section 78 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. [The learned judge read the section, and continued:] Now what is it that the railway company are to pay for? They are to be willing to make compensation for "such mines"—that is to say, in this case for the coal which the coal owner is precluded from working by reason of the railway company having given him notice not to work it. The section does not say that the owner of the mine is to be compensated for the loss which he may suffer by reason of the interference of the railway company with the working of the mine; if it did, I think there would be a good deal to be said for Mr. Cripps' contention that all the surrounding circumstances must be looked at. But those are not the words of the Act. He is to be paid for the coal which he is prevented by the action of the railway company from bringing to the surface. I must, therefore, find in favour of the claimants and direct that the railway company shall pay to Messrs. Joicey & Co. the sum of £730, and to the executors the sum of £155.

Judgment for claimants.

Solicitors for claimants, Rawle & Johnston, for Cooper & Goolger, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Solicitor for respondents, A. Kaye Butterworth, York.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Feb. 16.

DARTFORD BREWERY CO. (LIMITED) v. MOSELEY. (a.)

Practice — Costs — Writ of possession — Jurisdiction — Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 5.

The Court has power, under section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, to allow the successful plaintiff in an action for the recovery of land the costs of and incidental to a writ of possession.

Appeal from an order of A. T. Lawrence, J., allowing the plaintiffs in an action for recovery of land the costs of a writ of possession.

The action was brought by landlords against a tenant, and the claim indorsed on the writ of summons was for possession of a house and premises, rent, and mesne profits.

On a summons under order 14, an order was made that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to sign judgment for possession with the costs of the application, the claim for rent being allowed to stand over. Judgment was signed accordingly, and a writ of possession was issued in the form given in Appendix H, No 8, to the Rules of the Supreme Court.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs proceeded to issue execution for the costs, and, being desirous that their writ of fi. fa. should cover the costs of the writ of possession, they took out a summons asking for an order that the costs of and incidental to the writ of possession issued in pursuance of the judgment might be taxed and paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs.

The master refused to make an order, but the judge reversed his decision and made the order asked for.

The defendant appealed.

C. N. Tindale Davis, for the defendant.—There was no jurisdiction to make this order. No statute or rule gives any power to allow a successful plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of land the costs of the writ of possession. Such costs are not part of the judgment debt; they do not constitute a debt due from the defendant at all: Marquis of Salisbury v. Ray, 8 W. R. 462, 8 C. B. N. S. 193; In re Long, Ex parte Cuddeford, 36 W. R. 346, 20 Q. B. D. 316. By ord. 42, r. 15, which embodies section 123 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852: "In every case of execution the party entitled to execution may levy the poundage, fees, and expenses of execution over and above the sum recovered." That applies to ordinary execution, such as fi. fa. There is no corresponding provision in order 47, which deals with the writ of possession. The plaintiffs will rely on section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, as conferring jurisdiction to allow these costs. But the Judicature Acts and order 65 were not intended to confer any new jurisdiction to award costs. [STIRLING, L.J.—In In re Fisher, 42 W. R. 241, [1894] 1 Ch. 450, it was pointed out that one of the objects of section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, was to remedy the want of power to make any order as to the costs of the payment out of court of money which had been paid into court under the Lands Clauses Act.] At any rate the section does not cover this case. It only deals with "the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court." A writ of possession is not a proceeding in the Supreme Court.

J. R. Atkin, for the plaintiffs.—Section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, gives the court power over all costs of and incident to proceedings in the Supreme Court. In re Fisher shows that this section is an enabling section, which enlarges the jurisdiction of the court over costs. A writ of possession issued in pursuance of a judgment is clearly a proceeding in the Supreme Court. It is not necessary to consider whether the court had power over such costs before the Act of 1890. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In Watson on Sheriffs, at p. 112, it is said: "In general the party at whose suit the writ is issued must bear the expenses of execution, and has no remedy against his debtor, except by express agreement, as usual in a judge's order, warrant of attorney, or cognovit."]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think it is desirable to set out the proceedings in this case up to the date of the order appealed against. By a writ of summons issued on the 21st of November, 1905, the plaintiffs claimed possession of a house and premises and rent and mesne profits, the defendant having come into possession of the premises as tenant of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were enabled under the provisions of order 14, the scope of which is now extended so as to apply to an action by a landlord against a tenant to recover possession of premises where the term has expired or has been duly determined by notice to quit, to make an application under that order for summary judgment. They accordingly made such application, and on the 15th of December an order was made that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to sign final judgment against the defendant for possession of the premises set out in the indorsement of the writ of summons with the costs of the application. The claim for rent was ordered to stand over. Then, on the next day, the 16th of December, final judgment was signed. By that judgment, after reciting that the plaintiffs had obtained the order just mentioned, it was adjudged that the plaintiffs should recover possession of the premises and should recover the costs of the application to be taxed. Up to this point no mention had been made of any costs of a writ of possession. But the plaintiffs, having on the 20th of December issued a writ of possession, and being desirous to recover the costs incurred thereby, applied at chambers on the 29th of December for an order that the costs of and incidental to the writ of possession issued on the 20th of December in pursuance of the judgment dated the 16th of December should be taxed and paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs. The Master refused to make an order, but there was an appeal to the judge, and on the 5th of January A. T. Lawrence, J., made an order as prayed. That is the order appealed against.

It now appears to be clear that up to the Judicature Acts, and indeed up to the year 1890, there was no jurisdiction to make such an order. I have examined the forms of orders applicable to a case like the present, and I have also referred to Watson on Sheriffs. These show that formerly there was no such jurisdiction. But in 1890 the Judicature Act of that year, by section 5, provided as follows: "Subject to the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts and the rules of court made thereunder and to the express provisions of any statute whether passed before or after the commencement of this Act, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court, including the administration of estates and trusts shall be in the discretion of the court or judge, and the court or judge shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent such costs are to be paid." That section has been relied on, and in my opinion properly relied on, by the plaintiffs as giving jurisdiction to make such an order as that now appealed against. On reading the words of the section I myself was not quite sure that they were intended to give power to the court to order payment of costs which could not have been ordered before, I was inclined to think that they were only intended to regulate the exercise of existing jurisdiction. But Stirling, L.J., called attention to the case of In re Fisher, and after looking at that case it seems to me to be quite plain that the object of the section was to confer jurisdiction. Lindley, L.J., after mentioning the unfortunate state in which the law had been with regard to the costs of the payment out of court of money which had been paid in under the Lands Clauses Acts, and the attempt to get over the difficulty made in Ex parte Mercers' Company, 27 W. R. 424, 10 Ch. D. 481, said: "However, in In re Mills' Estate, 35 W. R. 65, 34 Ch. D. 24, that case was not followed, and the reason why it was not followed was that the court held that no jurisdiction was conferred upon it by the rules to order the payment of costs in cases where before the Judicature Act it would have had no power to do so. That difficulty was felt to be one that ought to be got rid of by legislation, and section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, was passed for the purpose, amongst other things, of getting rid of what was admitted to be an unjust anomaly." Knowing now that the section was intended to confer a new jurisdiction to order costs not existing before, I must look to see whether it confers jurisdiction in the present case. The section purports to place in the discretion of the court or judge "the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court." It has been argued that this was not a proceeding in the Supreme Court. I am of opinion that it was, and therefore I think the appeal should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Nicholson, Graham, & Beesly.

Solicitors for the defendant, Morris & Rickards.

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) — Feb. 2.

"THE SCARSDALE." (a.)

Ship—Seaman—Wages—End of voyage—Agreement—Port within home trading limits as required by master—Port where cargo is discharged—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 113, 114 (2) (a), 115 (5), 116.

A seaman shipped at Cardiff under an agreement for "a voyage not exceeding one years' duration to any ports or places within the limits of seventy-five degrees north latitude and sixty degrees south latitude, commencing at Cardiff, proceeding thence to Malta, thereafter trading to ports in any rotation, and to end at such port in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe within home trading limits as may be required by the master." The vessel sailed from Cardiff for Malta and then to a Black Sea port, where she loaded a cargo for Southampton. On arrival at Southampton she discharged the whole of her cargo, and the seaman demanded his wages and his discharge upon the ground that the voyage was at an end. The master refused, stating that the voyage was not at an end until the ship got back to Cardiff, and that the seaman would have to go on with the ship to that port.

Held, that the master had, by the agreement, the power of fixing at what port within home trading limits the voyage was to end, and that the voyage did not necessarily end at the port within home trading limits where the cargo was finally discharged.

Appeal from the judgment of Bargrave Deane, J.

Charles Baxter, who was employed on board the steamship Scarsdale as a fireman, took proceedings, under section 164 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, before a court of summary jurisdiction, to recover from the master of The Scarsdale the sum of £4 3s. 9d. wages and £2 as compensation. After having heard the evidence the court referred the claim to the Admiralty Division of the High Court under section 165, sub-section 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

On the 5th of August, 1904, Baxter signed an agreement for service on board The Scarsdale, the material clause of which was as follows: "On a voyage not exceeding one year's duration to any ports or places within the limits of 75 north latitude and 60 degrees south latitude, commencing at Cardiff, proceeding thence to Malta, thereafter trading to ports in any rotation, and to end at such port in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe within home trading limits as may be required by the master."

The Scarsdale sailed from Cardiff to Malta, then from Malta to the Black Sea, where she took in a cargo of grain for Southampton, and she arrived at Southampton on the 28th of September, 1904, where she discharged the whole of her cargo.

Baxter demanded his wages and his discharge at Southampton upon the ground that the voyage was at an end, but the master refused to give them to him, stating that the agreement was not at an end, and that Baxter would have to go on with the ship to Cardiff.

Baxter accordingly instituted these proceedings, and the Board of Trade obtained leave to intervene.

Bargrave Deane, J., was of the opinion that the agreement was an agreement for a particular voyage; that the voyage was at an end at the port within home trading limits where the cargo was discharged, or if there was more than one port of discharge, at the port where the last portion of the cargo was discharged; that the master by accepting a cargo from the Black Sea for Southampton exercised his power to end the voyage at Southampton as his final port of discharge, making it thereby his final port of destination, and that, having so exercised his power, he had no right to require Baxter to proceed further with the ship, and Baxter was entitled to his discharge and his wages at Southampton. He accordingly gave judgment for Baxter.

The master appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., and Lewis Noad, for the master.

Sir William Robson, S.G., Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Sir Edward Carson, K.C., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the Board of Trade.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Morgan Morgan, for Baxter.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: The question in this case turns on the construction of an agreement entered into between Charles Baxter, a seaman, and Colin McDiamid, the master of the steamship Scarsdale. The case began by a summons being taken out under section 164 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, by Charles Baxter, the plaintiff, against the defendant, McDiamid, the master of the steamship Scarsdale, for £4 3s. 9d., being the balance of wages owing to him, the plaintiff, while employed on the defendant's said steamship as a fireman. At the hearing of the summons the plaintiff was represented by Mr. Charles Ansell Emanuel for the Seamen and Firemen's Union, and Mr. Charles Lamport appeared for the Shipping Federation. The ship's articles showing the terms upon which the crew were engaged were put in evidence, and the material terms were as follows: "On a voyage not exceeding one year's duration to any ports or places within the limits of 75 degrees north latitude and 60 degrees south latitude, commencing at Cardiff, proceeding thence to Malta, thereafter trading to ports in any rotation, and to end at such port in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe within home trading limits as may be required by the master." Home trading limits include the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man, and the Continent of Europe between the River Elbe and Brest inclusive. The plaintiff signed on board The Scarsdale at Cardiff on the 5th of August, 1904, and proceeded in that vessel to Malta, then to the Black Sea, where The Scarsdale took in grain, and then went to Southampton under charter-party, arriving on the 28th of September at Southampton, where the ship discharged the whole of her then cargo. Baxter at Southampton demanded his discharge, but the defendant refused to give it to him, saying that the agreement was not at an end, and telling Baxter that he would have to go on to Cardiff. It was admitted by the master that Southampton was the final port of discharge for the cargo. I find that the cargo in this admission meant the cargo which the master then had on board. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that, as the vessel was going to discharge the whole of her cargo at Southampton, the voyage entered into under the articles was completed, and the plaintiff was entitled to his discharge at Southampton. It was contended on behalf of the master that the voyage was not ended, and the captain could require the plaintiff to go to Cardiff. The question whether the voyage mentioned in this agreement terminated at Southampton, or whether the master could require the voyage to end at Cardiff and refuse to give Baxter his discharge or to pay him his wages until arrival at Cardiff, depends upon the true construction and meaning of the agreement in question. In my opinion, if one looks merely at the words of the agreement, the master would seem to be entitled to require the voyage to end at Cardiff as being a port in the United Kingdom. I can find no words within the four corners of the agreement which would lead me to say that the voyage mentioned in the agreement determined at Southampton by reason of the discharge of the cargo then on board The Scarsdale at Southampton, a port within the United Kingdom, and therefore a port within the limits within which the master is by the agreement entitled to require the voyage to end. The voyage mentioned in the agreement is a voyage of the ship and not of the cargo. It was urged by Sir Robert Finlay that the agreement provided for the ship commencing its voyage at Cardiff, proceeding thence to Malta, and thereafter making a circular voyage trading to ports in any rotation, but necessarily ending the voyage by the arrival of the ship at any port within home trade limits—that is to say, within the United Kingdom or within the Continent of Europe between the River Elbe and Brest. He argued that the trading to ports in rotation meant ports exclusive of those within home trade limits. I see nothing in the words of the agreement to justify the contention that the voyage intended by this agreement necessarily came to an end by the arrival of the ship in ballast or with cargo at a port in the United Kingdom, or within home trading limits. On the contrary, it seems to me that the words of the agreement give the master a right of election as to which of the ports within the limits of the prescribed district shall in fact be the final port of destination of the ship. And even if the words of the agreement, looking only to what one finds within the four corners of the agreement, were much less clear than they seem to me to be, I should have hesitated long, having regard alike to the interests of seamen and shipowners, before I held that the true construction of this agreement necessitated the engagement of a new crew in the case of a British foreign-going ship arriving at Hamburg before she could proceed with the cargo from Hamburg to any port, whether within or without home trade limits.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I will next consider the construction of this agreement, taking into consideration the provisions of sections 113, 114, 115, and 116 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and also the provisions and language of that Act generally. Section 113 requires that the master of every ship, except coasting ships of less than eighty tons registered tonnage, shall enter into an agreement (called the agreement with the crew) with every seaman whom he carries to sea as one of his crew from any port in the United Kingdom. Sub-section 2 of section 114 prescribes what the agreement with the crew shall contain as terms thereof. Sub-section 2 (a) runs thus: "The agreement with the crew shall contain as terms thereof the following particulars: (a) Either the nature, and, as far as practicable, the duration of the intended voyage or engagement, or the maximum period of the voyage or engagement and the places or parts of the world, if any, to which the voyage or engagement is not to extend." It was argued by the Solicitor-General and Sir Robert Finlay that if the construction above mentioned, which was the construction contended for by Sir Edward Clarke, was put on the agreement, this construction in effect turned the agreement into a time agreement, and that a time agreement would not be an agreement in accordance with section 114 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, or with the provisions of that Act taken as a whole. And then they argued, if the words of the agreement were capable of two constructions, one of which resulted in an agreement which was void under the Act and inconsistent with its provisions, and the other consistent with its provisions, the court ought to adopt the construction consistent with the provisions of the Act even though such construction should be a non-natural construction or not the construction which primâ facie one would give to the words of the agreement. I agree entirely with this contention; but I do not think that a time agreement, as distinguished from a voyage agreement, would be inconsistent with the provisions of section 114 or with the provisions of the Act taken as a whole. First let me take section 114, sub-section 2 (a). That clause contains alternative particulars either of which will satisfy clause (a) of sub-section 2 of section 114. Under the first alternative the agreement must contain particulars of the nature and, as far as practicable, of the duration of the voyage or engagement. It will be observed that this alternative provides not only for particulars of a voyage, but alternatively for particulars of the engagement, which, I take it, is not a synonym for a voyage. The second alternative also deals both with an agreement which contemplates a voyage and also with an agreement which contemplates an engagement. Under this latter alternative the particulars must be of the maximum period of the voyage or engagement and of the places or parts of the world, if any, to which the voyage or engagement is not to extend. The difference between these two alternatives is this: That under the first the contractual employment extends to the whole duration of the voyage or engagement as the case may be; whereas under the second alternative the contractual employment must not exceed the maximum period of the voyage or engagement, but may be determined on an event or at a time happening before the determination of the maximum period. It seems to me that the word "engagement" in both of these alternatives covers a time agreement as distinguished from a voyage agreement. Under the first alternative the agreement has to be for a fixed time, under the second for a maximum period of time. I am inclined to think that where the agreement is for a maximum period of time the agreement would lack that precision for the information of the sailor which the statute contemplates unless it stated the occasion or occasions on which the employment might fall short of the maximum period. We have not got to decide this, but, assuming this to be the true construction of clause (a), it is fully satisfied by the choice given to the captain as to the port within the limits prescribed at which the voyage is to end, and the time at which within the twelve months the vessel shall arrive at the port within the home trade limits where he requires the ship to end its voyage. But then it is said that there are to be found in section 115 provisions relating to running agreements which by express statement of occasions on which the agreement may be based on time exclude agreements based on time in respect of foreign-going ships except on those occasions defined under the head of running agreements. The sub-sections of section 115 which are in particular relied upon are sub-sections 5, 6, and 7. Sub-section 5 runs thus: "The agreements may be made for a voyage, or if the voyages of the ship average less than six months in duration may be made to extend over two or more voyages, and agreements so made to extend over two or more voyages are in this Act referred to as running agreements." Now sub-section 5 provides that an agreement may be made by a foreign-going ship for a voyage—i.e., may be made under so much of section 114 as relates to a voyage as distinguished from an engagement. But an agreement for a voyage may be made for a maximum period provided it states the places or parts of the world, if any, to which the voyage is not to extend. That being so, it seems to me that, if the agreement under consideration is a voyage agreement which complies with these conditions, we are not to trouble ourselves with the provisions as to running agreements, which, as sub-section 5 states, are agreements made to extend over two or more voyages. I do not think that this agreement under consideration does extend to two or more voyages. It is a single agreement for one voyage of the ship. Indeed both the Solicitor-General and Sir Robert Finlay admitted that this agreement, so far as it related to a tramping voyage in the Mediterranean or outside the limits for selection of the port of final destination, was for one voyage under a single agreement within the meaning of section 114. They only contended that arriving at a port within those limits or at all events arriving at such a port and discharging the whole of the cargo constituted necessarily a determination of the voyage of the ship. I cannot agree. But I would observe that they did not contend that the agreement was a running agreement, but only that such arrival at a port within the district where the voyage might end terminated the voyage under an agreement made under section 114. With regard to section 116 I have only to say that it does not contemplate agreements for a voyage, and certainly not agreements for a voyage of a foreign-going ship. It deals with agreements for service of crews of home trading ships in a particular ship, or of a service in two or more ships belonging to the same owner; so I do not think we need consider the effect of sub-section 4 of section 116. Having thus far dealt with the question of the validity of the agreement and the meaning of the word "voyage" in the agreement, I now propose to deal with the meaning of the words in the agreement as to the end of the voyage. The words are "to end at such port in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe, within home trading limits, as may be required by the master." Bargreave Deane, J., after dealing with the meaning of the word "voyage" in terms with which I entirely concur, said that "the further question that then arose was that, given that the voyage ended within those home limits, at what place within them did it end? The Merchant Shipping Acts from 1729 down to the present date did not in terms define the 'end of the voyage'; but there were three expressions which afforded a fairly sure guide to what might be taken to be the place where a voyage ended. 'The place of unlivery of the cargo,' 'the final port of discharge,' and 'the final port of destination' were terms which were to be found in the various Merchant Shipping Acts, and he thought they were intended to be correlative terms, each pointing to what must be taken to be the end of the voyage; and, reading them in that light, he thought that the end of the voyage was the place where the final or home passage of the whole voyage terminated by reason that it was the place at which the cargo brought home was to be finally discharged. In the case where the home cargo was consigned to more than one place 'finally' would mean that place where the last portion of the cargo was discharged, and the adventure of the ship outward and homeward was at an absolute end, and where she was fully discharged on her return within the home trade limits." I cannot agree that in this agreement the end of the voyage means the place where the final or home passage of the whole voyage terminates by reason that it is the place at which the cargo brought home is to be discharged finally, or that place where the last portion of the cargo is discharged, and the adventure of the ship outward and homeward is at an absolute end, and where she is finally discharged on her return within the home limits. The voyage to be ended is the voyage of the ship, not of the cargo. The adventure of the ship outward and homeward does not terminate until the ship returns to the port, within the limits of home trade, where the master elects, within the period of twelve months mentioned in the voyage agreement, to end her voyage and prepare for a fresh voyage. I agree also with the criticism by Sir Edward Clarke upon this part of the judgment of the learned judge, that discharge is a word which applies not only to cargo, but also to crew and to ship. And I cannot agree that the place of "unlivery of the cargo," "the final port of discharge," and "the final port of destination," are either correlative or synonymous terms. Lastly, I would say that, although I think that the argument of Sir Robert Finlay made it necessary for him to say that an express agreement that the voyage should begin at Cardiff and proceed to Bilbao and back to Cardiff, with liberty to call at Southampton and there discharge her cargo, would not be a voyage ending at Cardiff within the meaning of this agreement, it seems to me that that contention would produce a most strained construction of the simple words of this agreement. I only wish to call attention for a moment before concluding to the judgments of Lord Stowell in The George Home, 1 Hagg. Adm. 370 and of Dr. Lushington in The Westmorland, 1 W. Rob 216. Dr. Lushington, in the latter case, cites the judgment of Lord Stowell in the former case; and without going minutely into statements made by those great judges, it will be seen plainly in both cases that the judges took the view that what the Legislature really required was that an agreement of service between a sailor and the master of a ship should be so expressed as to give sufficient information to the seaman about to be carried in the ship as to the voyage about to be undertaken; and, in my view, if an agreement sufficiently does this—that is to say, if it gives in sufficiently clear terms the information which the various Merchant Shipping Acts have required to be given to sailors, that is all that the law requires. Provided that this is done, a sailor is, in my opinion, to be treated in all other respects as a free man capable of taking care of himself and of entering into any agreements he chooses with shipowners, provided that the agreement gives him sufficient information as to the voyage, and in particular the information contained in the particulars required by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. I think that this appeal must be allowed on the usual terms.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: The question which we have to decide turns on the construction of the agreement entered into by the plaintiff with the master of the steamship Scarsdale in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. By that agreement the plaintiff was engaged "on a voyage not exceeding one year's duration to any ports or places within the limits of 75 degrees north latitude and 60 degrees south latitude, commencing at Cardiff, proceeding thence to Malta, thereafter trading to ports in any rotation and the end at such port in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe within home trading limits as may be required by the master." It was admitted by the learned counsel for the Board of Trade that the voyage contemplated was one which might be divided into various stages —as, for example, from Cardiff to Malta, from Malta to the Black Sea and from the Black Sea to Southampton, and that a full cargo might be taken in and discharged at these various places as circumstances might require. It was admitted also by them that the agreement for a voyage of this nature was perfectly valid provided that the "ports" to which the ship might trade "in any rotation" were ports beyond home trading limits. I assume without deciding that this is the true construction of the words. It was, however, contended that the voyage contemplated by the agreement came to an end when the ship arrived at the final port of discharge of cargo within home trading limits (in this case Southampton), and that the master could not require the plaintiff to proceed to Cardiff with the ship in ballast, though it was not disputed that, if the cargo had been only partially discharged at Southampton, the master mght have required the plaintiff to proceed to Cardiff in order that the rest might be discharged there. The most material portions of the Act are section 114, sub-sections 2 (a) and 3, and section 115, sub sections, 5, 6, and 7. The agreement in question falls within the second branch of sub-section 2 (a) of section 114. Unless, therefore, it contains some provision which is contrary to law, effect ought to be given to it under sub-section 3. The agreement is admittedly not a running agreement within the meaning of section 115 of the Act. It must therefore, under section 115, sub-section 5, be for a voyage; and if it provides for more than one voyage it is bad, and it was argued that on any other construction than that adopted by Bargrave Deane, J., it does provide for more than one voyage. In order to meet the argument put forward on behalf of the Board of Trade, the case was put to counsel of a voyage "commencing at Cardiff, proceeding thence to Malta, thereafter to the Black Sea, and thence with cargo to Southampton, and, if required by the master, from Southampton to Cardiff in ballast"; and it was said (as I think the case of the Board of Trade required) that that would have been not one voyage, but two. I am unable to agree. I think it was only one voyage longer or shorter as the master might require. I also agree with the contention of Sir Edward Clarke that the voyage contemplated was that of the ship, not of the cargo. In the present case the master is by the terms of the agreement entrusted with the power of determining at what place within home trading limits the voyage is to end. The parties to an agreement of the kind with which we have to deal appear to be left by the Act at perfect liberty to fix the commencement and ending of the voyage as they see fit. I think that the master could not use this power so as really to convert a single voyage into two; but in my judgment he has not done so. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed.

MOULTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The decision depends upon the true interpretation of the agreement entered into between the master and the seaman. It appears to me that if the agreement had been free from any complication introduced by statute law, it would be clear that it was an agreement for what may be called a tramp voyage, not exceeding one year's duration, commencing at Cardiff, having its first port of call at Malta, then with freedom to trade to any ports in any rotation within such wide limits as practically to include all the ports of the world, and to end at such port within home trading limits as might be required by the master. It is conceded by the Solicitor-General that the voyage was for a tramp voyage, and that it was contemplated that the voyage should consist of trips from port to port for the successive taking in and discharge of cargo either in whole or in part. The Solicitor-General, however, contends that as soon as the vessel arrived at a port within home trading limits and completely discharged her cargo the agreement of service came to an end. I cannot agree. The visit of the vessel to a port within home trading limits might occur in one or two ways. It might occur by reason of the right of the master to trade to ports, including ports within home trading limits, in any rotation, or it might occur by reason of the right of the master to name a port within home trading limits as the port of termination of the voyage. I see nothing to estop the master from saying that the visit of the vessel to Southampton was a visit to that port under the first of the above rights, and to compel us to say that it was under the second of the two rights. The agreement says that the master must terminate the voyage at a port within home trading limits; it does not say that if the master brings the vessel to a port within home trading limits the voyage is ipso facto terminated. In my opinion, therefore, the master had the same right to go to ports within home trading limits as he had to go to ports outside those limits. Counsel for the Board of Trade admitted that their contention practically amounted to a reading into the agreement after the words "thereafter trading to ports in any rotation," the words "other than ports within home trading limits." If those words could be properly implied in this agreement, the contention of the respondent would be made out, because then the vessel could only lawfully come to a port within home trading limits for the purpose of terminating the voyage. Consequently the master by taking the vessel to Southampton would have elected to end the voyage there. I can see no ground for reading those words into the agreement. They would not be consistent with the words of the agreement, "thereafter trading to ports in any rotation," which include any ports within home trading limits. Two points were urged upon us. It is first of all said that, as the whole of the cargo was discharged at Southampton, the voyage necessarily came to an end there. The agreement, however, contemplates a succession of cargoes being taken in and discharged, and as it is conceded that the complete discharge of a cargo at a port outside home trading limits would not terminate the voyage, so it seems to follow that a complete discharge of cargo at a port within those limits cannot have that result. It is next said that, if the agreement were construed in the manner contended for by the appellant, it would amount to an agreement for a period not exceeding one year, and that the agreement would be invalid upon the ground that time agreements for seamen are not allowed by law. Upon this point I have formed no opinion and I desire to express none. In the first place the question whether time agreements, other than the running agreements referred to in section 115, and the time agreements specified in section 116, are legal may be a question of enormous importance to the mercantile marine and to sailors, and I should be loth to decide it except in a case where it was necessary for the decision. In the present case it is not necessary to decide it. If the agreement is illegal and void, there was no agreement upon which the justices could found jurisdiction, and therefore the appellant must succeed. But, further, if the agreement on the one interpretation is illegal, so would it also be on the other interpretation. The two interpretations only differ in this, that they allow a different choice in the matter of trading ports. They both extend over a period not exceeding one year, and the suggested difficulty that the master would have the power of extending the service for any time he might choose within the limit of the year would apply equally to one as to the other. I base my decision solely upon this, that the respondent has failed to show that there was a valid agreement which was terminated by the call of the vessel at Southampton. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Botterell & Roche.

Solicitor for the respondent, P. J. Nicholls, for C. A. Emanuel & Emanuel, Southampton.

Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Jan. 31.

"THE MARPESSA."

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP "MARPESSA." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Vessel not used for profit—Demurrage—Measure of damages.

The damages to be awarded to a dock board, charged with the duty of maintaining a harbour but not entitled to distribute profits, in respect of delay in their work, which they have suffered by reason of damage done to one of their dredgers in a collision caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants, may rightly be taken to be the equivalent to the cost of the work to the owners had that work been done.

Judgment of Barnes, P. (ante, p. 314, [1906] P. 14), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the President of the Probate Division (reported ante, p. 314, [1906] P. 14).

The case raised the question of the principle on which a claim in the nature of demurrage for the temporary loss of the use of a dredger damaged by collision is to be calculated.

The G. B. Crow, owned by the plaintiffs, is a suction dredger built in 1895 at a cost of £56,700, and was designed for, and is employed in, the dredging of the bar and the sea channels of the Mersey as part of the conservancy work of the dock board. This is one of the three largest dredgers in Europe, being capable of carrying 3,000 tons of sand to the dumping ground and of dredging to the depth of fifty-five feet. Her average output is 12,800 tons per day at an estimated cost of a fraction over 2d. per ton of sand raised. She works continuously night and day throughout the year, except Sundays, Christmas Day, and Good Friday, but is occasionally prevented from working by stress of weather.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 6th of October, 1904, The G. B. Crow was run into by the steamship Marpessa, owned by the defendants, and sustained the damage which formed the subject of the plaintiffs' claim. Her value, allowing for depreciation at 7 per cent., was estimated at the time of the collision at £33,736, and her life was considered to be good for some five or six years longer.

An action for damage by collision was brought by the plaintiffs, and was settled on the defendants admitting liability to the extent of 90 per cent., subject to the usual reference.

The plaintiffs filed particulars of their claim, consisting of eleven items amounting to £1,275 12s. 6d. All the items were agreed except the last item of £936, being demurrage for nine days at £104 per day.

According to the evidence of the plaintiffs' engineer, given at the reference, "the services of the dredgers are indispensable to the port in order to maintain its present condition," and "to replace them the board would have to do the best they could in the way of hire, or the alternative would be for the port to suffer prejudice and damage."

In 1901 a sand-pump suction dredger called The Laga, valued at £13,000 and capable only of an output of 2,750 tons per day, was hired to replace one of the board's own vessels at a charge of £19 12s. 10d. per day, representing an owner's profit per week of £67 10s., or 27 per cent. per annum on the value of the vessel after allowing for depreciation at the rate of 7 per cent., or £17 10s. per week. On similar lines in the case of The G. B. Crow the rate per working day was calculated at £102 9s. 5d.

The witness could not say that any vessel suffered detriment from the fact that The G. B. Crow was not available during the nine days for which demurrage was claimed, and he admitted that the harbour authorities could only suffer through the vessels. But he claimed that by building the vessels the board had produced improvement in the port, and its value to the port must be at least the expenditure incurred in producing it. Accordingly when deprived of the services of the vessels they were deprived of an advantage, which ought to be reckoned in this case at the daily or current value to them of The G. B. Crow.

In respect of the claim of £936 for demurrage, the district registrar allowed only £315, or £35 per day, assigning in his report, dated the 13th of July, 1905, the following reasons:

"The only item in the claim which was disputed was No. 11, and the dispute resolved itself into the question of the principle on which demurrage should be calculated. The plaintiffs in the claim, as filed, charged £104 per day for demurrage, but at the reference they reduced this amount to £102 9s. 5d. There was no dispute as to the number of days for which the defendants were liable to pay demurrage. Counsel for the plaintiffs contended that the value per day of the vessel to the plaintiffs was the amount which they considered it proper to expend on her for maintenance and working expenses, in addition to sums to cover insurance, depreciation, and owners' profits, and the engineer to the dock board was called to prove these amounts. This witness had prepared a statement showing the annual cost for the past nine years under the following heads: Insurance, repairs, wages, supplies, depreciation, and expenses of engineer's department, together with a charge to represent owners' profits. The amount claimed by the dock board, £102 9s. 5d., represented the average expenditure during that period in maintaining and working this vessel, including a charge of 25 per cent. for owners' profits. The figures of expenditure were not seriously disputed by the defendants, but they contended that the principle was wrong, and that, in addition to the amount to be allowed for standing expenses, as distinguished from working expenses—namely, insurance, wages, and a sum to cover depreciation—the plaintiffs were not entitled to anything further except owners' profits, which they contended were, in this case, covered by interest on the present value, and some amount to represent general damage, and in support of this contention defendants' counsel relied on the judgment of Lord Herschell in The Greta Holme. On the question of general damages, counsel for the defendants contended that the plaintiffs were only entitled to a nominal amount, as the plaintiffs were deprived of the use of their vessel for only nine days, and the engineer to the dock board, in his evidence, admitted that he could not point to any injury or inconvenience occasioned by the loss of the services of the vessel. I am of opinion that the principle contended for by the dock board is not one that should be adopted, and, furthermore, I think that the claim of 25 per cent. for owners' profits, calculated on the original outlay, is excessive. In arriving at the amount to be allowed, the merchants and I considered that, in view of the fact that, according to the figures of the engineer to the dock board, a sum of £33,736 is standing to the depreciation account of this vessel, which originally cost £56,700, the plaintiffs are only entitled to a percentage calculated on the depreciated value, in which we have included £9,427 expended last year, and not charged under the head of repairs in the statement of the engineer to the dock board above referred to. Furthermore, the plaintiffs are paying not more than 4 per cent. on their outlay, and the merchants and I am of opinion that 7 per cent., calculated on the depreciated value as above, is a proper allowance to make to cover establishment charges, owners' profits, and general damage. In addition to this we have allowed the standing expenses substantially on the basis of the figures of the engineer to the dock board, and we consider that £35 per day is a proper allowance to cover the whole of the plaintiffs' loss, which sum would include any supplies consumed while the vessel was under repair."

By a further report, dated the 26th of October, 1905, the district registrar, in stating how the figure of £35 per day was arrived at, explained that: "The plaintiffs based their claim solely upon the principle that the value per day of the vessel to them was what they 'thought worth while' to spend upon her, and their evidence was practically limited to a justification of this principle and corroboration and explanation of the figures contained in the statement of working expenses prepared by their engineer, upon which their claim of £102 9s. 5d. per day was arrived at. The merchants and I being of opinion that the principle was wrong, dealt with the engineer's figures upon the lines laid out by Lord Herschell in the case The Greta Holme. In the absence of evidence of the actual expenses incurred by the plaintiffs during the time the vessel was laid up, the merchants and I, in arriving at the amount to be allowed, could only deal with the figures contained in the engineer's statement." With reference to "supplies," the report stated that "this figure is largely in excess of what the merchants considered would have been expended in supplies to a vessel in dock, but a liberal allowance has been made to cover superintendence and sundries."

No allowance was made in respect of "repairs," as the defendants were paying for the repairs rendered necessary by the collision. Graving dock rates and superintendence and other general charges, which in ordinary course would be included in the engineer's figures under the head of "repairs," were admitted by the defendants and allowed as separate items in the claim.

In the result the allowance was as follows: Insurance, £3 7s.; wages, £14 2s.; supplies, £5 3s.; depreciation, £6 4s.; owners' profit, 4 per cent.; general damage and establishment charges, 3 per cent., £6 4s.; total, £35.

The plaintiffs moved in objection to the registrar's report.

Gorell Barnes, P., dismissed the motion with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Aspinall, K.C., and Leslie Scott, for the appellants.

Pickford, K.C., and Greer, for the respondent.

The following cases were referred to: Clydebank Engineering Co. v. Castaneda, [1905] A. C. 6, 53 W. R. Dig. 36; The Greta Holme, [1897] A. C. 596, 46 W. R. Dig. 157; The Harrington, 13 P. D. 48, 36 W. R. Dig. 187; The Kate, 47 W. R. 669, [1899] P. 165; The Harmonides, 51 W. R. 303, [1903] P. 1.

COLLINS, M R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the President of the Admiralty Division, and the question is as to the proper measure of damages in a case where a steam dredger, the property of the plaintiffs, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, was disabled for nine days, the defendants being admittedly responsible for the damage consequent upon the injury. In beginning the discussion we must remember that damages are not a matter of nice mathematical adjustment. Damages, until a recent period, were exclusively the province of juries, who were not supposed to measure them on strictly mathematical lines, but were supposed to give them by the best method that business men of ordinary and common sense would fix upon as a money compensation for the damages sustained.

In this case the result of what, I must assume, was the defendants' negligence, led to the fact that this steam dredger was put out of action for some nine days, and the learned President, from whose decision the plaintiffs are appealing, came to this conclusion, which is summarized in the headnote to the report in [1906] 1 K. B., although it is really taken verbatim from a passage in the judgment: "The court will award in the absence of proof of direct pecuniary loss in respect of that part of their claim which is in the nature of demurrage—such a sum as will be sufficient to compensate the board for the actual out-of-pocket expenses properly chargeable against the dredger during the period of her detention for repairs, together with depreciation and loss of interest on capital during the delay, such depreciation and interest being calculated on the capital value of the dredger at the time of the accident"; and he says at the end of his judgment: "Applying the principles in the case of The Greta Holme, a business and reasonable view to take is that, when the plaintiffs content themselves with such evidence as they gave in the present case, this tribunal, in assessing their damages, may say, as a jury would do: 'We must act with some reasonable certainty, and you (the plaintiffs) are reasonably compensated by being awarded a sum which we are fairly satisfied you may have lost, but we cannot follow you into mere speculation.'"

The standard which the appellants desire us to assume as applicable so far as I understand the case, is this—they say:

"We can show you the first cost of this dredger to us—we will assume that the life of the dredger is fifteen years—and we can also calculate for you the total expenses which we should be put to over these fifteen years in keeping this vessel in a condition to carry on its work, and we also claim a sum in the shape of interest on the total sum expended by us, and also a sum for owners' profit, and having regard to the aggregate sum represented by all these items put together, which would be the amount at the end of the fifteen years, we now ask you to assess the damages in respect of nine days' detention of this vessel at the expiration of ten years out of her life of fifteen years.

"We ask you to assess the damages payable to us in respect of the use of this vessel for nine days on the theory that every day throughout the whole period of this vessel's existence is to be deemed to be of equal value to us; that is to say, that the cost which we should incur in the course of every day throughout the whole of the fifteen years would be the same; and, as we cannot assign any actual money damage that we have lost by reason of any particular consequence following on our inability to use the dredger during these particular times, we ask you to say that the damages to us must be at least equivalent to that sum of money which we, as reasonable persons, have been willing to devote to keeping this dredger in existence on such given day, and that that sum is to be arrived at by treating the share of each particular day simply as representing the aliquot part of that particular year by dividing the number of days into the number of pounds." It seems to me that that suggested mode of assessing the damages involves at least two assumptions which are not proved.

First of all it involves this: That the cost to the plaintiffs for every day during the whole period of fifteen years in respect of this dredger is to be taken to be the same.

That does not appear to be a self-evident proposition, and there is no other evidence in support of it.

We are dealing here with a perishing subject-matter, and when damages are sought to be got upon a calculation which is based upon the actual original cost of the vessel, with all those other sums added to it, it seems to me that in each succeeding day of the year, in the whole period of fifteen years, that that is a fluctuating factor.

There is depreciation continually going on; and if you are going to introduce as a factor into the calculation a sum representing the value of the vessel at a given date, I think you are bound to take into account the necessary depreciation between the value of the vessel which at the date of its first purchase was an equivalent for the sum paid for it, but which, now you have gone two-thirds of the way through its career, must, it seems to me, on all ordinary principles of bookkeeping, if you are desirous of putting into figures in your books the actual state of your adventure, be subject to a depreciation.

That is the first point, and the chief point upon which they impugn the decision of the court below.

They say that the President's decision involves the taking into account depreciation from day to day, from month to month, and from year to year of this vessel, whereas their calculation is that, inasmuch as the benefit which this vessel was able to confer upon them each week in the whole fifteen years was the same, there must be attributed to the loss of the use of it in any particular week the same sum

This last proposition brings me to the second fallacy, as I regard it, in this contention.

They have first assumed that the aliquot parts of the cost ought to be treated as equally applicable to every week, and they have assessed their damages in this particular week by reference to the aliquot part of the cost so arrived at. But they have also assumed that, throughout the whole period of fifteen years this vessel is equally adequate to the work which has to be done so that they must be deemed to receive the exact equivalent benefit for their expenditure throughout the whole period of fifteen years.

That, again, is not a self-evident proposition to me, and there is no evidence to support it, and therefore I do not think that the learned President was wrong in not regarding that as proved.

Furthermore, I am also asked to assume that the life of this vessel remains the same, and will terminate on the same day, notwithstanding the fact that it has been laid up, and not put to use for the period of nine days during which it was undergoing repairs. That does not appear to me either to be a self-evident proposition; and, as I say again, there is no evidence to show that it is so, or that there may be no extension of its life by reason of the fact that it has not been worked as it would be worked in the ordinary course during the period of nine days while it was undergoing repairs.

Taking all those considerations together, and remembering that we are dealing with, after all, that which is a matter of what is called "rule of thumb" calculation, an adjustment by business men of something which is not capable of mathematical calculation, it seems to me that counsel for the appellants ask us to assume a most artificial and technical mode of arriving at a figure which it appears to me has been arrived at by ordinary business methods on a proper business calculation, when the elements which the learned President referred to, and which are first dealt with by the district registrar, and upon which he forms the basis of his own judgment, have been taken into consideration.

The learned President is of opinion that it has not been made out to his satisfaction that anything else ought to be taken into consideration, and he introduces a most important argument into the view which he has followed, an argument to which I have not really heard any satisfactory answer in the able arguments which have been addressed to us to-day, and that is this. He says: "On your theory, which you are asking me to adopt in assessing the damages, you actually show, claiming as you do about £100 a day, that at the end of one year you, practically, in one single year out of your receipts will be able to supply a new vessel. The value of the vessel taken as it is now, is put not quite as high, but certainly nearly as high as £33,000, and yet you, upon your calculation of £100 for every day or the year, show that, practically at the end of the year, at any rate, you have replaced very nearly, if not quite, the whole of that value. It shows, whatever is the true standard, that cannot be the right standard of assessing the damages. It is contrary to common sense."

It seems to me, therefore, that in this court we are not called upon to lay down any exact standard of mathematical calculation as the basis upon which these damages are to be assessed.

It seems to me that the learned President in directing the lines upon which they were assessed came to as near an accurate definition, and to a proper definition, as it was possible to obtain on such a subject-matter.

It seems to me, therefore, that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The only question here is one concerning the loss accruing to the owners of the dredger injured, which has been caused owing to what is called "demurrage"—that is to say, the delay they have been put to in the use of the dredger, owing to the accident.

She was properly repaired, and the question of the repairs is not before us to-day; they have been allowed to the owners of the dredger, and if they have not been paid already they will be paid by those who caused the accident.

In my opinion the appeal fails on the broad ground which has been put by the learned President. He says, at p. 33 of the report of this case in the Law Reports: "I do not feel satisfied that the plaintiffs have made out any case for a larger allowance than that which the district registrar has made to them."

I am exactly of that opinion. Of course, if the district registrar in arriving at the amount specified in his report, had pursued throughout a wrong principle, I might have felt compelled to say that the matter must be or ought to be referred back to him, but I think that cannot properly be said.

This is a peculiar case, where the owners of the chattel injured never meant using it for profit, and where the evidence does not establish, and it cannot be properly inferred that the chattel could have been used by them for profit.

In that state of things I think the loss they suffered by the delay, which would be the loss to them of the advantages otherwise accruing by the work that would otherwise have been done but for the injury, might rightly be taken to be equivalent, roughly speaking, to the cost of the work to the owners had that work been done, and upon that principle the district registrar has proceeded.

The appellants contend that, in addition, they ought to have credited to them something in the nature of imaginary profits. I say "imaginary" because, on the facts before us, it is not shown that any such profits could have been made, or would have been made.

The President, in his judgment, has pointed out several reasons why this contention of the appellants should not be acceded to, and I agree with him, and I will not repeat his reasons.

In this state of things, as the district registrar has proceeded upon a right principle and has awarded a sum that is just, speaking for myself, I decline to let the amount he has arrived at be upset because he may not, as regards each subsidiary item, have proceeded on a strictly logical or mathematical basis according to the plaintiffs' contentions, especially when I find that those contentions are based upon certain assumptions or speculations which I am not prepared to accede to; as, for example, that the dredger would work just as well at the end of its life as it would when it was new, or that the expenditure on the cost of the dredger ought to be and it would be rightly taken, and would in fact be the same uniformly throughout the whole life of the dredger; and, lastly, that the life of the dredger was shortened exactly by the period of the delay during the repairs.

Looking at the matter broadly, and I think it ought to be looked at broadly, I can only say in conclusion that I agree again with what the learned President said at the same page of the report of the case that: "A business and reasonable view to take is that when the plaintiffs content themselves with such evidence as they gave in the present case, this tribunal, in assessing their damages, may say, as a jury would do: 'We must act with some reasonable certainty, and you, the plaintiffs, are reasonably compensated by being awarded a sum which we are fairly satisfied you may have lost, but we cannot follow you into mere speculation.'"

On these short grounds I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I have nothing to add.

Solicitors, W. C. Thorne, Liverpool; Hill, Dickenson, & Co., Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Jan. 31.

In re JOSEPH SAMPSON, DECEASED. SAMPSON v. SAMPSON. (a.)

Trustee—Appointment of new trustees—Personal representative of last surviving trustee appointing himself—Appointment invalid—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 10, sub-section 1.

The testator appointed his wife and three sons to be the executors and trustees of his will. The last surviving trustee died in 1905, and the executors whom he appointed having renounced probate, his eldest son took out letters of administration to his father's estate and then appointed himself and his brother to be the trustees of the testator's estate under the powers conferred by section 10, sub-section 1, of the Trustee Act, 1893. There was no power to appoint new trustees under the original will.

Held, that the appointment was invalid, as the words of the section, "another person or other persons," meant some person other than the person appointing.

Adjourned summons.

Joseph Sampson, by his will dated the 12th of August, 1849, appointed his wife, Elizabeth Sampson, his sons Joseph Sampson, John White Sampson, and Sydney Sampson to be his executors, and gave and bequeathed to them all his estate and effects whatsoever upon certain trusts therein mentioned. The will contained no express power to appoint new trustees.

The testator died on the 13th of August, 1849, and his will was proved by the four executors therein named. John White Sampson, the surviving son and executor named in the will, died on the 10th of March, 1905, having by his will dated the 28th of October, 1904, appointed his wife Ada Sampson and W. M. Wilson to be his executors, and they having renounced probate, letters of administration with the will annexed were, on the 25th of June, 1905, granted to his eldest son Elisha John Sampson, who, as such administrator, by deed dated the 8th of July, 1905, appointed himself and his brother Albert Ernest Sampson trustees of the will of the testator Joseph Sampson in exercise of the power purported to be given to him for that purpose by section 10, sub-section 1, of the Trustee Act, 1893.

This was an originating summons taken out by Elisha John Sampson and Albert Ernest Sampson, and one of the questions asked was that it might be determined whether the applicants had been duly appointed trustees of the testator's said will, and, if necessary, that their appointment might be confirmed by the court.

Section 10 (1) of the Trustee Act, 1893, provides that "where a trustee, either original or substituted, and whether appointed by the court or otherwise, is dead or remains out of the United Kingdom for more than twelve months, or desires to be discharged from all or any of the trusts or powers reposed in or conferred on him, or refuses or is unfit to act therein, or is incapable of acting therein, then the person or persons nominated for the purpose of appointing new trustees by the instrument, if any, creating the trust, or if there is no such person, or no such person able and willing to act, then the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee for the time being, or the personal representatives of the last surviving or continuing trustee, may, by writing, appoint another person or other persons to be a trustee or trustees in the place of the trustee dead, remaining out of the United Kingdom, desiring to be discharged, refusing or being unfit or being incapable, as aforesaid."

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 10, sub-section 4: "The provisions of this section . . . relative to a continuing trustee include a refusing or retiring trustee, if willing to act in the execution of the provisions of this section."

Austen Cartmell, for the applicants.—The appointment of the new trustees was a good appointment notwithstanding that E. J. Sampson appointed himself. In Montefiore v. Guedalla, 52 W. R. 151, [1903] 2 Ch. 723, Buckley, J., held that there was no rule that a donee of a power to appoint new trustees was unable to appoint himself. He said (p. 726): "In my opinion the result of the cases is that it is competent to persons who have a power of appointment of new trustees to appoint one of themselves, where the language of the instrument creating the power allows them to do so, although, as I have said before, it is a most salutary rule that they should do so only in exceptional circumstances." Section 10 (1) of the Trustee Act enabled the personal representative of the last surviving trustee to appoint new trustees in place of trustees that were dead. The words in the section "another person or other persons" must be held to refer not to the appointor, but to the person in whose place a new trustee was appointed. The power in In re Skeats' Settlements, 37 W. R. 778, 42 Ch. D. 522, was very similar to the words of the section, and Kay, J., decided that a man ought not to appoint himself unless the circumstrances were exceptional, but he did not decide that he had no power to appoint himself; the words "any other" in that case must have been used in reference to the person in whose place the new trustee was appointed. In In re Newen, Newen v. Barnes, 43 W. R. 58, [1894] 2 Ch. 297, where Kekewich, J., decided that a donee of a power of appointing new trustees could not appoint himself, it was pointed out that the court was exercising a discretionary power. Until the decision in Montefiore v. Guedalla no one supposed that a donee of a power could appoint himself.

W. J. Whittaker, for the defendant C. W. Buggy, the legal personal representative of Jane Burling, deceased;

Waddilove, for the defendant Mary Sampson, both of which defendants claimed to be beneficially interested under the testator's will.

KEKEWICH, J.—If it had not been for the decision of Buckley, J., in Montefiore v. Guedalla. I should have had no hesitation about this case. The facts are these: The last surviving trustee of the testator's will having died, the power of appointing new trustees belonged to his personal representative by virtue of section 10, sub-section 1, of the Trustee Act, 1893, there being no express power under the will to appoint new trustees. That being the state of facts, the donee of the power appointed himself, and the question is whether that was a good appointment. Certainly in In re Newen I expressed a decided opinion that a donee of a power could not make such an appointment, and that contention was given up by Mr. Warmington on the ground that the power was to appoint "any other person or persons" and that you cannot be another person than yourself, and I explained what I conceive the law to be, that even without any such words as that, no trustee having a fiduciary power of appointing trustees could exercise that power by appointing himself either alone or together with any other person. The point came before Buckley, J., in the case of Montefiore v. Guedalla. In that case there was a power in the will for the executors or administrators of the last acting trustee to appoint a new trustee or trustees in the place or stead of such trustee so dying, refusing or becoming incapable to act, or wishing to retire as aforesaid," and Buckley, J., held that the executors of the last surviving trustee, and it follows also the personal representative of the last surviving trustee, could appoint one of themselves to be a new trustee, and he was clearly of opinion that it had not been laid down that donees of a power were outside of the class who were capable of being appointed, and that the appointment in that case was within the language of the power. But he distinguished the case where the power was to appoint some "other" person. He said on p. 725, "The first step is to look at the language of the power. Where you find that the power is to appoint some 'other' person the question may arise whether that means some other person other than the appointor. In such a case the donee of the power may not be amongst the persons capable of being appointed." I must therefore take what Buckley, J., held was the first step, and see what is the power which is contained in section 10, sub-section 1, of the Trustee Act, 1893. The power is that "the person or persons nominated for the purpose of appointing new trustees by the instrument, if any, creating the trust, or if there is no such person or no such person able or willing to act, then the surviving or continuing trustee or trustee for the time being or the personal representative of the last surviving or continuing trustee—which includes a refusing or retiring trustee—may by writing appoint another person or other persons to be a trustee or trustees in the place of the trustee dead, &c." What does "another person or other persons" mean? Does it mean some other person than the trustee who is dead or become incapable of acting, or does it mean some other person than the person appointing. Whatever it means, it must mean the same, whether the person appointing is the surviving or continuing trustee or whether he is the personal representative of the last surviving or continuing trustee. Now let us go back. The power is given to the person nominated by the instrument, if any, creating the trust to make the new appointment. He is to appoint "another person or other persons" to be trustee or trustees in place of the trustee dead. Surely that must mean some person other than the person appointing. If there is no such person expressly nominated, then the surviving or continuing trustee is to act. It would be strange indeed if the surviving or continuing trustee could appoint himself. In any of the cases mentioned in the section the surviving or continuing trustee could not appoint himself, because in the one case he is already a trustee, and in the other case he is a retiring or refusing trustee. It is clear, therefore, that the words must mean some other person than the surviving or continuing trustee exercising the power, and therefore some other person than the personal representative of the last surviving or continuing trustee, because what it means in the one case it must mean in the other. Without expressing any difference of opinion as to the decision of Buckley, J., about which I will only say that it may require further consideration hereafter, I find that this case comes within the exception to which he there refers, and I hold that the appointment of E. J. Sampson was a bad appointment. I cannot comply with the applicant's request and confirm an appointment which is bad, but I will appoint him a trustee under the powers which the court has.

Solicitors, Barlow, Barlow, & Lyde.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Feb. 15.

QUINION v. HORNE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conditions of sale—Condition as to requisitions—Unwillingness to comply with requisition—Vendor's right to rescind.

A condition of sale empowering the vendor to rescind the contract in the event of his being unable to remove or comply with any objection or requisition made by the purchaser will not justify the vendor in exercising such power of rescission arbitrarily or without reasonable cause, and, in the event of the vendor purporting so to exercise it, the purchaser can enforce the contract.

Trial of action.

In this action the plaintiff was the purchaser of certain property at Hounslow, which was put up for sale by auction on the 11th of October, 1905.

The defendant was the vendor, and sold as trustee of the will of one Joseph Sexton.

By his will Joseph Sexton gave and devised (inter alia) the property in question to trustees, upon trust to pay the rents and profits arising from the same to Maria Ann Sexton Knevett (afterwards Mrs. Maria Ann Sexton Wells) for her life, and after her death upon trust to sell, and hold the net proceeds of sale in trust for the child or children of M. A. S. Knevett who should be living at her death and have attained or attain twenty-one years of age in equal shares. The testator further provided that if M. A. S. Knevett died without leaving any child surviving her the trustees should convey the property to J. S. K. and S. K. as tenants in common.

The result of these provisions of the testator's will was that the trust for sale only held good in the event of M. A. S. Knevett having left a child who was still living

The sale was conducted subject to printed conditions of sale, and condition No. 11 was in the following terms: "11. Within seven days after the delivery of the abstract, each purchaser shall furnish to the solicitor to the vendor at his office as aforesaid a statement in writing of his requisitions and objections (if any) in respect of the title to the lot or lots purchased by him, and all matters appearing on the abstract, particulars, or conditions, and every requisition not so stated within the time aforesaid shall be considered as waived, and for the purpose of any objection or requisition the abstract shall be deemed perfect if it supply the information suggesting the same although otherwise defective, and if no requisition or objection is so stated the title shall be considered accepted, and in these respects time shall be deemed of the essence of the contract, and if any purchaser shall make any objection or requisition either as to title, the form of the conveyance, or other assurance to the purchaser, or any matter appearing in the particulars, conditions, or abstract or otherwise, which the vendor shall be unable or unwilling to remove or comply with, the vendor shall (notwithstanding any previous negotiation or litigation or attempt to remove or comply with the same) be at liberty to annul the sale, in which case the sale shall be annulled, such purchaser being in that event entitled to a return of his deposit, but without interest, costs of investigating title, or any compensation or payment whatsoever, and he shall return the abstract of title or any other papers in his possession received from the vendor or his solicitor."

In these circumstances the purchaser's solicitors delivered (inter alia) the following requisitions, and received thereto the adjoining replies:

No.	Requisitions.	Replies.
3.	What children survived the said M. A. S. Knevett and what are their names and addresses?	Mrs. M. A. Sexton Wells left six children her surviving.
4.	When and where was M. A. S. Knevett married? A certificate of such marriage should be produced.	The information is not in the vendor's possession, but can be obtained, if required, at the purchaser's expense.
5.	If M. A. S. Knevett had no child, why was not this property conveyed to J. S. K. and S. K.?	See reply to No. 3.

A short correspondence then ensued in connection with these requisitions and the replies thereto. The plaintiff's solicitor was informed of the names of the six children, but all requests for information as to the date and place of birth of one only of these children met with no response beyond an intimation that the vendor had not such information in his possession.

Ultimately, by a letter dated the 2nd of November, 1905, the solicitor of the vendor gave notice that the vendor rescinded the contract, owing to his unwillingness to procure the required information, which, he contended, did not affect the title.

Thereupon the purchaser offered to withdraw the requisition in question, which offer was not accepted. He accordingly commenced this action.

By his statement of claim he asked for (1) a declaration that the defendant was not entitled under the circumstances to rescind the agreement, and that the same is still a valid and subsisting agreement; (2) specific performance of the said agreement, or, in the alternative, damages; (3) costs; (4) further or other relief.

The defendant, by his defence, alleged that neither the defendant nor his solicitor had any knowledge, or had in their possession any information as to the date and birth of any of Mrs. Wells's children, and such information could not have been obtained without trouble and expense. The information asked for was not necessary, nor would it have been effectual to complete the plaintiff's title.

The defendant rescinded the contract for sale bonâ fide in order to avoid trouble and expense, and because he considered the plaintiff's requisition vexatious and unreasonable.

Jenkins, K.C., and J. Samuel Green, for the plaintiff.—The vendor has acted capriciously and unreasonably. The requisition was one which could easily have been answered. The court will see that the requisitions are such as a reasonable conveyancer might make. In this case it was vital for the purchaser to know that the trust for sale had arisen. The purchaser has been harshly and arbitrarily treated.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. R. Brooke, for the defendant.—The defendant is a trustee, and his beneficiaries limit him in the matter of expense. It is sufficient if there was an honest reason for rescinding The vendor took advice and acted on it, and he cannot therefore be said to have acted arbitrarily. There was an honest belief, and no caprice. The vendor was at liberty to rescind for the purpose of avoiding trouble and expense. As regards his beneficiaries, a trustee is not justified in going to expense in answering a requisition by the mere fact that a requisition involving expense has been made.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jenkins, K.C., replied.

FARWELL, J. (after stating the above facts).—The cases certainly show that some limitation is to be put upon the word "unwilling." It is not merely intended to indicate the caprice of the vendor in the sense that it is enough for him to say, "I will it, and there is an end of it." Cotton, L.J., in In re Dames and Wood, 33 W. R. 685, 29 Ch. D. 626, states this to be the result of the cases in his opinion. Chitty, J. (as he then was), commented upon this in In re Starr-Bowkett Building Society and Sibun's Contract, 38 W. R. 1, 42 Ch. D. 375. I think that so far as the comments of the learned judge extend to the giving of reasons they do not apply to the present case I take him to be suggesting that the Lord Justice was talking about reasonableness, and shewing reasonable ground, when it had already been decided that no reasons at all need be given. In any case, so far as I am concerned, the trustee and his solicitor have, in the present case, gone into the witness box, and have given their reasons, and been cross-examined about them, so that I am not concerned to consider whether or not they were bound to show or give reasons. Having heard their reasons, I have now to consider whether they were reasonable or not. I am not prepared to say that the Court of Appeal, in the Starr-Bowkett case, having had the advantage of hearing Chitty, J.'s, judgment, commenting upon their own former decision, in any way intended to withdraw from what they had said before. They do not say so, and Lopes, L.J., uses this expression: "provided it was not done capriciously, and provided the unwillingness or inability was reasonable." These are two distinct propositions. When the vendor has himself appeared as a witness and given his reasons in the box, then I have to see whether those reasons are a mere arbitrary exercise of his own will or whether they rest upon any rational foundation on which any ordinary reasonable man is entitled to rely.

When the courts once begin to interfere with the strict wording of a contract they always find themselves in a difficulty, but I am only following the lead which is set me, and I have to do the best I can with what has been done before. It is said that you are not to act capriciously—meaning, I suppose, without any apparent reason, and that it is not a question of seeing whether there was reasonable ground or not, because here no possible reason can be suggested. That does not appear to me to be altogether satisfactory. I rather prefer the word which Mr. Upjohn, I think, suggested—"arbitrarily"—which I take to mean without any reasonable cause, and that word indicates the test which I propose to apply to the present case.

Now, the only ground suggested was the fear of expense. I was told that these beneficiaries were very urgent that no expense should be incurred, and I have gone through the correspondence, which shows that no extra expense was invited to be incurred. It was not suggested that they should put their hands into their pockets for one penny. The requisition and the subsequent requests for the desired information were of a very moderate nature, and the answer could have been given as simply as possible by referring the inquirers to the beneficiary, whose address in Belgium was known, or to the solicitors for the other beneficiaries. But the vendor and his solicitor seem to have persuaded themselves that there was some risk of costs underlying this innocent and necessary inquiry, and they absolutely refused to answer it. To my mind that was not reasonable. Unless the vendor is so much the master of the situation that he is entitled to say, "I will not give you any information at all, I will not even tell you the man's address when I know it, so that you can go to him for the information; I will not even tell you the names of the solicitors who acted for the beneficiaries, although it is obviously necessary that some information should be obtained about them"—and this is not the law as it stands at present—then I do not see how in this case the rescission can be otherwise than arbitrary and without reasonable cause.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors, Wickes & Knight, for Garner & Sons, Hounslow; H. R. Peake.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Jan. 29, 30, 31; Feb. 7.

DENMAN v. WESTMINSTER CORPORATION.
CORDING v. WESTMINSTER CORPORATION. (a.)

*Metropolis—Streets—Widening—Compulsory powers—House—Adjudication to take whole—Part to be thrown into street—Prior agreement to re-sell surplus portion subject to right of pre-emption—Bona fides—Michael Angelo Taylor's Act,* 1817 (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.), ss. 80, 96.

An adjudication under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act is only binding if, after considering the facts, the local authority giving the notice bonâ fide believes that the property adjudicated to be necessary is necessary for the purpose of carrying out the proposed widening: Gard v. Commissioners of Sewers, 28 Ch. D. 486, 33 W. R. Dig. 106, and Lynch v. Commissioners of Sewers, 34 W. R. 226, 32 Ch. D. 72, followed.

When the local authority wishes to take the whole of a house, but the owner only desires them to take part, the question to be determined is whether what will be left will be a house, regard being had to the work by way of shoring and reconstruction which the owner is willing to do.

Quære, can a local authority under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act acquire some only of the several interests in the premises which go to make up the freehold?

Action.

The plaintiffs in the first action were wine merchants carrying on business at Denman House, Piccadilly, and the plaintiffs in the second action were makers of waterproofs, and underlessees of part of Denman House.

The facts were of a most complicated nature, but may be thus summarized:

Denman & Co. were lessees from the Crown for a term expiring in 1982.

At the point in Piccadilly where Denman House stood a widening of about 27 feet was contemplated.

An hotel company or syndicate was also anxious to acquire an extensive site in Piccadilly, including that part of Denman House which it was not proposed to throw into the street.

For the purpose of carrying out these objects four agreements were entered into between the Crown, the London County Council, the Westminster City Council, and the hotel company, or some of them.

In April, 1905, the Westminster City Council adjudicated that the whole of Denman House was required for the widening, and in June notices to treat were accordingly served on the plaintiffs.

(a.) Reported by T. PAKENHAM LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question in these actions was whether those notices were valid. In addition to Cording & Co. there were also several other underlessees of parts of Denman House for short terms.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for Messrs. Denman, the plaintiffs in the first action.—The adjudication of the Westminster City Council was not arrived at bonâ fide; they passed it because they had contracted to do so, and it is therefore invalid: Thomas v. Daw, 15 W. R. 113, 2 Ch. 1; Gard v. Commissioners of Sewers, 28 Ch. D. 486; Lynch v. Commissioners of Sewers, 34 W. R. 226, 32 Ch. D. 72. Further, in the circumstances of this case, the whole of Denman House is not necessary for the purpose of the widening, therefore only the necessary part can be taken, if the house as a house is not destroyed: Teuliere v. St. Mary Abbotts, 30 Ch. D. 642, 34 W. R. Dig. 102; Gordon v. St. Mary Abbotts, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742; Aldis v. London Corporation, 47 W. R. 514, [1899] 2 Ch. 169; Gibbon v. Paddington Vestry, 49 W. R. 8, [1900] 2 Ch. 794; Pescod v. Westminster Corporation, ante, p. 89, [1905] 2 Ch. 475; Thompson v. Hammersmith Corporation, ante, p. 279; and Parry v. Hammersmith Corporation, 92 L. T. 161, 53 W. R. Dig. 108, 21 T. L. R. 86.

Buckmaster, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the defendants in both actions.—On the construction of the agreements we do not agree to exercise our compulsory powers for the purpose of acquiring lands not required for the widening. These very agreements were before Swinfen Eady, J., in Pescod v. Westminster Corporation, ante, p. 89, [1905] 2 Ch., at p. 489. The only question is, is the whole house properly takeable. There is no distinction between the cases where the owner wants only to give up part and the authority wants the whole, and where the owner wants to make the authority take the whole and the authority only wants to take part. In each case it is a question whether the identity of the house is destroyed: Teuliere v. St. Mary Abbotts Vestry, at pp. 642-647; Aldis v. London Corporation. Further, the statutory power of the local authority does not depend upon the owner's idiosyncracy; it is a question of fact to be decided by the court whether the whole is properly takeable or not. There is no certainty that Messrs. Denman's other sub-lessees take the same view as they do.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for Messrs. Cording, the plaintiffs in the second action.—No difficulty is caused if the other sub-lessees desire the whole of their premises to be taken, for in that case the authority would take the whole of their premises to the extent of the sub-lessee's interest and part of our premises to the extent of our interest. The Act does not authorize the local authority to acquire some only of the several interests in any premises which go to make up the fee simple.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, continued: I ask myself, after reading the agreements, what was the purpose of providing that the powers of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act should be put in force at the request of the syndicate. For the public purpose of widening the thoroughfare, the defendants owed the public duty of doing what was necessary to acquire all such land as was necessary for this purpose. There was no room for any request to be made by the syndicate or the hotel company as a preliminary to the local authority acquiring what was necessary for that purpose. But if the provisions as to request were addressed to the case of land which was not wanted for the purpose of the widening, they become intelligible. In any other case they are surplusage. Land necessary to be acquired for the purpose of the widening would include not only that which was actually to be thrown into the street, but that which, having regard to the circumstances of the case, it was necessary to acquire in addition, and which would be surplus land to be dealt with as provided by the Act. No request by the syndicate could be wanted or admissible to move the local authority to acquire all such land. These agreements, I think, intend a contract by the local authority that they will, at the request of the syndicate, use their statutory authority for the purpose of acquiring other and additional land for the purpose of throwing it into that which, under the bargain with the syndicate, was to be the subject of a new Crown lease in their favour for the purposes of the hotel.

In my opinion the Westminster City Council passed the resolution submitted by the London County Council because they had contracted to pass it. I find no evidence that they exercised any independent judgment of their own in the matter. There has been called for the defendants no one who represented either the defendants or the London County Council in the matter to say that the defendants exercised any such judgment. Mr. Andrew Young, who was called, actually said that he did not think it singular that the local authority should agree by the exercise of the powers of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act to get this land for the syndicate; it is, he said, a common thing to do. I am startled and shocked at this statement. The local authority are entrusted with statutory powers, to be used bonâ fide for the statutory purpose, and for none other. They have no right to seek to reduce the expense to the ratepayers by straining their powers in the interest of persons who desire to acquire the adjacent land from those who are the owners of it. The language of section 80 of the Act is that, if any houses, walls, buildings, &c., or any part thereof shall be "adjudged," and so on. The defendants were in this matter exercising a power in its nature judicial. They were bound to form an honest judgment, after consideration of all the facts of the case, whether the whole of Denman House or any part thereof was, or was not, necessary to be acquired bonâ fide for the purpose of widening Piccadilly. Their duty was to arrive at an honest decision in the matter, in the sense that, after considering the facts, they ought to have said whether they bonâ fide believed that the entirety or any and what part of the property was wanted —not necessarily for the purpose of throwing it into the thoroughfare, but bonâ fide for the purposes of carrying out the widening of the thoroughfare. If they have not accepted the responsibility of such a decision, and in that sense arrived at an honest adjudication, their decision is not binding. That was decided in Gard v. Commissioners of Sewers and Lynch v. Commissioners of Sewers. In my opinion the defendants did not so consider and adjudicate upon the matter, and their adjudication is not binding.

I go on to see whether, upon the facts of the case, this house was such as that the defendants, who unquestionably were entitled to take part of it, were entitled to take the whole. The building was of a depth of fifty-seven feet. The strip will take off something less than an average of twenty-seven feet in the front, leaving a depth of thirty feet. The plaintiffs say that this reduced depth will allow of premises suitable for their businesses, and that they desire to retain that thirty feet and the building upon it, and not to be dispossessed of the site which is to them of so great value. As matter of construction, the building may be said to consist of two moieties, the line of division between which is, strangely enough, almost coincident with the line of the proposed new frontage in Piccadilly. The building and its floors are carried upon steel girders and steel joists. In the centre of the back moiety of the building is what is practically a tower of brickwork, composed of four walls enclosing the staircase and lift. The southern wall of this tower falls just north of the proposed new line of frontage. From the central tower there run steel joists, east and west from the tower to the external walls, and on the eastern part of the back moiety some steel joists run north and south from the first-mentioned steel joists to the north wall. This system of joists is self-contained in the back moiety of the house. The front moiety, which would be the part to be demolished, has a central pillar near the front wall which supports a long girder running east and west right across the building. The system of joists in this front moiety of the house runs north and south from the south wall to this girder and from this girder to the girders first above described, which run east and west from the central tower to the outer walls. The existence of the central tower in the back moiety of the house gives that moiety such a stability as that there is no practical difficulty in demolishing the front part of the house, leaving the back half standing. The building is built in cement, which gives it large additional strength. The defendants' plans for widening the street include a canting off of the south-east angle of the building. This will create some difficulty. Further, the construction of the building, as regards some of the short joists at this point, and as regards an arch which is turned over the windows above the mezzanine floor, will require some readjustment, and it will, of course, be necessary to put a new front or south wall to the reduced building. The line of that wall would be substantially the line of the southern wall of the staircase tower, but really a little south of it.

The short result of the facts is that upon the thirty feet of depth which are not wanted for the widening there is no difficulty in preserving, with a certain amount of reconstruction, so much of the building as stands on that thirty feet. I may add that there is an existing entrance in Air-street, at the north-east corner, which would be available to give access during the alterations. In Tuliere v. St. Mary Abbotts and Aldis v. London Corporation there is authority for saying that, where the landowner desires to retain part, the local authority cannot insist on taking the whole unless the remainder will be useless. There is, however, great difficulty in saying that the power of the local authority is to be determined by ascertaining ex post facto what the landowner desires, and the more so if the owner who expresses the wish is a limited owner. One limited owner might take one view and another another view. The freeholder might wish the whole to be taken; the leaseholder might wish to keep part. Upon this part of the case I do not rest my decision upon any principle to be deduced from those cases, to the effect that the power of the local authority is measured by the wish of the owner. But I think that the attitude which the owner takes up is not to be disregarded. The question to be decided is whether that which will be left will be a house. If the owner whose estate is in possession is desirous of doing upon his own land such work, by way of shoring and reconstruction, as that that which will be left will be a house, I think regard ought to be had to that fact. Under such circumstances the local authority in demolishing part will be leaving that which, having regard to the acts which the owner desires to do, will be a house available for him as a house. In every case where part of a house is demolished (say a porch or a cellar) some reconstruction will be required. The question cannot, therefore, I think, be answered by saying that the thing left will require some reconstruction before it will be complete as a house. The question is one of degree. Will there be so much left as that a house will be left? In answering that question regard is, I think, to be given to the fact that the owner is willing to do what is necessary to make that which remains an effectual house. To my mind the question in these cases is one of fact, and largely one of degree. If the projected widening were such as to take eighteen inches off the frontage of a house sixty feet deep, it would, I think, be fallacious to argue that, inasmuch as it would be necessary to pull down the front wall, that which was left would not be a house, even when the owner whose estate is in possession is minded to erect a new front wall. I arrive at the conclusion that the local authority are not here entitled to take more than is wanted for the widening of the street, and that the thirty feet depth which will remain after the widening is not wanted, but is a building which can be and ought to be left as a house which the plaintiffs, who are its owners, desire to retain, and from which the defendants have no right to dispossess them for the purpose of putting the hotel company into possession. As regards Pescod v. Westminster Corporation, the relevant facts were different, and consequently the decision was different. I find it unnecessary to express an opinion upon the argument which Mr. Gore-Browne addressed to me upon the question whether the local authority can, under this Act, acquire some only of the several interests in the premises which go to make up the fee simple. It is, I think, a question of difficulty, and I keep my mind open upon it until it shall be necessary to decide it. I think the plantiffs are entitled to injunctions to restrain the defendants from proceeding upon the notices to treat. I grant those injunctions and order the defendants to pay the costs of the actions. There will, of course, be a separate judgment in each action.

Judgment for the plaintiffs in each case.

Solicitors, Hollams, Son, Coward, & Hawkesley; Vallance & Vallance; W. A. Blaxland; Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) — Jan. 13.

REX v. JOHNSTONE.
Ex parte COBBOLD. (a.)

Licensing law—Provisional licence—Period of seven years—Confirming authority—Licensing Acts, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 13; 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 22; 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 23), s. 4, sub-section 3.

Licensing Act, 1874, s. 22: "Any person interested in any premises about to be constructed . . . for the purpose of being used as a house for the sale of intoxicating liquors . . . may apply to the licensing justices and the confirming authority for the provisional grant and confirmation of a licence in respect of such premises. . . . A provisional grant and order of confirmation shall not be of any validity until it has been declared to be final by an order of the licensing justices. . . ."

Licensing Act, 1904, s. 4, sub-section 3: "The justices may, if they think fit, instead of granting a new on-licence as an annual licence, grant the licence for a term not exceeding seven years."

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the powers of granting a provisional licence under section 22 of the Licensing Act, 1874, are applicable to the grant of a licence for a period of seven years under section 4, sub-section 3, of the Licensing Act, 1904; it is no objection to such a grant that the licence will not commence to run from or determine on the 5th of April of any year in accordance with section 13 of the Alehouses Act, 1828, as amended by section 33 of the Licensing Act, 1902.

Rule nisi for a mandamus calling upon the licensing confirming authority of the Essex Sessions to hear and determine the application for the confirmation of a licence which they had refused to confirm on the ground that it had been granted for more than seven years allowed by section 4, sub-section 3, of the Licensing Act, 1904.

The provisional licence had been granted by the justices to Mr. Cobbold under section 22 of the Licensing Act, 1874, in respect to a proposed hotel and restaurant at Parkeston. The licence contained the following clause: "This licence shall be in force for seven years from the date of the declaration by the justices under the Licensing Act, 1874, s. 22, that the proposed house has been completed in accordance with the deposited plans." One of the conditions indorsed was that the monopoly value to be paid by the licensee to be £180 per annum. The confirming authority refused to confirm this provisional licence on the ground that it was a licence for a longer period than the maximum of seven years specified under section 4 of the Licensing Act, 1904.

Rowsell showed cause.—The provisional licence was operative during the time that it was provisional, and therefore the seven years provided by the section has been exceeded. The licensing authority would have no control over the monopoly value for a period which might considerably exceed seven years, if, for example, it were three years before the hotel was built. Secondly, the grant must be for a period provided for by statute—viz., it must begin and terminate on some 5th of April: section 13 of Alehouse Act, 1828, as amended by section 33 of the Licensing Act, 1902. If the confirming order was made on the 1st of August the seven years would expire on the 1st of August, and there would be a hiatus till the following February sessions.

He referred to Reg. v. London Justices, 38 W. R. 369, 24 Q. B. D. 341.

Pickford, K.C. (Poyser with him).—Section 13 of the Act of 1828 applied only to annual licences from the 5th of April to 5th of April, as the section clearly states, and therefore cannot apply to a licence granted for a term of seven years. As regards the monopoly value, there is no monopoly value until there be an effective licence. There is no effective licence until the order of confirmation is made: see the words of section 22 of the Act of 1874, viz.: "A provisional grant shall not be of any validity until it has been declared to be final by an order of the licensing justices."

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The point raised is clearly one which requires careful consideration. But in my opinion the justices have struck too soon in saying that they would not entertain this application for the confirmation of a provisional licence granted under section 22 of the Act of 1874. The main contention is that the grant of a licence under section 22 to run for seven years to commence from a future period—namely, the time that the licence is confirmed, contravenes section 4, sub-section 3, of the 1904 Act. [His lordship read the sub-section.] The argument, which was based upon the decision in Reg. v. Justices of London, was that section 22 deals with a licence which is subject to many of the incidents of an ordinary licence. There is provision for the application of renewal, and for an appeal, and other incidents. Therefore, if the true view of section 22 were that it was an operative licence from the time the grant was made, I think there would be a great deal to be said for Mr. Rowsell's argument. But I think, looking at the good sense of the thing, that is not the substance of a grant under section 22, because the section provides: [His lordship read the section.] Therefore although for some purposes the grant of a licence under section 22 may be equivalent to the grant of an ordinary licence, yet it does not dispose of the question whether or not the powers under section 4, sub-section 3, of the 1904 Act can be applied to the grant of a licence under section 22 of the 1874 Act and whether or not it is correct in law to say that the licence shall be for seven years commencing from the time stated. On the common sense of the thing one cannot see why the Legislature could not intend to have applied to a licence under section 22 the provisions of section 4, sub-section 3, of the 1904 Act, as well as to an ordinary licence. When one loooks at the substance of the thing, it is a right to have a licence upon the fulfilment of certain conditions. When the hotel is built it was considered that there ought to be a licence for the premises if it be built according to the plans. Clearly it was permissible for the justices to say that it should not be a licence from year to year but for a certain time, in cases in which the justices are of opinion that a man should be allowed to build a house with the promise it should be a licensed house. I see no reason why this should not apply to a licence under section 22. Mr. Rowsell says, even admitting that to be so, yet it must be for such a period as will not exceed seven years from the day the order was made. That overlooks the true construction of section 22. It is not an effective licence from the date of the order, it has only some of the incidents of one, but it is an effective licence from the date of confirmation. The confirming authority ought to consider it on its merits. I express no opinion as to what they should do in this case. It may be they will consider that it ought not to be confirmed, or not for such a term. It is for them to deal with. The only point which causes difficulty is that which arises from the fact it contravenes the time from which ordinary licences run—viz., from the 5th of April of one year to the 5th of April of the next, and it may be that our decision does create some difficulty not expressly dealt with by the Legislature. That does not seem to me a reason for allowing a different construction of section 4 if that section appears to us clear. It might be met by an application made to the licensing authority at the first court meeting before the seven years' period expires or it may be possible to apply under some other provision. It may be a point for the confirming authority to deal with by altering the term so that it may expire on the 5th of April of some year. It was not ultra vires to apply to a licence granted under section 22 the provision giving the justices power to grant a licence for a period of seven years. I think the confirming authority ought to have heard the application.

RIDLEY and DARLING, JJ., concurred.

Rule made absolute.

Solicitors for the rule, Goddard, Sons, & Holme, for Ward & Jones, Harrow.

Solicitors for the defendant, Patersons, Sace, Bloxam, & Kinder, for W. H. Gibson, Chelmsford.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Nov. 21.

ELLIOTT v. CRUTCHLEY AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Contract—Performance impossible—Cheque given as part payment—Express provision if caterer incurred no expense.

The appellant agreed with respondents to supply refreshments at a fixed tariff on board a pleasure steamer on the occasion of a Naval Review to be held on the 28th of June, £300 to be paid on account on the Monday before the review. In accepting the contract the respondents wrote, on the 23rd of June, "It is, of course, understood that in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the caterer there shall be no liability on our side," and a cheque for £300 was duly sent in part payment of the contract. The appellant spent nothing on refreshments, and there was no dispute as to any initial outlay by the caterer. The next day the review was cancelled, and the respondents stopped payment of the cheque.

Held, that the respondents were not liable, and could not be sued on the cheque.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 499, [1904] 1 K. B. 565) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) (52 W. R. 499, [1904] 1 K. B. 565), affirming a decision of Ridley, J.

The facts are given at length in the court below, and shortly in the headnote.

The case turned entirely upon the construction of the contract.

Witt, K.C., and A. P. Poley, for the appellant.

Shearman, K.C., and Eustace Hills, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—We are all of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. It is said that the construction which we adopt is not at all applicable to the language used, but we may comfort ourselves with the reflection that four persons who are not unfamiliar with the business have construed these words in the way in which we construe them.

I entirely agree with Mr. Witt's protest, a very solemn protest, against making a contract for the parties. I agree with him that it would be most improper to depart from the contract they have made and to make what we consider a fairer contract.

The only observation I have to make in reply to that is, that neither the court below nor ourselves had or have the least idea of doing anything of the kind. The question we have to determine is what is the real business meaning of the contract which has been made by these parties? It is a contract made, not in the formal method of a contract reduced to writing by a lawyer, but made in the businesslike communication of parties with each other in letters. When I look at the letters I cannot entertain the least doubt that what they really meant was what they said—namely, that if the review went off there was to be no liability; and then, of course, the one thing is correlative to the other—if there is no liability on the one side there is to be none on the other. That is indeed, what they did say in one of the earlier letters, and in fact it follows from the contract itself.

If one looks at the situation of the parties—at what they were dealing with and the contingency which they both contemplated—namely, the possibility of the review going off—there is no room for doubt as to what they meant. I entirely agree with the whole of the Court of Appeal, and with Ridley, J., that as a fact what they meant was that in the event which happened there should be no other liability than that which had been already incurred by the contractor. I understand there has never been any dispute that he ought to be paid back the expense which he had already incurred, and which amounted to £20. But in regard to the cheque for £300, which was to be given in respect of refreshments, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that there is no liability in respect of that matter.

Therefore I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I agree. I cannot profess to think the matter either doubtful or difficult.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This is simply an action on a cheque to recover the amount of the cheque—viz., £300, neither more nor less. It is impossible, to my mind, to read the two letters of the 4th and 5th of March and come to the conclusion that this action for £300 can lie. The appellant's construction of these letters is not the meaning of the parties. I entirely adopt the true and fair construction put upon those letters by the Court of Appeal.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, Samuel Price & Sons; Dowson, Ainslie, & Martineau.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Feb. 26.

In re WHALLEY. (a.)

Lunacy—Person "lawfully detained" under the Idiots Act, 1886—Appointment of committee—Jurisdiction—Idiots Act, 1886 (49 Vict. c. 25)—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 116, sub-section 1 (c).

The court has jurisdiction under section 116, sub-section 1 (c), of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to make an order appointing a committee of the estate of a person of unsound mind lawfully detained in an asylum under the provisions of the Idiots Act, 1886.

In re Watkins, 44 W. R. 609, [1896] 2 Ch. 336, distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

The question raised on this summons was whether the court had jurisdiction under section 116, sub-section 1 (c) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to make an order appointing a committee of a lunatic not so found by inquisition, but lawfully detained in a lunatic asylum under the provisions of the Idiots Act, 1886.

Prior to the year 1886 two brothers, Mark and William Whalley, being persons of unsound mind, were received into the Earlswood Asylum for Idiots, and were there "lawfully detained" since 1886 under the provisions of the Idiots Act, 1886.

On the 12th of January, 1906, the trustees of the brothers Whalley, being anxious that committees of their estates should be legally appointed so as to enable them (the trustees) to obtain a valid discharge for moneys paid on the idiots' behalf, summonses were issued by Frederick Henry Whalley, a second cousin of the brothers Whalley, asking for the appointment of himself as committee of their estates.

(a.) Reported by E. WAVELL RIDGES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 116, sub-section 1 (c) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, it is provided that the powers and provisions of that part of the Act relating to management and administration are to apply to "every person lawfully detained as a lunatic, though not so found by inquisition."

Section 341 of the same Act provides that in that Act, if not inconsistent with the context, "lunatic" means an idiot or person of unsound mind.

Eve, K.C., and Methold, for the applicant.—Under section 116, sub-section 1 (c), the court has power to make the order asked for. It is true that under section 17 of the Idiots Act, 1886, the term "idiots" or "imbeciles" does not include lunatics, and that the term "lunatic" does not mean or include idiot or imbecile. In fact, the two expressions are mutually exclusive. But section 341 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, provides that the term "lunatic" in that Act means an idiot or person of unsound mind, and that definition would include a person lawfully detained as an idiot under the Act of 1886. In re Watkins, 44 W. R. 609, [1896] 2 Ch. 336, is clearly distinguishable from the present case, because there the lunatic was detained in a foreign country, under the laws of that country; here the brothers Whalley are detained in England under an English Act. In in re Watkins there is a dictum of Lopes, L.J., to the effect that "lawfully detained" in section 116, sub-section 1 (c), means lawfully detained under the Act of 1890. But the decision should not be extended further than the particular case.

COLLINS, M.R.—I think this case is free from difficulty, and only one case has been cited which throws any doubt upon it. Section 116, sub-section 1 (c), provides that the provisions of the Act as to management and administration are to apply to "every person lawfully detained as a lunatic, though not so found by inquisition." The Idiots Act, 1886, contains provisions for receiving idiots or imbeciles under age into any hospital, institution, or licensed house, and for retaining them there after they are of full age. There is no question that the persons to whom this case relates are lawfully detained in Earlswood Asylum under the Act of 1886. Now the expression "lawfully detained" in section 116 of the Act of 1890 does not exclude persons detained under earlier enactments unless there are express words to that effect, and there are none. Therefore primâ facie the narrower construction could not be placed upon the Act of 1890 without ignoring the earlier enactment. The objection to the jurisdiction is based on the case of In re Watkins, and it has been suggested that that case is an authority for narrowing the jurisdiction of the court. But there the question was whether the court had jurisdiction over a person lawfully detained under the laws of Belgium, and the only point decided was that the court had no jurisdiction in such a case. The decision was that there was no other source of jurisdiction than the Act of 1890, and that the lady in question, not coming under the Act of 1890, was outside the jurisdiction. No question was raised about any earlier enactment, and the Act of 1886 was not present to the minds of the Lords Justices. That decision only applied to a person lawfully detained by foreign law, and the case is clearly distinguishable from the one we are now considering. No doubt the point was worth discussing, but there can be no doubt that this court has jurisdiction in a case like this, and I think the orders should be made.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—It would be unfair to treat In re Watkins as having any bearing upon the present case. In fact the decision there has nothing whatever to do with the case of a person lawfully detained under the Act of 1886. It is especially provided by section 340 of the Act of 1890 that that Act "shall not affect the provisions of the Idiots Act, 1886." Section 116, sub-section 1 (c), limits the jurisdiction to persons "lawfully detained," and there is no doubt that these persons are lawfully detained. I think the orders should be made.

Solicitors for the applicant, Bolton & Co.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 13, 14.

HOOPER v. HERTS. (a.)

Company—Shares—Transferor and transferee—Blank transfer—Implied contract by transferor.

There is an implied obligation on the part of a transferor of shares to do nothing to prevent his transferee getting the benefit of the transfer. W., a shareholder in a company, handed the certificate of the shares and a blank transfer to H. to enable him to raise a loan. H. endeavoured to raise the loan from the plaintiff. The plaintiff declined to advance the money personally, but he found a bank who were willing to advance it to him on his personal security. H. thereupon authorized the plaintiff to raise a loan on the security of the shares, and undertook to indemnify him against loss. In pursuance of this authority the plaintiff handed the share certificate and transfer to the bank, and received from them the amount of the loan, which he paid to H. The bank filled in the name of the plaintiff as transferee, and lodged the certificate and transfer for registration with the company. The company informed W., who notified them that the transfer was irregular. By reason of such notification the company declined to proceed with the transfer, and it was not completed till the shares had fallen very considerably in value. H. became bankrupt and never repaid the plaintiff any portion of the loan, all of which had eventually to be repaid by the plaintiff to the bank.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to damages as against W. for breach of the implied obligation on W.'s part to do nothing to prevent or delay the registration of the shares, the measure of such damages being the difference between the amount the plaintiff might reasonably have obtained by realizing the shares at the time of the breach and their actual value at the date when he obtained registration.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from so much of the judgment of Kekewich, J., as dismissed the plaintiff's claim for damages for breach of an implied contract or obligation on the part of the defendant Whatton not to prevent or delay the registration of a bonâ fide transferee of certain shares in the Smelting and Refining Co. of Australia (1901) (Limited).

The facts were as follows:

In the year 1904 the defendant Whatton was the registered holder of 1,467 7 per cent. preference shares in the said smelting company.

About the 8th of January, 1906, he delivered to the defendant Herts the certificate for these shares and a blank transfer of such shares duly executed, and he instructed the defendant Herts to borrow money on these shares.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 13th of January, 1904, the defendant Whatton wrote to the defendant Herts as follows: "With regard to the smelting shares, I am anxious to know what you have done or can do. Please don't postpone the matter if you have not already seen about it. One ought to be able to borrow on those shares up to a good value at 4 per cent."

On the 14th of January the defendant Herts saw the plaintiff and requested the plaintiff to advance him £700 on the security of the deposit of the said shares and signed transfer.

The defendant Herts produced to the plaintiff the said certificate and signed transfer, and also showed him the defendant Whatton's letter of the 13th of January.

The plaintiff informed the defendant Herts that he was unable himself to find the money required, but that he would endeavour to borrow it from the Mines and Banking Corporation (Limited).

The corporation declined to lend to either of the defendants, but agreed to lend the plaintiff the sum of £700 on the security of the shares, and also the plaintiff's personal liability, at 10 per cent. interest, the loan to be repaid with such interest within fifteen days from being made.

The plaintiff informed the defendant Herts of the decision of the corporation.

The defendant Herts thereupon wrote to the plaintiff authorizing him to raise a loan of £700 on the security of the shares and undertaking to indemnify him against any loss.

In pursuance of this authority the plaintiff handed the share certificate and transfer to the corporation and received from the corporation the sum of £700, which he paid to the defendant Herts.

The name of the plaintiff was filled in the transfer as transferee, and the corporation lodged the certificate and transfer for registration with the smelting company in March, 1904. The smelting company, in accordance with the usual custom, notified the defendant Whatton of the lodging of the transfer.

The defendant Whatton wrote that the transfer was not in order and should not be completed. In consequence of this notification the transfer of the shares was not completed until after the commencement of the present action.

Evidence was given to show that in March, 1904, the shares were of considerable value, but that there had been a great fall since, and by the time the transfer was completed they had become practically worthless.

Herts never repaid the plaintiff any part of the £700, and the corporation pressed the plaintiff for repayment.

In these circumstances the plaintiff on the 30th of April, 1904, commenced the present action claiming as against Herts repayment of the £700 and interest, and as against Whatton a declaration that he was entitled to a charge on the shares for £700 and interest, and foreclosure or sale, and also for damages for breach of the implied obligation or contract on the part of the defendant Whatton not to do anything to prevent or delay the registration of a bonâ fide transfer for value of the shares.

At the date of the commencement of the action the corporation had not been paid, but they were paid off by the plaintiff before the trial.

The defendant Herts, who had become a bankrupt, did not appear.

The defendant Whatton put in a defence denying the authority of Herts to borrow money on the shares.

Kekewich, J., found that Herts had authority to borrow money on the shares and that the plaintiff was entitled to a charge on them. But as regards the claim for damages the learned judge held that the plaintiff was only a nominee for the corporation and that the corporation had sustained no damage. He was therefore of opinion that the plaintiff was not in a position to sustain the claim for damages, and that he could not be said to have suffered damage. He accordingly dismissed the claim for damages.

The plaintiff appealed against so much of the judgment as dismissed the claim for damages.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Napier, for the appellant.—There is an implied obligation upon the person signing a blank transfer to do nothing to prevent the completion of the transfer: London Founders' Association v. Clark, 36 W. R. 489, 20 Q. B. D. 576; Skinner v. City of London Marine Insurance Co., 33 W. R. 628, 14 Q. B. D. 882. If a blank transfer is handed over to a person, it is handed over by the transferor with the intention of entering into this implied obligation with anyone whose name is properly entered on the blank transfer. Kekewich, J., was of opinion that the plaintiff in this case was a mere nominee and that his principal, having sustained no damage, he could recover nothing: but on the facts that is not so: France v. Clark, 32 W. R. 466, 26 Ch. D. 257; Ex parte Sargent, In re Tahiti Cotton Co., 22 W. R. 815, 17 Eq. 273; Gurney v. Seppings, 2 Ph. 40; Moore v. North-Western Bank. [1891], 2 Ch. 599, 39 W. R Dig. 48. [ROMER, L J., referred to In re East Wheal Martha Mining Co., 33 B. 119, 11 W. R. Dig. 46.]

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the respondent.—The plaintiff Hooper's rights against Whatton only arise by estoppel. There is no contract between Hooper and Whatton at all. The rights between a vendor of shares and his transferee arise not from the transfer but from the contract of sale which precedes the transfer: Skinner v. City of London Marine Insurance Co. Hooper was not a transferee in his own right or beneficially. He was the nominee of the Mines Corporation. The Mines Corporation have suffered no damage and their nominee cannot recover damages if his principal would fail.

No reply was called for.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J. The plaintiff in this case claims a declaration that by virtue of the deposit with the plaintiff of a transfer in blank signed by the defendant Whatton of 1,467 shares of a certain company and of the certificate of such shares, made by the defendant Herts, under the authority of the defendant Whatton, the plaintiff is entitled to a mortgage or charge on such shares for the said sum of £700, and interest. Herts did not appear. The learned judge made the declaration in the terms asked for by the plaintiffs. The shares in question are now of little or no value, and therefore the declaration was not of any great pecuniary advantage to the plaintiff.

But the plaintiff had also introduced by amending his writ and his claim: "Damages for breach of the implied contract or obligation by the defendant Whatton not to do anything to prevent or delay the registration of a bonâ fide purchaser for value of the shares referred to"; and it is upon that amendment that the question now in discussion arises. The learned judge having found, as I have said, in favour of the plaintiff upon the question of the declaration, felt himself in a difficulty in ordering damages to be paid under the amendment. In point of fact he held that there was an obligation between the plaintiff and the defendant and a breach of that obligation, but that in the circumstances the plaintiff was in such a position that he could not prove that he had sustained any damages by virtue of the breach; and it is upon that point that the appeal comes before us. The decision of the learned judge has narrowed the points in controversy before us very much indeed; it has cut away (because the defendants are not appealing here) a point that might be raised as to the invalidity of the actual ultimate transfer by the defendant Whatton in favour of the plaintiff Hooper.

Shortly stated the circumstances were these, and it is not necessary to go into them in detail, because, as I have said, the point arising for discussion upon that has been concluded by the finding of the learned judge: Herts was a person engaged in financial operations; Whatton, the defendant, was a clergyman, who appears also to have embarked in some speculative transactions—at all events the relations between him and Herts appear to have been intimate—and the learned judge found that Whatton appears to have been very much in the hands of Herts. Whatton was possessed of the shares mentioned in the writ, and he was desirous of raising money upon them. Herts also was in need of money, and there seems to be no doubt upon the evidence that Whatten was willing that Herts should use the shares belonging to Whatton as a security for a temporary loan to be raised by Herts for his own purposes. I think he was also desirous, but at a later date, of raising money himself upon them. Now, the machinery which he adopted to bring about this result was that he put into the hands of Herts a transfer of 1,467 preference shares in the company named, and he also handed him his certificates of those shares for the purpose of enabling him to raise a temporary loan, as I have said, for Herts's own purposes. Whether he also authorized him to raise a loan for himself, Whatton, or not, is immaterial in the case; he handed those documents for the purpose of using them for the purpose of raising the loan. The result was Herts went to Hooper, the plaintiff here, with whom he had had some relations before, and he got from Hooper on the security of this transfer and the certificate one or two loans of comparatively small amount at first—£150, or, probably, £200. But more money was wanted, and Herts took steps to induce Hooper to raise it from a certain company—I think it was a mining and banking company, at all events they were persons from whom Herts thought Hooper would be able, with the aid of these certificates, to raise the sum wanted. Accordingly Hooper, armed with the transfer and the certificates, put himself into communication with the mining bank, and the result was that they found him £700 upon the deposit of those securities with them.

The result of that transaction as between Herts and Whatton appears to have been that Whatton had put himself in such a position that he could not impugn the right of Hooper, or of the bank from whom Hooper had got the advance to deal with the transfer in the way they did deal with it, and the way it was dealt with between them and Hooper was, that Herts not returning the money, as he of course undertook to do, in a very short time, the bank naturally began to press for their money. The bank and Hooper were acting together in the matter, Hooper was responsible to them for the money that they had advanced, and they had the security of the transfer and the certificates which he had handed to them, and on which he had a charge to the extent of his own liability. They were acting together, and what the bank did was to put Hooper's name in the transfer so as to make it a transfer from the defendant Whatton to Hooper, and that being done, it was done for the common purpose, it seems to me, of realizing all that could be got out of the securities. That having been done, Hooper applies in the ordinary course to the company to register, and then comes the act on the part of the defendant Whatton which gives rise to the suggested cause of action which is the matter in controversy on this appeal. Whatton, instead of assisting in carrying out the transfer which he was estopped from denying, wrote to the company on the 26th of March putting a stop to the transfer, with the result that the shares could not by registered and any dealing with them on the part of Hooper, or of the bank, to realize the security was suspended, and it was not until the date of the writ, or, I think, February of the following year, that the shares were taken up. In the meantime those shares had depreciated in value so much that it is very doubtful whether they have any value at all at the present moment.

It is said that these shares had some considerable value at the time that the stoppage was put on them, and the question is whether in those circumstances there is any right of action for Hooper against Whatton. The learned judge had no doubt upon that part of the matter, whether a transferor who has transferred, I will assume for value, is under an obligation not to hinder the purchaser or the transferee from getting the benefit of that transfer—not to do anything himself to hinder his transferee from getting the full benefit involved in the fact that he has transferred. I will read the passages in which Lord Esher, then Master of the Rolls, expressed himself in the case of The London Founders' Association v. Clarke, but before reading them, perhaps I ought to state the facts of the case from the head-note: "A contract for the sale of shares in a registered company was made through brokers upon and subject to the rules of the Stock Exchange. In accordance with the practice of the Stock Exchange the transferee of the shares paid the price of them to the vendor upon the delivery to him of a duly executed transfer. An application for registration of the transfer being subsequently made to the directors of the company, who were empowered by the articles of association in their discretion to decline to register a person claiming by transfer of shares, they refused to register the transferee as a member of the company. The transferee thereupon brought an action to recover back the price of the shares from the vendor as money had and received to his use. Held, following Stray v. Russell, 1 E. & E. 888, 917, that the contract for the sale of shares on Stock Exchange did not import an undertaking by the vendor that the company would register the transferee, and that the action was not maintainable." Now the Master of the Rolls says this: "It seems to me that to hold the plaintiffs' contention to be correct would be in direct contravention of what was said" (that is, the contention that there was a total failure of the consideration, giving the plaintiff the right to recover back his money). "I have no doubt that the seller must not prevent or do anything to prevent the company from accepting the purchaser or his nominee. What the remedy would be if he did it is unnecessary now to consider. There is nothing here to show that the seller in this case did anything of the kind." Again, lower down he says: "The purchaser takes that risk on himself" (that is the risk of the company not approving the transfer) and the seller's liability is satisfied by handing to the purchaser the transfer and certificates of the shares, in proper form and doing nothing either before or subsequently to prevent the registration of the purchaser."

Now the learned judge had no doubt whatever upon that part of the case. He thought that an obligation had arisen upon Whatton not to interfere with the lawful results of anything done under the authority of the transfer, and therefore the only question in his mind was whether, there being a breach of that obligation on the part of Whatton by intervening and stopping the registration of these shares, the plaintiff was in a condition to claim damages. Before us the point has been raised, and insisted upon, that there is no such obligation as that acted upon by Kekewich, J., to the extent I have named, and asserted as existing by Lord Esher. That point has been argued before us by counsel for the respondents, and they also rely strongly on the other point upon which Kekewich, J., decided—that the plaintiff is not in a position to claim damages.

Now, to take the first point first, it seems to me quite clear, and for the reason given by Lord Esher, that there does arise out of the relation constituted between the parties by the transfer, an obligation, or a duty (whether arising out of the contract or out of the relation between the parties), that the grantor shall do nothing to interfere with the grantee getting the benefit of his grant. That, it seems to me, is the principle asserted—that there is a duty arising out of the relations of the parties. It is not one which is in express terms contracted for between the parties, and it is not to be found in express terms in the transfer itself. The transfer itself contains the grant by which the relation between the parties of grantor and grantee is created, and that carries with it an obligation, as it seems to me, on the part of the grantor not to interfere with the full fruition by the grantee of what the grantor has purported to give him under the grant.

That seems to me enough to establish the obligation. The breach of it is not denied, and now we come to the question of damages: Aye or no is the plaintiff in this case entitled to claim damages? My first answer to that is, Why not? Here is a legal transferee suing a legal transferor for an admitted breach of a proved obligation. Why is he not to have his damage? If we were in a court of common law I do not think there could be much doubt about it. Here you have what appears to me to be primâ facie a clear right in a legal transferee who is entitled to the performance of a particular obligation to have damages paid to him measured by the loss which he in his legal position as owner can be fairly said to have suffered by reason of the breach of that obligation. Now, why is he not entitled to have damages? The suggestion made is that his right in this case case was not a beneficial right in himself; but that contention must go this far to be of any use at all; that he was a mere nominee for the bank who had lent the money on the security of the transfer, and being a mere nominee he has no right of action really in himself at all— he is merely their pret nom, and in order to see whether there are damages it must be assumed that the real parties to the action are those for whom he is a pret nom; and inasmuch as the bank who have lent this money have got the security of a solvent person—namely, Hooper, they cannot complain that they have suffered anything by the interference by the defendant with the obtaining the full benefit of the shares embraced in the transfer—that is to say, since Hooper can and will pay them they cannot sue, and though Hooper must and will pay them he cannot sue either. It seems to me that is to shut one's eyes to the common sense of the matter in endeavouring to appreciate a very subtle equitable distinction.

I think we are entitled here to look broadly at the facts; it is not the case of Hooper putting in suit his right against the rights of the lending company; on the contrary he and the lending company are acting together in this matter for the common purpose of realizing to the best advantage, having regard to their relations, the value of the security. Undoubtedly as between the lenders, the company, and Hooper, the value of that security would come in in reduction of the obligation of Hooper to the company; and the person primarily interested (since he was the person who would have to pay under any hypothesis) in introducing the value of that security into the discussion was Hooper. If the value of those shares could be realized it would enure ultimately for the benefit of Hooper, because it would reduce his obligation to the company if the company took it at the time. If, on the other hand, he paid off the company, then he would apply the security in mitigation, so far as it would go, of his own damages. So that in measuring this case by the ordinary standards which would be applied in measuring this matter at common law we are entitled to look at it, or, if it were a jury who were assessing it, to tell them that they must look at it reasonably, and say what, as reasonable men, they would expect to be the damages that would be suffered by a person in Hooper's position in those circumstances. A jury are not bound to ascertain—they cannot ascertain absolutely, and with mathematical nicety, the precise damage that a person must suffer. They have to look at the reasonable probabilities of the case, and they have got to compensate a person so far as they can for the loss which in their view, having regard to all the circumstances of the transaction, he has suffered as a natural consequence of the breach for which the defendant is responsible. In this case the act of the defendant has prevented the benefit accruing to the persons entitled from the right to deal with those shares at the time when he entered into his obligation. If that right had existed, Hooper was the person in law, as between him and the defendant, who was entitled to the benefit of it. That might be enough as against Whatton in this action to say: You are the transferor in this matter, and you cannot as against your transferee set up these nice considerations, or go behind the real transaction. But if we do go behind the transaction we must not take leave of our common sense; and we find that, taking all these equities into consideration, the net result of the matter is that the lending company are only not sufferers, because they get paid by Hooper, and if they get paid by Hooper why should not Hooper get the benefit which he was entitled to from the transferor; therefore it seems to me that the person who really suffers in this matter by the action of Whatton—namely, Hooper, is the person who is entitled to receive the damages from him.

Therefore it seems to me that on the ground on which the learned judge decided this case, although I agree with him as a whole, I am unable to take the view he has taken here, and I think that really his mistake was in treating Hooper as a person who was merely, as Mr. Cozens-Hardy in his short and perfectly logical argument suggested, a person with no beneficial interest. But the real point in this case is, when we see the facts of this case, that Hooper was not a mere nominee; he was really, when you sift it, and get at the actual facts, the person beneficially interested in the realization of the value of that security. If he had been, as Mr. Cozens-Hardy very ingeniously argued, he ought to be treated as X, as a person with no beneficial interest—an abstraction, merely lending his name for the purposes of the writ, then I should accept Mr. Cozens-Hardy's position; but Romer, L.J., has declined to take the first step, and I do not feel any more inclined to take it than he did—I decline to measure it by the abstraction "X"; I prefer to treat Hooper as a person beneficially interested in the security. Now what is the result of that? There is a right to damages measured by the loss to Hooper, and the loss to Hooper was what, as a reasonable person, he might have got by realizing that security at the time of the breach.

That does not seem to me to involve that he must be taken as bound to go on the market, and force the whole of those shares on the market at one and the same time. I think if the matter were before a jury they would be asked to treat it as reasonable men, and consider what a person anxious to realize the security to the best advantage, acting reasonably—not taking an undue time about it, but dealing with it prudently—what in their view would be the value of shares so realized—realized to the best advantage, having regard to the nature of the shares, the state of the market, and the possible depreciation of the shares by waiting an undue time. Of course a man would have to act reasonably, and they would have to make the best estimate they could of how much he would have got by realizing the shares acting as a reasonable man; and to that extent, and to that extent only, the loss is measured by the difference between the ultimate value at the time when he got the dominion of the shares, and their value had he had the opportunity of so realizing them as I have suggested. That will be the standard, and that will have to be ascertained by the master. I do not think there will be any very great difficulty about it, because there was evidence before the learned judge of the state of the market during the material period in question. It is not a case of a given sale on a particular day. The master will have to consider all the circumstances—the amount that had to be disposed of, and the prices, so far as he can learn them, ruling during that time.

Therefore it seems to me the appeal must be allowed to the extent I have named, and there must be the inquiry I have suggested.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge in the court below has found—and there is no appeal from that part of the judgment—that the transferor of the shares, the defendant Whatton, must be held to have authorized what was in fact done in this case with regard to the shares—namely, the filling in the blank transfer executed by Whatton with the name of Mr. Hooper as transferee and the charges in Hooper's favour and a subsequent mortgage by Hooper of the shares to the Mines Corporation. That being so as between Whatton and Hooper, Whatton is in the position of a transferor to Hooper, and it is to be noticed that Hooper has a direct interest in the shares not only in respect of the Mines Corporation, but in his own right as equitable mortgagee before the mortgage to the Mines Corporation, and because of his position as mortgagor to the Mines Corporation. And with reference to the argument of the respondents in this case before us, when for the purposes of the Mines Corporation, or the Mines Corporation and Mr. Hooper, Mr. Hooper's name was put as transferee of these shares, it appears to me impossible to say that Mr. Hooper is to be considered as having no other interest whatever in the shares except as a mere nominee for the Mines Corporation. I think on the facts he must be taken to have been put in as nominee, because he also occupied the position of mortgagor, and had otherwise an interest in these shares. That being so, it appears to me that the defendant Whatton cannot say as against Hooper that the latter, as transferee, has no interest in these shares except as representing the Mines Corporation.

It is not necessary for me to decide the point, but I should like to point out that I am not sure that any difference would arise in this case if Hooper's name had not been put in as transferee and a third name had been put in. I am not at all sure that even in that case it could not be said on behalf of Hooper and of the Mines Corporation that the name of that third person had been used for the purpose of both; but I need not consider that in this case. It is sufficient to say here that in my mind it is established that Whatton is the transferor of these shares to Hooper, and that Hooper stands in the position of a transferee for valuable consideration.

In these circumstances I have, speaking for myself, no doubt that there is an implied duty and obligation as between Whatton and Hooper that Whatton will do nothing to prevent Hooper being put on the register of shares so as to acquire the full benefit to be derived from the transfer.

What happened was this. An application was made to the company to put on Hooper's name as transferee. That was an application made at the time; there was no dispute of any kind as between the Mines Corporation and Hooper—in fact there never has been any dispute between these two. In this matter they appear always to have acted amicably, their interests being practically identical.

An application being so sent in, registration, but for the conduct of the defendant Whatton, which I am about to refer to, would have followed in due course, and that registration, as I need scarcely point out, would have inured for the benefit of Hooper, and of his mortgagees, the Mines Corporation. What happened then was this: in breach of his duty, or obligation, Whatton gives notice to the company, the shares of which were the subject of the transfer, not to recognize the transfer—representing, in fact, that the transfer was not valid as against him.

To my mind that was a clear breach of the duty, or obligation, he owed to Hooper. The result of that breach of his duty was that the shares were not registered. Who suffered from that? Hooper certainly suffered from it; he, the transferee, whose name ought to have been put on the register, by the breach of duty to him on Whatton's part failed to get on the register; he, as representing himself and his mortgagees, lost the benefit at that time of the transfer through the defendant Whatton's breach of duty or obligation. It was by reason of that breach of duty that Hooper as representing both himself and Whatton failed to get the full benefit of the transfer, or indeed any benefit from the transfer till the judgment in this action, when their right to have the transfer perfected by registration was decided against Whatton.

To my mind there has clearly been damage caused by the delay which has arisen by reason of the defendant Whatton's breach of duty to Hooper; for it is admitted that between the date when this transfer ought to have been registered and when Hooper, as representing himself and his mortgagees, could have obtained, and would have obtained if the registration had been proceeded with, the full benefit of these shares, and the time when ultimately he was enabled to get a decision in his favour as against Whatton there was a falling off in the value of the shares.

To my mind the measure of damages caused by the breach of duty and the delay is the difference between those two values. I really could not add to what the Master of the Rolls has said as to how that damage ought to be estimated. In estimating the value of those shares at the time when registration ought to have been effected the master who has to estimate the value must try to ascertain the value in a reasonable way. Of course, amongst other considerations, he would bear in mind that so large a number of shares was involved in this transfer that they could not have been sold on the market probably in one block, but they would have to be dealt with by degrees. That and all other material considerations bearing upon the question, of course, without special direction, I should hope, from us, will be taken into consideration by the master. With regard to the proceedings by Hooper, Hooper, to my mind, when he started this action must be held to have made his claim for damages for delay on behalf of those who claimed through him—that is to say, if any damages have been suffered by his mortgagees he would have been held, I should have thought, to sue as representing them as well as representing himself, but in the events that have happened, seeing that pending the trial he has paid those mortgages off, it follows that the full amount of damage which will be found as the result of inquiry before the master will have to be paid to him entirely, so that he alone will be entitled to receive the amount of damage.

The result is there will have to be the inquiry directed before the master; the costs of that inquiry will be reserved in the usual way with liberty to apply as to those costs in the usual way when the amount of damage is ascertained. I apprehend that the appellant will get his costs of this appeal; and I should think that such a modification ought to be made in the costs of the court below us, at any rate to give the plaintiff his right to so much of the costs of the action in the court below as he would have been awarded if the learned judge had held that he was entitled to his claim for damage.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion and I have nothing to add.

Solicitors, G. L. Matthews & Co.; Thorp & Saunders.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Kekewich, J. } Jan. 31.

HOLLIWELL v. SEACOMBE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Sale by order of the court—Conditions of sale—Power to rescind—Particulars—Misrepresentation—Costs of bidding at sale and investigating title—Rescission.

A sale was made by order of the court of certain land which was described as valuable freehold land . . . immediately ripe for development as a building estate . . . which can be utilised for the erection of numerous small class residences. It was sold subject to a condition that "if any purchaser shall take any objection or make any requisition which the vendors are advised not to remove or comply with . . . the vendors . . . shall be at liberty . . . to rescind the contract for sale upon such terms as the judge shall approve, and the purchaser . . . shall thereupon be entitled to receive back his deposit, and shall receive the same in discharge of all claims for costs or otherwise." The abstract when delivered disclosed a deed under which the vendors' predecessor in title had covenanted to erect almshouses, and also had covenanted that the land and the buildings to be erected thereon should not be used for any purpose whatsoever other than as almshouses.

Held, that the purchaser was entitled to be discharged from his contract and to a return of his deposit by reason of misrepresentation, and that he was entitled to be paid his costs, charges, and expenses, including the costs occasioned by his bidding at the sale, notwithstanding the provisions of the condition.

Powell v. Powell, 23 W. R. 482, 19 Eq. 422, and Perkins v. Ede, 16 Beav. 268, followed.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by a purchaser of a certain property which had been sold by order of the court to be discharged from his purchase on the ground of misrepresentation and to be paid all his costs incurred in connection therewith.

The sale took place by public auction on the 7th of July, 1905, when the property in question, which was Lot 6, was described in the particulars of sale as "all that enclosure of valuable freehold land situate at Culverdon Down, Tunbridge Wells, and known as Down-lane Football Ground, containing in all about 2 acres 1 rood, and immediately ripe for development as a building estate. It contains a frontage of 100 feet to the road known as Culverdon Down-road, and offers an exceptional opportunity of acquiring freehold building land in a very pretty and popular part of the Down, and affording a large area which can be utilized for the erection of numerous small class residences, for which there is an ever-increasing demand in this particular locality."

One of the conditions of sale, which had been settled by conveyancing counsel to the court, was as follows:

Condition 7. ". . . If any purchaser shall take any objection or make any requisition which the vendors are advised not to remove or comply with, or if any question should arise as to the conveyance, the vendors, with the sanction of the judge, shall be at liberty by notice in writing to be delivered to such purchaser or his solicitor and notwithstanding any intermediate negotiation to rescind his contract for sale upon such terms as the judge shall approve, and the purchaser whose contract is so rescinded shall thereupon be entitled to receive back his deposit and shall accept the same in discharge of all claims for costs or otherwise and shall forthwith return all abstracts and papers in his possession belonging to the vendors."

The lot was purchased by the applicant for £2,250, and the vendors, who were entitled to the estate of one E. M. Hunter, who had died intestate, delivered an abstract of their title in due course, which disclosed a conveyance of the 28th of July, 1887, by which Hunter bought the property from certain vendors who were therein called "the Hopwood Trustees" and thereby covenanted that his executors, administrators, and assigns would forthwith erect almshouses on the said piece of land with suitable gardens and appurtenances thereto, and would not at any time use the said land or the buildings to be erected thereon as aforesaid or permit or suffer the same to be used for any purpose whatever other than as almshouses for the poor with the gardens or yards thereto and any necessary roads or paths.

The purchaser in his requisitions referred to this restrictive covenant, of which he had no previous notice, and claimed that as the restrictions therein contained, which would prevent the property from being developed as a building estate, were not mentioned in the particulars, he was entitled to rescind the contract and to have his deposit returned and to be paid all his costs.

The vendors contended that the restrictions did not affect the purchaser, as they were personal to Hunter and did not run with the land, and that in any event they could not be enforced as they were too vague.

The purchaser, however, ascertained that the covenant would be enforced by the Hopwood Trustees, and that the vendors knew of this before the sale. He therefore issued this summons on the 20th of October, 1905, to be discharged from his purchase and to be paid all his costs, charges, and expenses.

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The vendors thereupon applied for leave to give notice to rescind under condition 7, which leave was granted, and the notice to rescind was accordingly served on the purchaser on the 13th of November, 1905.

Upon the purchaser's summons coming before the master, he decided that he had a discretion to deal with it having regard to condition 7, and that the purchaser was entitled to all the costs, charges and expenses consequent upon his bidding for and being allowed to become the purchaser of the lot in question.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Ribton, for the purchaser.—The purchaser is entitled to rescind and to be discharged from his contract on the ground of the misrepresentation that the land was available for building. That was the right course for the purchaser to pursue when the sale was by order of the court. The misrepresentation is such as to avoid the contract altogether, and the vendors cannot take advantage of condition 7. In Flight v. Booth, 1 Bing. N. C. 370, it was held that where the misdescription was in a material and substantial point so far affecting the subject-matter of the contract that but for such misdescription the purchaser might never have entered into the contract at all, the contract was avoided altogether. In re Terry and White's Contract, 34 W. R. 379, 32 Ch. D. 14, is also an authority for the same proposition. In In re Puckett and Smith's Contract, 50 W. R. 532, [1902] 2 Ch. 258, the principle of Flight v. Booth was applied to the case of a latent defect. Isaacs v. Towell [1898], 2 Ch. 285, 46 W. R., Dig. 170, can be distinguished from the present case as it was expressly found in that case that there had been no misrepresentation, and therefore the question was whether the purchaser could give notice to rescind under his contract. In Bain v. Fothergill, 23 W. R. 261, L. R. 7 H. L. 158, the purchaser was held to be only entitled to the costs of investigating the title, but that was simply a case of want of title and not of misrepresentation, and the sale was not a sale by the court. The order asked for in the present case was based on the order made by Bacon, V.C., in Powell v. Powell, 23 W. R. 482, 19 Eq. 422, which is cited in Seton on Decrees (6th ed.), vol. 1, p. 356, as being the proper form. The reason for the order was to place a purchaser who was entitled to be discharged in the same position as he would have been if he had not bid at the sale or had not entered into the contract. [KEKEWICH, J.—In Perkins v. Ede, 16 Beav. 268, where the title was defective Romilly, M.R., put it quite shortly, he simply said "Take the usual order."] Lord Herschell in Derry v. Peck, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337, pointed out the distinction between an action for deceit and an action to obtain rescission of a contract on the ground of misrepresentation. In Else v. Else, 20 W. R. 286, 13 Eq. 196, Romilly, M.R., held that the court would not allow a vendor to take advantage of his own conditions so as to defeat a purchaser who had been deceived thereby. The court will put the purchaser back into the same position as he would have been in if he had never seen the conditions of sale sent out under the sanction of the court, and will give him the costs of sending an agent to bid and the expenses of investigating the title.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Schwann, for the vendors.—The vendors were given leave to serve notice of rescission under the contract, because it was found that the title was not such as could be forced on a purchaser. There was no misrepresentation in fact; whether the representation that the land was ripe for development as a building estate was true or not depended on whether the covenant in the deed of the 28th of July, 1887, was enforceable or not. In the first place that covenant was only binding on Hunter personally, it did not run with the land; secondly, the covenant was void as being a charitable trust within 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, the Act for the Restraint of the Disposition of Lands; and, thirdly, the covenant was forthwith to erect almshouses, and as nothing had been done under it, therefore the Statute of Limitations applied: Governors of Magdalen Hospital v. Knotts, 27 W. R. 602, 4 App. Cas. 324. It was said that condition 7 did not apply because there was misrepresentation; but, assuming there was no misrepresentation, condition 7 did apply, and the question was, what did it mean? "Upon such terms as the judge shall approve" meant such terms as the judge, having regard to the interests of all parties over whose interests he is watching, inter se, thinks ought to be the proper terms; it was not intended that the purchaser should have any voice in the matter as to the terms upon which the contract should be rescinded. But such terms, when approved by the judge, could not alter the contract. Under the conditions the purchaser was to receive back his deposit in discharge of all claims for costs or otherwise. It was admitted that the purchaser is entitled to his costs up to the time when he received the notice to rescind, but not after. This was in accordance with the decision in Isaacs v. Towell. In In re Spindler and Mear's Contract, 49 W. R. 410, [1901] 1 Ch. 908, it was held that a condition entitling the vendor to rescind the contract, if he was unwilling to comply with purchaser's requisition and to retain the deposit, but without interest or costs, did not prevent the court from ordering the vendors to pay the costs of litigation pending at the date of rescission. In this respect, following Duddell v. Simpson, 15 W. R. 115, L. R. 2 Ch. 102, and In re Deighton and Harris' Contract, 46 W. R. 341, [1898] 1 Ch. 458, the purchaser's costs ought to be confined to the costs of investigating title, as in Bain v. Fothergill. Any other damage is too remote. In seeking to recover the costs of bidding the purchaser is trying to extend the doctrine much further than it has been extended before. In Powell v. Powell there was no title at all, and the vendor never took any steps to remove the objections, and that was why Bacon, V.C., held that the condition did not apply. In Else v. Else also there was no title.

Lawrence, K.C., in reply.—The covenant was an ordinary restrictive covenant, and a purchaser with notice could be restrained from using the land for a different purpose. It was not merely personal to Hunter. If this was a devotion to charity the whole deed was made void, not merely this particular covenant. The covenant runs with the land, as it clearly "affects or relates to" the same, within the meaning of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

KEKEWICH, J.—The application before me is one by a purchaser under a sale by the court to be discharged from his purchase, and to be paid the costs not only of this application, but also the costs, charges, and expenses occasioned by his bidding for and being allowed to be the purchaser of the property in question, as well as the costs of investigation of title.

It is admitted that he is entitled to be discharged unless that right has already been anticipated by rescission, and it is also admitted that if he is entitled to be discharged he is entitled to his costs of investigating the title and those occasioned by this application. But the question arises as to those special costs occasioned by his bidding at the auction. It is suggested that he is precluded from that by Bain v. Fothergill, but it seems to me that that case, although it lays down a rule of almost universal application, has nothing to do with sales by the court. The practice of the court seems to be perfectly well settled, though it is not laid down in any text-books. The matter was discussed in Powell v. Powell, before Bacon, V.C. There the purchaser was held to be entitled to be discharged, and the Vice-Chancellor said in his judgment, at p. 425: "This brings it to the ordinary case of a purchaser also who, finding that he is entitled by law, on account of the invalidity of proceedings in chambers, to be discharged from his contract, is entitled on coming here to be reinstated in exactly the same position that he stood in when he attended the sale, and to be indemnified against all the expenses he has been put to." That is a rule laid down with reference only to sales by the court and the discharge of purchasers under such sales. Without citing authorities it is always recognized by the court that it is the bounden duty of the court to uphold a very high standard of conduct more strictly in the case of a sale by the court than in cases between strangers. The minute of the order made in Powell v. Powell is given in the report of that case, and it is set out in the last edition of Seton, vol. 1, p. 356, where the principle is worked out so as to be applicable to a sale by private contract under the direction of the court. Nothing else is referred to there except Powell v. Powell, but during the argument we came upon another case, Perkins v. Ede, 16 Beav. 268, where Romilly, M.R., contented himself by saying "Take the usual order," but the reporter set out the order, giving the reference to the registrar's book in a footnote as follows: "Abstract of order. Discharge the purchaser and tax his costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred, occasioned by his bidding for and becoming the purchaser of Lot 3, and also his costs of the reference as to title, and of all proceedings consequent thereon, including his costs of and occasioned by the plaintiff's exceptions to the master's report and the order thereon, and of this application and consequent thereon, and direct payment out of the fund in court." That was in 1852, and Bacon, V.C., made the same order in 1875 in Powell v. Powell. I must therefore take it that that is the usual order following the settled practice of the court, and that the purchaser here is entitled to it now. Is there anything under the contract which precludes him from obtaining an order of this kind? He purchased under a condition [which his lordship read]. There was a very similar clause in Powell v. Powell, but it did not there prevail to prevent the purchaser from obtaining the costs which he sought, but in that case there was no notice to rescind, and it is said that the purchaser can ask for no more than what the clause entitles him to and a small sum for costs up to when the notice was given. I am therefore brought back to this: Does the seventh condition apply to such a case as this? The purchaser says No, because there was such a misrepresentation as entitled him to be discharged from the whole contract. It does not matter much for this purpose whether the purchaser issued his summons first or whether the vendor gave his notice to rescind first. It seems to me that if the purchaser is entitled to be discharged on the ground of misrepresentation, that right would not be affected by a notice to rescind under condition 7. But if, on the other hand, he is not entitled to be discharged on the ground of misrepresentation, then the notice to rescind would, although later than the summons, prevent him from getting more. As a matter of fact the notice to rescind was given some time later. Therefore the question is whether the purchaser is entitled to be discharged on the ground of misrepresentation, and if so whether he is entitled to costs as in Powell v. Powell.

His point is this, the lot in question was advertised as "valuable freehold land, immediately ripe for development as a building estate." There was also a representation that it could "be utilized for the erection of numerous small class houses, for which there is an increasing demand." Whatever else that means, it means that the property is offered as available as building land upon which the purchaser can build houses. That seems perfectly clear. Now, can that be done? In the abstract there was disclosed a certain deed of the 27th of July, 1887, under which Hunter purchased the property from Hudson, which contained certain covenants by Hunter. In the first place there was a covenant that he, his executors, administrators and assigns, would forthwith erect almshouses. That I pass by, because it is clearly only binding upon Hunter and is not enforceable against the purchaser; then the covenant goes on in a negative fashion that he would not allow the land or the buildings to be erected thereon to be used for any purposes whatsoever other than as almshouses. In other words he cannot and will not put up any residences other than almshouses. So far it is a clear contradiction of the statement that this is building land on which the residences mentioned in the description can be erected. Then it is said that this is only a personal covenant; in one sense it is only a personal covenant, but according to well-known principles there is no doubt that it can be so enforced against any assignee of the land, with notice of such a covenant, as that an injunction would be granted to restrain a breach of it. That is clear upon the authorities. To the knowledge of the vendors the land cannot be used for building purposes, contrary to their representation.

Then it is said that there is an objection to this covenant inasmuch as almshouses are a charity, and that therefore the restriction is invalid, but I cannot myself see how a covenant not to build other than almshouses can be treated as offending the rule against perpetuities. It seems to me that the misrepresentation is made worse than ever if the restriction proves to be one that makes the contract useless for every purpose so far as building is concerned.

The vendors have represented that they have a good title, and that the land could be used for a particular purpose—viz., for building, when it could not be, therefore there is a misrepresentation. In such a case does the notice to rescind apply? I think it is out of the question. Lindley, L.J., in In re Terry and White's Contract, 34 W. R., at p. 382, said: "However clear a contract may be in its language, it may be rescinded for fraud or material misrepresentation; and cases are reported in which contracts for the sale of land have been rescinded on this ground, although one of the conditions was that no error or misstatement should annul the sales, but should be the subject of compensation. In such cases the fraud or misrepresentation, if sufficiently serious, vitiates the whole contract, including the condition." That is quite consistent with other authorities, and a purchaser is not bound to come and say, "I will rescind the contract and will take what the condition gives me"; he may say "I will have what the law gives me apart from the condition." That really disposes of the case.

But condition 7 further provides that "the vendors . . . shall be at liberty . . . to rescind the contract for sale upon such terms as the judge shall approve," and then goes on to provide that "the purchaser whose contract is so rescinded shall thereupon be entitled to receive back his deposit, and shall accept the same in discharge of all claims for costs or otherwise, and shall forthwith return all papers in his possession belonging to the vendors." These words seem to me to state clearly and exhaustively what the bargain between the parties is, what the purchaser's position is, what he is entitled to receive, and what he can do; and it seems to leave no room for any discussion as to the terms upon which there is to be rescission by the vendors. I think that the terms have nothing to do with the purchaser, if rescission is not fairly within the contract. The purchaser has nothing to do with approving the terms. I am not sure that the terms are really wanted. What is meant is that sales under the direction of the court often occur in actions between or affecting many parties, such as debenture-holders, and it may well be right that the court should consider on behalf of all parties the terms, if any, on which a contract should be rescinded. I doubt if the words are necessary; the judge must exercise his discretion in each case. I doubt if these words are of any avail; but, if they are, the purchaser has nothing to do with them, and I think the master was right in saying that he could not hear the purchaser. There will, accordingly, be an order as asked: That the purchaser be discharged, and be paid the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by his bidding for and being allowed to be the purchaser of the property as well as the other costs of investigating title and of this application. These costs will come out of the funds in court, without prejudice to the question out of what particular fund they are to be borne.

Solicitors, E. Elvy Robb; Hare & Co., for Andrew & Cheale, Tunbridge Wells.

Chan. Div. }
Kekewich, J. } Jan. 18, 25.

In re UNITE, DECEASED.
EDWARDS v. SMITH. (a.)

Will—Construction—Charity—Gift to be applied under direction of executors—Cy-près.

A testatrix directed her executors to apply a sum to their satisfaction and under their direction towards the enlargement and equipment of a hospital. The enlargements were carried out in the lifetime of the testatrix.

Held, that there was not an immediate gift to the hospital, but that the executors ought to expend so much of the said sum as they thought proper in equipment, and in the event of a balance remaining in their hands, should apply to the court for directions.

Summons.

This was an originating summons taken out by the executors of the will of Anne Maria Unite to determine a question of construction.

By her will, dated the 24th of April, 1902, the testatrix made the following bequest: "I give the sum of £20,000 towards the rebuilding and equipment, to the satisfaction and under the direction of my executors, of the Birmingham and Midland Hospital for Women, the enlargement of which has been recommended, and which charity I have long desired to benfit."

The testatrix died on the 22nd of April, 1905, and her will was duly proved by the executors.

There was no gift of residue in the will.

The enlargements which had been recommended, and which amounted practically to a rebuilding, had virtually been completed in the testatrix's lifetime, but the hospital had neither been furnished or equipped.

Lawrence, K.C., and Beaumont, for the next-of-kin.—So far as the sum of £20,000 was to be applied in the enlargement of the hospital this gift fails, and to that extent there is an intestacy. The rebuilding was completed in the testatrix's lifetime and without the approval or direction of the executors. The executors now cannot apply the assets in payment for work done before the testatrix's death.

Ingpen, K.C., and Sargant, for the hospital.—This is an immediate gift to the hospital of £20,000 and should be paid by the executors: Cowper v. Mantell, 4 W. R. 500, 22 Beav. 231; In re Villiers, Wilkes Bower v. Goodman, 72 L. T. 323, 43 W. R. Dig. 32. Further, it is a charitable bequest, and in case of failure of a part the remainder should be applied cy-près. The enlargement of the hospital was merely the motive of the gift: In re Sanderson's Trust, 5 W. R. 864, 3 K. & Jo. 497; Chamberlayne v. Brockett, 20 W. R. 739, 8 Ch. App. 206; Parnell v. Lyon, 1 V. & B. 479.

Mulligan, K.C., and Hewitt appeared for the executors.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEKEWICH, J., in delivering a considered judgment, after reading the portion of the will in question, said: There being considerable difficulty in determining what expenditure, if any, can be sanctioned, it was argued on behalf of the hospital that the words of this bequest really constitute a gift to the charity, so that what cannot be properly expended on rebuilding and equipment belongs to the charity, and may be handed over to it. If that were done the charity would of course not be accountable for the money received, which might be expended on any of the objects of the charity without special regard to rebuilding or equipment. I cannot so construe the gift. There are no doubt authorities, many of which were examined by Wood, V.C., in In re Sanderson's Trust, in which it has been held that a specific object may be treated as merely the motive of the gift, and that the gift may be fulfilled notwithstanding that the motive object fails. No one of these authorities deals with a case like the present, which, to my mind, is clearly outside them. Then it was argued that, so far as the specified object fails, the gift might be treated as charitable and applied cy-pres. As regards this, suffice it to say that the point cannot be decided in the absence of the Attorney-General, and if in the event, there is money remaining after the application of what can be properly applied in rebuilding and equipment an adjournment must be made in order to bring the Attorney-General before the court. Unfortunately the facts do not render much assistance in construing the will. The testatrix herself tells us that she has long desired to benefit the hospital, and that the enlargement of it had been recommended, and that is about all we know. No definite steps were taken until after her death, and it seems that it was not settled until after that event what should be done. It is said that the executors have been kept aware of the progress of enlargement, and that they have seen what has been done in the way of building and equipment, but they disclaim having hitherto exercised any discretion under the will. It will, I think, be necessary for them to consider carefully how far they have been made acquainted with what was being done, and how far, if at all, they have assented to it, and in order to enable them to perform this duty, and also to determine how far they may exercise their discretion in the future, I propose to state for their guidance my critical interpretation of the will. If the words "to the satisfaction of my executors" stood alone I think it would be competent for them even now or at any future time to say that what had been done in the matter of rebuilding and equipment, though without their having been consulted or having been acquainted with it, might be paid for to the extent of £20,000, less duty, out of the assets. I do not think that "satisfaction" alone means more than that the executors must honestly consider whether what has been done meets with their approval or not. But the testatrix provides that the rebuilding and equipment towards which the £20,000 is to be devoted must be done "under the direction of the executors," and it is not easy to say what this means. It certainly does not mean that the executors must act as a clerk of the works or a superintending architect. I do not think that it postulates the submission of plans to the executors and their approval of such plans. It does, however, I think, postulate general guidance or control. They cannot be said to have directed acts of the intention to execute which or of the execution of which they were wholly ignorant. In other words, they cannot properly be said to have given directions for works after those works were completed. On the other hand, I think that if they were made aware that certain works of which they had a general knowledge were proposed to be executed, and they gave their assent to the execution thereof as being proper for the rebuilding and equipment of the hospital on being satisfied of their proper execution, they might contribute to the expenditure to the extent of the fixed sum. And in exercising their discretion they would be justified in giving a liberal construction to the word "rebuilding," especially as the testatrix indicates by her own language that enlargement comes within it. "Equipment" scarcely needs definition, but it may be useful to add that, in my opinion, it covers anything and everything required to convert an empty building or part of an empty building into a hospital or part of a hospital with all modern appliances. Further, I cannot see that any limit of time is fixed. I do not think that the executors would be justified in spending all that could reasonably be spent up to a particular date, and then saying that, although apparently nothing remained to be done, yet some further work not yet contemplated might be required at a future time. But until the hospital has been fully rebuilt and fully equipped, an event the date of which it would be extremely hard to fix, I think that the discretion remains exercisable. When the executors have carefully considered all this, it may be that they will find the full amount at their disposal reasonably required for purposes to which they may properly apply it, and, on the other hand, it may be that they will find themselves possessed of a substantial balance. On their report of the result I shall be prepared to give them directions, and, if necessary, to provide for service on the Attorney-General, but in the meantime the summons stands adjourned. It will be convenient to have the report in writing either in an affidavit or (perhaps better) in a statement exhibited to an affidavit.

(a.) Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the executors, Stow, Preston, & Lyttelton, for A. Pointon, Birmingham.

Solicitors for the next-of-kin, H. Tyrrell & Son, for J. B. Clarke, Birmingham.

Solicitors for the hospital, Beale & Son.

Chan. Div. Swinfen Eady, J. } Nov. 30; Dec. 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 21.

BOSCHOEK PROPRIETARY CO. (LIMITED) v. FUKE. (a.)

Company— Directors—Qualification—Shares held "as liquidator of H. Co."—Income tax on directors' fees—Meeting convened by acting directors—Valid resolutions—Ratification of ultrà vires acts—Notice of business.

Where the qualification of a director was the holding of shares "in his own right," shares held as "liquidator of the H. Co.,"

Held, not to be a good qualification.

Sutton v. English and Colonial Produce Co, 50 W. R. 571, [1902] 2 Ch. 502.

Unless allowed by the articles, directors may not be paid income tax on their fees.

A general meeting was convened by three de facto directors irregularly appointed.

Held, that the resolutions passed thereat were valid.

Browne v. La Trinidad, 36 W. R. 289, 37 Ch. D. 1; Southern Counties Deposit Bank v. Rider, 73 L. T. 374, 44 W. R. Dig. 32; and British Asbestos Co. v. Boyd, 51 W. R. 667, [1903] 2 Ch. 439.

Articles fixing the qualification and remuneration of directors must be altered by the company before ratifying acts done in contravention of them.

Imperial Hydropathic Hotel Co., Blackpool v. Hampson, 31 W. R. 330, 23 Ch. D. 1.

The notice convening a general meeting stated that directors were to be appointed. The report sent with the notice stated that the meeting would be asked to ratify the election of R. as a director.

Held, that this was sufficient notice of this particular business.

Irvine v. Union Bank of Australia, 25 W. R. 682, 2 A. C. 366.

Action.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff company against the defendants F. G. Fuke and C. O. Rigby, two of the late directors of the company, to recover certain payments alleged to have been improperly made.

The plaintiff company was incorporated in 1895 with a capital of £360,000 in £1 shares to acquire certain South African mines. 300,000 shares were issued as fully paid to the vendors, the Heidelburg Estates and Exploration Co. (Limited). The remaining 60,000, except seven, were unissued, but in 1899 the company borrowed £17,500 from the Heidelburg Co. on debentures.

In 1896 the defendant Fuke was appointed secretary at £100 a year, and continued secretary until the 25th of March, 1903. In 1898 the directors resolved that the £500 remuneration, which was the maximum that by article 77 the directors were entitled to receive, should be allotted £200, to the chairman and £100 to the three other directors, article 64 providing that there should never be less than four directors.

On the 27th of February, 1900, the Heidelburg Co. went into voluntary liquidation, and Fuke was appointed liquidator of that company, which then held 275,000 shares and £17,500 debentures of the plaintiff company; the liquidator subsequently recovering 500 more shares on a claim against certain of the shareholders. These shares were transferred to, and on the 6th of September, 1901, were registered in the name of "F. G. Fuke, liquidator of the Heidelburg, &c., Co. (Limited)."

In 1901 only two directors were left, and on the 4th of December, 1901, these directors purported to hold a board meeting and to pass the following resolution: "That Mr. F. G. Fuke be, and is hereby appointed, managing director of the company at a remuneration of £700 per annum for a period of two years, and to be at liberty to retain his position as secretary of the company at a salary of £100 per annum, provided that the said F. G. Fuke draws only at the rate of £200 per annum as managing director until the working capital of the company of £60,000 or part thereof has been subscribed."

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No part of the £60,000 was in fact subscribed, but Fuke subsequently obtained the entire £700 per annum. The resolution itself was called in question by the company because there were not then, as required by article 64, four directors; there was no power in the articles to appoint a managing director; Fuke had no share qualification "in his own right" (article 66 providing that a director must hold 250 shares "in his own right"); and there was no power to grant remuneration to the directors in excess of a maximum of £500 (article 77).

On the 19th of August, 1902, one of the remaining directors died, and on the 28th of January, 1903, the other remaining director transferred his shares and ceased to be a director.

On the 2nd of February, 1903, Fuke purported, as sole director, to hold a board meeting, and passed transfers of 250 qualifying shares to himself and to two others, a Mr. Hughes and the defendant Rigby, but Fuke was not subsequently appointed a director.

On the 3rd of February, 1903, Fuke purported to hold another board meeting, and appointed Hughes and Rigby directors.

On the 5th of February, 1903, these three directors held a board meeting and a minute was made: "It being stated that it is usual for the tax on managing directors' fees to be paid by the companies, it was resolved that the sum of £8 4s. 3d., income tax on the managing director's fees, be paid out of the funds of the company." At a subsequent board four days later cheques were drawn for income tax on the fees of the three directors.

Question arising as to the validity of some of the acts of the directors counsel's opinion was taken and a general meeting was convened for the 25th of May, 1903, to pass certain resolutions:

1. To reduce the minimum number of directors to two.

2. To give power to appoint a managing director and fix his remuneration.

3. To make past acts done by persons acting as directors binding on the company.

4. To ratify the board's resolution of the 4th of December, 1901, as to appointing Fuke managing director at £700 a year.

At the general meeting these resolutions were passed and the first two duly confirmed by an extraordinary general meeting on the 11th of June, 1903. It was now said by the plaintiff company that there was no board competent to summon the meeting, and that the third and fourth resolutions could only be passed after the articles infringed had been altered by special resolution.

On the 31st of July, 1903, notice of the ordinary general meeting was given for the 10th of August, among other purposes, for the election of directors. The directors' report which accompanied the notice contained a statement: "Directors.—You will be asked to ratify the election of Mr. C. O. Rigby as a director, also to elect a new director"—Hughes having in the meantime resigned. At the meeting held on the 10th of August, 1903, the election of Rigby as a director was confirmed as from the 3rd of February, 1903. On this resolution Rigby now claimed that he had been director from the 3rd of February, 1903, to March, 1905, when he retired, and was entitled to two years' salary at £100 in consequence. He had received, in fact, £190.

In January, 1905, the Heidelburg Co. was reconstructed in order to carry out a scheme for financing the plaintiff company. Fuke represented that the debts of the plaintiff company up to date could be paid off for about £2,000, without, however, disclosing that the money was chiefly wanted, not to cover liabilities of the company which he had met personally, but in payment of the undrawn balance of his own past remuneration at £700 a year. The money was raised by the new Heidelburg Co. and paid to Fuke, who relied on two general meetings on the 28th of January and the 25th of February, 1905, as ratifying these payments, though upon the evidence it was shown that the object of the payments was never explained to the shareholders. On the 13th of March, 1905, the reconstruction was completed by the appointment of new directors of the plaintiff company and the resignation of Fuke and Rigby.

Eve, K.C., and Felix Cassel, for the plaintiff company.

Micklem, K.C., and F. Russell, for the defendant Fuke.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the defendant Rigby.

Cur. adv. vult.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in a considered judgment, said: The principal defendant is Francis George Fuke, and the main ground of complaint against him is that, being liquidator of a company which held nearly all the share capital of the plaintiff company, he obtained the appointment of himself as managing director of the plaintiff company at an extravagant salary of £700 a year, when there was really no business whatever to manage, and no board duly constituted to appoint him, and when he himself was not even qualified to be a director in accordance with the articles, and that he has obtained payment of this amount although the event upon which £500 a year out of the £700 a year was to become payable has never happened, and that the transaction has never been duly ratified by the company. There are other claims as to a sum drawn for income tax and as to a payment to the defendant Rigby of directors' fees. [His lordship then stated the facts above-mentioned down to the 4th of December, 1901, and the circumstances under which the resolution of that date appointing Fuke managing director at £700 a year was passed, and continued:] This resolution is, in my opinion, invalid. By article 64 the number of directors should not be less than four. By article 77 the directors were to be entitled to receive by way of annual remuneration a maximum sum of £500, with a percentage of profits (if any), such remuneration to be divisible as the board might determine. The articles do not contain any provision enabling the board to appoint any managing director. Under these circumstances it was quite beyond the powers of the two remaining directors to appoint a third person (even if qualified to be a director) to be managing director of the company at a salary of £700 a year. The question, however, has been raised as to whether Fuke was qualified to be appointed a director. By article 75 any occasional vacancy in the office of director may at all times be filled up by the board by the appointment of a qualified member. By article 66 the qualification of a director is the holding in his own right of at least 250 shares, and by article 72 every director shall vacate his office on ceasing to hold his qualifying number of shares. It was contended that article 66 only required a qualification in the case of the first directors appointed by the subscribers to the memorandum, but, having regard to articles 72 and 75, this contention is not, in my opinion, well founded. Then was Fuke "a qualified member"? The 250 shares which are claimed as a qualification were entered in the company's register as follows: "Francis George Fuke, liquidator of the Heidelburg Estates and Exploration Co. (Limited), 167, Winchester-house, Old Broad-street, London." Did Fuke hold these shares "in his own right"? In Bainbridge v. Smith, 37 W. R. 594, 41 Ch. D. 462, 474, Lindley, L.J., pointed out that the phrase "holding shares in his own right" had acquired a conventional meaning, and added, "I think that conventional meaning is this—that a person 'holding shares in his own right' means holding in his own right as distinguished from holding in the right of somebody else. . . . It means that a person shall hold shares in such a way that the company can safely deal with him in respect of his shares, whatever his interest may be in the shares." I therefore ask myself these two questions: (1) Did Fuke hold in his own right, as distinguished from holding in the right of somebody else; and (2) could the plaintiff company have safely dealt with him in respect of these shares, whatever his interest in the shares might be? In my opinion the first question should be answered in the negative. Fuke held the shares in right of the Heidelburg Estates and Exploration Co. (Limited), and not in his own right. Suppose he had been described on the register of the company as "F. G. Fuke, trustee of A. B., a bankrupt," or as "F. G. Fuke, executor of C. D., deceased," in neither case would he have held shares in his own right, but in the former case in right of the bankrupt, and in the latter in right of the testator. So in the present case the description of him on the register as "liquidator of the Heidelburg Estates and Exploration Co. (Limited)" shows that he holds the shares in right of that company, and in his capacity of liquidator of that company. If, on the other hand, he had been registered as "F. G. Fuke, of &c., accountant," he would have held the shares in his own right within the meaning of the decisions, although he might in fact have been trustee of a bankrupt, or executor of a deceased person, or liquidator of a company. In the present case I am not considering whether it is usual or proper for a shareholder to be put upon the register with the description "trustee of A. B., a bankrupt," or "executor of C. D., deceased," or "liquidator of the X Co." I am only considering what is the effect of such a registration. I am also of opinion that the second question, previously mentioned, should be answered in the negative. The plaintiff company could not safely deal with Fuke in respect of the 250 shares, whatever his interest might be in the shares as they had notice that he held them as liquidator of the Heidelburg Co. Suppose the plaintiff company had taken them as security for an overdue debt owing by Fuke personally, could the company have pleaded that they took them in good faith and without notice that they belonged to the Heidelburg Co., of which Fuke was liquidator? Certainly not; the plaintiffs' own register shows that it is as liquidator of the Heidelburg Co. that the shares stand in Fuke's name. In like manner, if the shares had been registered "F. G. Fuke, executor of C. D., deceased," the plaintiff company could not have taken them by way of security from F. G. Fuke for a private debt of his own, and then successfully contended that they had no notice that Fuke was only entitled to the shares as executor of a deceased person. If, on the other hand, the shares had been registered simply "F. G. Fuke, of &c., accountant," then the plaintiff company could have safely dealt with Fuke on the footing that he held the shares in his own right, even though in point of fact he might have held them as executor of a deceased person or liquidator of a company: see also Sutton v. English and Colonial Produce Co., 50 W. R. 57, [1902] 2 Ch. 502. I decide, therefore, that the 250 shares were not a qualification for Fuke within the meaning of the articles. [His lordship then detailed the history of the board from the time of Fuke's appointment on the 4th of December, 1901, down to his appointment of Hughes and Rigby to act as directors of the plaintiff company together with himself.] The first act of the board so constituted is thus recorded in the minutes—"5th of February, 1903. Present: F. G. Fuke, managing director, in the chair, T. Hughes, C. O. Rigby. It being stated that it is usual for the tax on managing directors' fees to be paid by the companies, it was resolved that the sum of £8 4s. 3d., income tax on the managing directors' fees, be paid out of the funds of the company." Another board, similarly attended, was held on the 9th of February, 1903, when the only business was drawing a cheque for income tax on the fees of three directors — Fuke received £8 4s. 3d. This transaction is, in my opinion, quite unjustifiable. Even if the board had been duly constituted, they would have had no right whatever to take out of the company's moneys the sums which each director ought to pay out of his own money for any income tax properly payable by him. The defendants are jointly and severally liable for this misapplication of the moneys of the company, and must repay the amount with interest.

I now proceed to consider the alleged confirmations by the company in general meeting of Fuke's position and salary. Questions were raised as to the validity of the past acts of the directors; the opinion of counsel was taken, certain alterations of the articles were recommended, and on the 14th of May, 1903, at a board meeting, the secretary was instructed to convene a general meeting of the company for the 25th of May, 1903. The plaintiffs have objected to the validity of any resolutions passed at this meeting on two grounds. The first ground is that there was no duly constituted board which could validly convene a general meeting of the company. This meeting was called by the only persons acting as directors, and the persons who for upwards of three months had been acting as the board; the resolution for calling it was passed at a board meeting; notice of it was duly sent to every shareholder, and one of the objects of the meeting was to confirm the acts theretofore done by persons purporting to act as directors. Under these circumstances, I must consider any informality in convening the meeting as a mere irregularity, and not sufficient to invalidate any resolution passed at it. The case is governed by Browne v. La Trinidad, 36 W. R. 289, 37 Ch. D. 1; Southern Counties Deposit Bank v. Rider, 73 L. T. 374; and British Asbestos Co. (Limited) v. Boyd, 51 W. R. 667, [1903] 2 Ch. 439.

The second ground on which the plaintiffs have objected to the validity of the third and fourth resolutions passed at this meeting is that they could only have been properly passed after the articles had been altered by special resolution. The company in general meeting could not appoint, and could not ratify, as from December, 1901, the appointment of Fuke as managing director at £700 per annum, as he had not the necessary qualification, and the maximum remuneration of the whole board was fixed by the articles at £500. The articles, until altered, bound the shareholders in general meeting as much as the board. The present case is unlike that of Irvine v. The Union Bank of Australia, 25 W. R. 682, 2 App. Cas. 366, to which reference was made, as in that case the limitation of the power of borrowing and mortgaging was merely a limitation of the authority of the directors, and not a limitation of the general powers of the company. It was there argued that the acts of the directors in excess of their authority might be ratified by the company and rendered binding, and that contention succeeded. Articles must first be altered by special resolution before the altered articles can be acted upon: Imperial Hydropathic Hotel Co., Blackpool, v. Hampson, 31 W. R. 330, 23 Ch. D. 1. It was urged that there was power under article 77, if in the opinion of the board it was desirable that any of their number should perform any special services, to pay him additional remuneration, but there was no duly constituted board to form any such opinion, and that is a condition precedent (see Caridad Copper Mining Co. v. Swallow, 50 W. R. 565, [1902] 2 K. B. 44); moreover, no special services are referred to either in the board minutes or the minutes of the general meeting, and the company did not purport to exercise this power in any way. It was further urged on behalf of Mr. Rigby that he ought not to be under any liability in this matter as he was acting in good faith under the advice of counsel, and without objection the opinion was put in evidence, but when looked at it is clear that counsel advised that all the resolutions should be passed as special resolutions, and not merely the first and second; and, moreover, the payment really impeached in this action was made long afterwards, during the present year, and after the question as to it has been raised. [His lordship then discussed the circumstances of the reorganization of the new Heidelburg Co. and the alleged ratification by the plaintiff company, under the scheme then on foot, of the payments made by the Heidelburg Co. to Fuke in respect of the undrawn balance of his £700 a year, and decided that there had been no such ratification. The nature of the claim, in which Fuke had such a large personal interest, had never been properly placed before the shareholders of the plaintiff company or of the Heidelburg Co. The payments so made were a misapplication of the funds of the company for which the defendants were jointly and severally liable. His lordship then continued:] The remaining claim is as to Rigby's remuneration. It is alleged that he only served as director one complete year, for which he was only entitled to £100, but nevertheless has been paid £10 and £180 10s. 8d., making together £190 10s. 8d. The argument that Rigby had not served two complete years was based on the contention that his election or appointment by Fuke on the 3rd of February, 1903, had not been duly ratified or confirmed by the company in general meeting on the 10th of August, 1903, because sufficient notice had not been given that the matter would be dealt with at that meeting. The report of the directors is dated the 31st of July, 1903, and was sent out with the notice convening the ordinary general meeting for the 10th of August, 1903. The report contains this paragraph: "Directors,—You will be asked to ratify the election of Mr. C. O. Rigby, as a director; also to elect a new director," and the notice convening the meeting states that the meeting will be held for the purpose of receiving the directors' report, and accounts, to the 30th of June, 1903, and the election of directors and auditors. In my opinion this was sufficient notice to the shareholders of the intention to bring before the meeting the ratification of Mr. Rigby's election: see Irvine v. Union Bank of Australia, where Sir Barnes Peacock, in delivering the judgment of the court, said that their lordships "are not prepared to say that if a report had been circulated before a half-yearly meeting distinctly giving notice that the directors had done an act in excess of their authority, and that the meeting would be asked by confirming the report to ratify the act, this might not be sufficient notice to bring the ratification within the competency of the majority of the shareholders present at the half-yearly meeting." In my opinion this report and notice given amounted to sufficient notice of the business which was intended to be brought forward at the meeting—namely, to ratify the election of Mr. Rigby. The result, therefore, is that this claim fails. The defendants must pay the costs of the action except so far as increased by the claim for alleged excess of remuneration paid to Rigby; the plaintiffs must pay the costs of the action so far as increased by this claim, with the usual set-off.

Solicitors, Mayo, Elder, & Co.; Charles Robert Woolley.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) — Dec. 19.

BROWN (Appellant) v. LEGGETT (Respondent). (a.)

Pharmacy Acts—Poisons—Alleged illegal sale to a person then unknown to seller—Rankin's Ointment—Vermin killer—Resolution that article be deemed poison—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121), ss. 2, 17.

By resolution passed in pursuance of section 2 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain declared that "vermin killers" should be deemed to be poisons under Part II. of the schedule to the Act. The appellant was convicted of selling a vermin killer, which was a compound article containing a percentage of a poison included in Part I. of the schedule, "to a person then unknown to him, and who was not introduced to him by some person known to him," contrary to section 17 of the above Act.

Held, that the conviction was wrong, because the society had power to declare what articles should be deemed to be poisons under Parts I. and II. respectively of the schedule to the Act.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate of the City of Leeds (C. M. Atkinson, Esq.), raising for decision the question whether the sale of a certain poison, named in the first part of Schedule A to the Pharmacy Act, 1868, when compounded with another substance was an offence within section 17 of the same Act.

The following were the material facts stated:

The appellant was charged with unlawfully selling a certain poisonous vegetable alkaloid, being a poison named in the first part of Schedule A to the Pharmacy Act, 1868—to wit, veratrine—to one Margaret McCann, who was then a person unknown to him, the said Margaret McCann not being then introduced to him by some person known to him contrary to the form of the statute. The appellant was a registered chemist and druggist, carrying on business at a shop in Leeds, and was duly qualified. On the 27th of July, 1904, the appellant sold at his shop to Margaret McCann a packet containing 228 grains of a substance known as "Rankin's Ointment," to which was affixed a label distinctly and legibly printed in the words following: "Rankine's ointment for destroying vermin in the head. Trade 15,658 Mark. Tins 6d. and 1s. Poison. Not to be applied where the skin is broken. Price 6d." Rankin's Ointment was a compound composed and sold for the destruction of vermin.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Margaret McCann was a person then unknown to the appellant, and was not then introduced to him by any person known to him. The said packet contained 2 2-5 grains (equivalent to 1 per cent.) of certain poisonous vegetable alkaloids. On analysis these were found to consist to a very large extent (about 90 per cent.) of pure alkaloid veratrine, which is a poisonous vegetable alkaloid. This quantity was sufficient, if the ointment in the packet were taken internally by an adult human being, to cause purging and vomiting and possibly a fatal result.

Section 17 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121) provides as follows: "It shall be unlawful to sell any poison either by wholesale or retail unless the box, bottle, vessel, wrapper, or cover in which such poison is contained be distinctly labelled with the name of the article and the word 'poison,' and with the name and address of the seller of the poison; and it shall be unlawful to sell any poison of those which are in the first part of Schedule A to this Act, or may be hereafter added thereto under section 2 of this Act, to any person unknown to the seller unless introduced by some person known to the seller, and on every sale of any such article the seller shall, before delivery, make, or cause to be made, an entry in a book to be kept for that purpose stating in the form set forth in Schedule F to this Act the date of the sale, the name and address of the purchaser, the name and quantity of the article sold, and the purpose for which it is stated by the purchaser to be required, to which entry the signature of the purchaser and of the person, if any, who introduced him shall be affixed; and any person selling poison otherwise than is herein provided shall, upon a summary conviction before two justices . . . be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5 for the first offence and to a penalty not exceeding £10 for the second or any subsequent offence. . . ."

Part I. of the schedule comprises (inter alia) "all poisonous vegetable alkaloids and their salts."

Section 2 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, provides as follows: "The several articles named or described in the Schedule A shall be deemed to be poisons within the meaning of the Act, and the Council of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain may from time to time, by resolution, declare that any article in such resolution named ought to be deemed a poison within the meaning of this Act; and thereupon the said society shall submit the same for the approval of the Privy Council, and if such approval shall be given, then such resolution and approval shall be advertised in the London Gazette, and on the expiration of one month from such advertisement the article named in such resolution shall be deemed to be a poison within the meaning of the Act."

In pursuance of this section the Pharmaceutical Society, on the 1st of December, 1869, declared by resolution that certain articles named therein ought to be deemed poisons within the meaning of the Act, which resolution was duly approved and advertised. The articles were (inter alia) preparations of prussic acid, strychnine, atropine, corrosive sublimate, morphine, and every compound containing any poison within the meaning of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, when prepared or sold for the destruction of vermin.

The magistrate was of opinion that vermin killers containing, in dangerous quantities, poisons within Part I. of the schedule fell within that part of the schedule, and he accordingly convicted the appellant.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C. (Bonsey and Glyn-Jones with him), for the appellant.—Compounds containing poisonous vegetable alkaloids are not within Part I. of the schedule, and the words "poisonous vegetable alkaloids and their salts" in Part I. do not include compounds merely containing some poisonous vegetable alkaloid. A compound containing such alkaloids has been declared a poison, but it has not been declared a poison within Part I. The magistrate came, therefore, to a wrong conclusion when he accepted the contention of the respondent that a compound containing a poisonous vegetable alkaloid "in dangerous quantities" was to be regarded, for the purpose of section 17 of the Act of 1868, as the alkaloid itself, and therefore as a poison which could only lawfully be sold under the restrictions imposed upon the sale of articles included in Part. I. of the schedule. Moreover, inasmuch as the resolution of 1869 did not place vermin-killer within Part I. of the schedule, it must be taken that "every compound containing any poison within the meaning of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, when prepared or sold for the destruction of vermin" is comprised within Part II. of the schedule. Moreover, certain substances containing poisons within Part I. have been placed by subsequent legislation in Part II. of the original schedule: see note to Part 2 in Chitty's Statutes, where the additions which were made to that part of the schedule in 1869 by the Privy Council are referred to. That was done exactly in terms in the Sale of Poisons (Ireland) Act of 1870 after the resolution of the Pharmacy Society. Admitting this ointment is a poison, and must be so labelled and have the name and address of the seller on it, nevertheless it is not one of those specified in the schedule in Part I., and therefore the conviction for alleged non-compliance with section 17 of the Act of 1868 by the appellant was wrong, and should be quashed.

D. M. Kerly, for the respondent.—The ointment contains a dangerous quantity of "poisonous vegetable alkaloids" which are expressly included in Part I. of the schedule, and as the penal sections of the Pharmacy Act are not confined to the sale of the scheduled poisons in their simple state or of the preparations of such poisons, but extend to the sale of a mixture or compound containing a scheduled poison, the conviction was right: Pharmaceutical Society v. Piper & Co., 41 W. R. 447, [1893] 1 Q. B. 686; Pharmaceutical Society v. Armson, 42 W. R. 662, [1894] 2 Q. B. 720. The defence here is that the appellant sold poison plus something else. But the sale of a scheduled poison is none the less a poison within the schedule because it has been mixed with other articles so as to constitute a compound. Vermin-killers containing poisons within Part I. of the schedule were not intended to be withdrawn by resolution from Part I., even if the Act conferred power on the council of the society so to withdraw them. It was argued by the appellant that it was quite consistent with the terms of the resolution to hold that vermin-killers containing poisons in Part I. fell within Part I., while vermin-killers containing poisons in Part II. fell within Part II. At the date of the resolution none of the cases as to the sale of mixtures or compounds had been decided, and that is the probable explanation why vermin-killers were specifically mentioned. If the appellant's contention is upheld strychnine and other deadly poisons in the form of vermin-killers could be obtained by all persons indiscriminately and in any quantity, without record or inquiry of any kind.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., in reply.—Unless the court is prepared to hold that the resolution of the society of 1869 was ultra vires the conviction cannot stand. Vermin-killers were not placed by that resolution in Part I. of the schedule and therefore must be deemed to be in Part II., to which section 17 does not apply. The words in the order are "Every compound containing any poison within the meaning of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, when prepared or sold for the destruction of vermin." The Irish Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 26) followed the resolution of 1869 and adopted the additions to the English Act of 1868 made by that resolution The two cases cited do not deal with the point in this case.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is an interesting case, but the arguments raised involved weightier considerations than I think were really necessary or material for the purpose of considering this case. For myself I do not question the correctness of the bulk of Mr. Kerly's argument. If he is right in saying that we must regard this stuff as containing an ingredient or poison named in the first part of Schedule A, I think it would be an offence under section 17 to sell that without knowing the vendee or without the vendee being introduced by some person known to the seller. In my judgment the fact that a poison named in the first part of the schedule is mixed with some other ingredient does not the less make it the sale of a poison. As I put it to Sir Edward Clarke in his reply, "You do not contend that if a seller had mixed prussic acid with flour he could sell it as a vermin killer without infringing the Act, and without knowing the person to whom it was vended and without the purchaser being introduced by some person known to the seller." Therefore the major proportion of the argument we have heard from Mr. Kerly in this case seemed to me not to touch the real point. In my opinion the case turns on whether the order of the Pharmaceutical Society was ultrà vires or not. Although I would not hesitate to declare an order ultrà vires if it appeared to me to contravene the clear meaning of the statute, in my judgment—after considering, with the advantage of the argument we have had — that cannot be contended in this case. The schedule, so far as this case is concerned, cannot be said to enumerate veratine or to name veratine. The part of the schedule it is said to come under, are the words "strychnine &c., or any poisonous vegetable alkaloids or their salts." I think the general idea of this Act was, that being the case, that the Pharmaceutical Society should have power to say which things ought to be deemed to be poisonous within one part of the schedule or the other. I was at first a little troubled by the suggestion that the Pharmaceutical Society had not the power to say that things were poisons, but I think when you observe that the Act has specified the two parts of the schedule, and says that the several articles named or described shall be deemed to be poisons, and that the council may from time to time declare on the resolution of the Pharmaceutical Society that any articles are to be deemed poisons within the meaning of this Act. That involves the power of putting the article which they deem to be poison, in one part of the schedule or the other; otherwise they cannot work the Act. I think, therefore, that there is a necessary implication of the power given to the Pharmaceutical Society to say in which part of the schedule a particular thing which is deemed to be poison is to go. That being so, it is properly conceded by Mr. Kerly that unless he can make out that this particular article is named in the first part of the schedule, the order of the Pharmaceutical Society is invalid. But he contends that, in so far as that it must either be read as including the compound of an article specially named in the first part, or that in so far as it did include the compound of an article named in the first part it would be ultrà vires. Now, quite apart from the Irish statute I should come to the conclusion that the society had got the power to make the resolution or order of 1869. The order follows the actual words of section 2, and therefore it cannot be suggested that it does not purport to be made under it. They recommend and declare that certain things ought to be deemed to be, some in the first part and others in the second: and in the second paragraph they have included two classes of articles which touch this very question, thus: "Every compound containing any poison within the meaning of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, when prepared or sold for the destruction of vermin," preparations of prussic acid, preparations of strychnine, and so on; the last two come within the four articles named, and they put them into Part I. As to the others, they put them into Part II. Now, in my judgment, it was not ultrà vires to declare that an article or preparation which contained some poisonous matter, but was if I may use the expression, a mere mixture of poisonous matter with something else, was to go into the second part. I think it quite impossible to overlook the legislation of the year 1870. There is no reason why in such a matter as the sale of poisons there should be different restrictions or a different power with regard to one part of the United Kingdom from another part. And when you find that in 1869 the Pharmaceutical Society made this order, in which order they have purported, as I have already pointed out, to put into the second part every compound containing poison prepared or sold for the destruction of vermin; and that Schedule A of the Act of 1870 puts into the second part in terms those very words, I think it is a legislative recognition of the power of the Pharmaceutical Society to make the order, because the Pharmacy Act, 1868, was supplemented by the Pharmaceutical Society's order of 1869; and the later Act in Ireland was a statute which embodied, so far as it had then gone, the wisdom of the Pharmaceutical Society with regard to other matters. All I desire to say is that I do not express any doubt upon the suggestion made by Sir Edward Clarke that it may turn out that in some later orders they have done exactly the same thing. I do not pretend to have, and I do not think any judge of the High Court should assume to have, the knowledge which would enable him to know whether an article does come within the first part of the schedule, unless it be either admitted or the fact is found for him. I am not saying there were other instances, but if there were, they would show that from time to time this power did rest with the Pharmaceutical Society. I desire only to add, as a matter of precaution, this: Of course, we know now from the statements made that this verative is a poisonous vegetable alkaloid, and that there is some portion of it in this vermin-killer. Of course, with the knowledge we have now, that involves the knowledge of the very fact which the Pharmaceutical Society would know about. It would show good sense and wise legislation to make an authority of that kind declare for the benefit of the public what ought to be deemed poisons within the one branch or the other. Of course, it must not be supposed that I suggest that the sale of a named poison mixed with something else would not be a sale under section 17. I repeat that I do not in any way throw the slightest doubt on that part which I think is concluded by the language of the section itself and by the judgment of the Court of Appeal. But I come to the conclusion that the order of 1869 is a perfectly valid order and that, therefore, the sale of the article was quite justified by the Act and order and was not the sale of a poison named in Part I. of Schedule A. It was a poison, and therefore required to be labelled poison and have the name of the seller on the box. But it was not a poison in the first part of Schedule A which required to be sold only to a person known to the vendor or introduced by a person known to him. I think the appeal, therefore, ought to be allowed, with costs.

LAWRANCE, J.—I concur, and I have nothing to add.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. I think the Pharmaceutical Society had power to pass the resolution on which the Privy Council made their order.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, E. Beck & Kirby.

Solicitors for the respondent, Markby, Stewart, & Co.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Dec. 15.

CALTHORPE v. TRECHMANN.
MACLEAY v. TAIT. (a.)

Company—Prospectus—Directors' liability—Omission to state contract—Proof of damage—Waiver clause—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.

In an action against directors by a shareholder who has taken shares on the faith of a prospectus claiming damages under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove that he has sustained damage by reason of the non-disclosure of a material contract required to be disclosed by that section, and also that had he been aware of it he would not have taken the shares. Where there is no actual fraud, but a mistake honestly made by the directors, a waiver clause as to any fuller compliance with section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, is a sufficient answer to the action.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1904] 2 Ch. 681) reversed.

In these two actions the respective plaintiffs sought to recover damages under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, against the directors of the Standard Co. under circumstances which are given in some detail in the judgment of Lord Lindley.

The Court of Appeal had held that the prospectus issued was to be considered fraudulent under the statute.

Haldane, K.C., Gore-Browne, K.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the appellants in the first action.

Younger, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the appellants in the second action.

Hughes, K.C., and W. Higgins, for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—Both these actions are actions for damages brought by the respective plaintiffs, who complain that they have been injured by the fraud of the defendants, and claiming damages for the loss they have sustained by the fraud of which they complain. As the actions are identical in their merit, I will, in what I have to say hereafter, treat the matter as if there were one plaintiff and one defendant. But for the thirty-eighth section of the Companies Act it is certain that neither of these actions could have been brought; and the real question to be debated is whether that section does, or rather did, more than enact where a contract which ought to have been inserted in a prospectus is omitted, that such omission shall be held to be fraudulent. That is what the section in terms enacts, and I think it decides no more. Now, in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover damages where he sues for damage suffered he must prove that he sustained them, and as one step towards that proof he must show that he acted on the faith of that fraudulent statement. It is an old judicial observation that fraud without damage or damage without fraud will found no action. Now, in this class of case, where misstatements are made in a prospectus and people have been led to take shares the taking of which has led to loss, I have often said that it is quite a fair inference to draw—if the prospectus is calculated to induce people to take shares and they do take shares—that the prospectus, tainted with falsehood as it is, be acted on as a whole—that people cannot be expected to analyze their own mental sensation so minutely as to be able to explain what particular statement induced them to become subscribers; but the question under this section is a very different one, and I think to enable a plaintiff to recover damages he must convince the tribunal before whom the question comes that if he had known of the omitted contract he would not have become a shareholder. That is what he must prove. Now in this case I do not believe for a moment, for the reasons to be given by Lord Lindley, that there would have been the smallest difference in the plaintiff's conduct if the contract in question had been disclosed as it ought to have been. I have had the opportunity of reading what Lord Lindley has written on that subject, and I entirely concur with him as to the waiver clause. Where a clause of that sort has been inserted, as part of the machinery for fraud it will, of course, afford no protection to its contrivers, but where, as in this case, there is a perfectly honest slip, why should it not be a protection? I know no reason. I move therefore, that both appeals be allowed, and that both actions be dismissed, with costs, both here and below.

Lord ROBERTSON.—It is, in my opinion, quite clear that the statute, by declaring a prospectus to be fraudulent, does not dispense the person founding on the fraud from proving that damage has resulted from the fraud. This is plain on principle, and if it were needed there is good authority for it.

On the other hand, the vice of the prospectus being an omission, the question whether, if that omission had not taken place, the result would not have been the same—that is to say, the shares would have been taken—is one requiring cautious and delicate handling. I do not think it an insoluble question, as has been suggested. But even for the person whose election to take or not to take is in debate, and even supposing him to speak with absolute candour, it requires a mind of singular clearness to decide how he would have acted if the omitted contract had been named; and it has to be borne in mind that it is not how he ought in reason to have decided, but how he (the particular individual) would have decided, that has got to be ascertained. Accordingly, one has to make full allowance for all sorts of considerations and prejudices—that the contracts made are too many and the thing too complicated—or that he did not like the names of the people, and so on.

Now, applying this view to the present case, I cannot join in any emphatic assertions about the conclusiveness of the evidence. But I take into account the nature of the omitted contract and the account given by this gentleman of his views of the enterprise, and I think it safe to infer that the omission of this contract did not affect his decision to apply for shares, and that he would not have acted otherwise if it had been mentioned. On this ground I agree in the reversal proposed.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord LINDLEY.—Both of these appeals turn on the true construction of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and of the application of that section to the facts of the cases which have to be considered. Before attempting to apply the section to those facts it will be convenient to examine the section itself and the construction which has been judicially put upon it. The section consists of two parts. The first states that a company's prospectus must contain certain particulars, the second declares that a prospectus which does not contain those particulars "shall be deemed fraudulent on the part of the promoters, directors, and officers of the company knowingly issuing the same as regards any person taking shares on the faith of such prospectus, unless he shall have had notice of such contracts." The particulars which are required to be stated "are the dates and names of the parties to any contract entered into by the company or the promoters, directors, or trustees thereof before the issue of such prospectus." The section says no more. When the section has to be applied to any particular case—i.e., when a plaintiff sues a defendant for damages for a breach of duty imposed by this section, the following questions necessarily arise—viz.: (1) Is the document to which the plaintiff says no reference is made in the prospectus such a contract as is described in the first part of the section? If it is not such a conractt, there is an end of the case. If it is, and if it is not disclosed, then it is necessary to inquire (2) whether the defendant was a promoter, director, or officer of the company; (3) whether he knowingly issued the prospectus; (4) whether the plaintiff took shares on the faith of the prospectus; (5) whether he had notice of the undisclosed contract before he applied for his shares? Assuming that all these questions are answered in the plaintiff's favour, there are still other questions as to which the section is wholly silent—viz., what is the plaintiff's remedy, and what more must he prove to entitle himself to damages? These matters are left to be dealt with by the judicial tribunals of the country, and they have nothing to guide them except the established principles applicable to actions for fraudulent misrepresentations. Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R. 586, 2 C. P. D. 469, decided that section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, included all contracts by the persons named in the section which might be material to be known by applicants for shares. Lord Bramwell and Kelly, C.B., thought that the words "any contract" ought to be still further restricted, but this opinion did not prevail. In Twycross v. Grant the jury found as facts that the plaintiff took his shares on the faith of the statements of the prospectus, and that if the contracts there in question had been disclosed or referred to in the prospectus the plaintiff would not have taken the shares. They also found that the defendant bonâ fide believed that the contract need not have been set forth. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and gave him as damages the full amount he had actually paid for his shares, although he might have sold them at a premium before he brought this action. The case came before the Common Pleas Division and the Court of Appeal, and the verdict was upheld. The construction put on section 38 in Twycross v. Grant by the Common Pleas Division has, I believe, been accepted as sound ever since it was decided—viz., 1877; and on the question of damages, and also on the immateriality of the defendants' belief that section 38 did not apply, the decision in Twycross v. Grant was approved, and followed by this House in Shepheard v. Broome, 53 W.R. 111 [1904] A. C. 343. Twycross v. Grant did not raise, and therefore did not settle, the very important question whether section 38 does more than make non-disclosure equivalent to actual fraud in the cases to which the section applies. On proof of the non-disclosure of a contract required to be disclosed, the section declares that the prospectus is to be deemed fraudulent on the part of the persons named in the section. No evidence, therefore, of evil intention on their part is required to be given by the plaintiff, and, on the other hand, the section renders proof by them that they had no evil intention immaterial. But an action for damages based on fraud, or on what is to be deemed fraudulent, can only be maintained by a person who can prove that the fraud, or what is to be deemed fraud, of which he complains has caused him damage, and the question arises how is this principle to be worked out when applied to actions based on section 38? The section in terms gives no remedy or cause of action; but it is a remedial section for the protection of applicants for shares against the wiles of promoters and others. It is noteworthy that what is deemed to be fraudulent is the prospectus, and not merely the non-disclosure of a contract required to be referred to. The language of the section is consistent with the view that any one who is induced to take shares by a prospectus which, although honest and true in all statements, is to be deemed fraudulent, and who has lost his money by so doing, can maintain an action for damages, even although he was not in fact misled in any way whatever. He may have relied only on statements which were true, and the non-disclosed statements may be such that he would have attached no importance to them if he had known of them. The language of the statute is open to such a construction; but if so construed it leads to a result which is so unjust and so inconsistent with the principles which govern actions for damages occasioned by fraud that some other interpretation consistent with the language of the section and with established principles ought to be sought for, and, if found, ought to be adopted. The difficulty has been observed and commented upon in several cases. In Sullivan v. Mitcalfe, 29 W. R. 181, 5 C. P. D. 455, which arose on demurrer, Thesiger, L.J. (at p. 460), after approving the decision in Twycross v. Grant on section 38, said that "no person can be said to have taken shares on the faith of a prospectus except a person who can prove to the satisfaction of a jury that he took his shares on the faith of there being no such contract as that omitted to be disclosed, and that if such contract had been disclosed to him he would not have taken his shares." Lord Bramwell adhered to the opinion which he had expressed in Twycross v. Grant, and on the construction of the first part of section 38 did not agree with Thesiger, L.J. (see p. 477). But, on principle, I think Thesiger, L.J., was right. Lord Blackburn, in his well-known judgment in Smith v. Chadwick, 32 W. R. 687, 9 App. Cas. 187, pointed out that a plaintiff who sues for damages by reason of having been induced by a fraudulent prospectus to take shares in a company must prove both fraud and damage to himself occasioned by such fraud. Smith v. Chadwick did not turn on section 38, but that section says no more than that a prospectus shall be deemed fraudulent against certain persons if it does not disclose certain documents. But proof that a document is fraudulent is not all that a plaintiff must prove in order to recover damages. He must further prove damage occasioned to himself by the fraud of which he complains. Proof that he applied for shares on the faith of a prospectus which is to be treated as fraudulent by section 38, and that he obtained them and paid for them and lost his money is primâ facie evidence, but only primâ facie evidence, of damage by fraud on himself. McConnel v. Wright, 51 W. R. 661, [1903] 2 Ch. 546, goes no further than this. But if the plaintiff is challenged on this point, he must go a step further and prove that he was misled by what makes the prospectus fraudulent—i.e., the omission to disclose some document which ought to have been disclosed. This was the view taken in Nash v. Calthorpe, [1905] 2 Ch. 237, 53 W. R. Dig. 28, which, in my opinion, was correct. And it is noteworthy that Romer, L.J., agreed with the decisions of the Court of Appeal in McCollen v. Wright and also in the later case of Nash v. Calthorpe, which was not decided until after the cases now before your lordships came on for trial. Another question which has been much discussed is the meaning of "knowingly issued" in the second part of section 38. It is necessary to prove that the defendant knowingly issued the prospectus; and this has been held to mean issued the prospectus knowing of a contract such as is described in the section, and knowing that the prospectus did not disclose it. The fact that a defendant honestly but erroneously believed that the section did not apply to a particular contract of which he knew would not protect him from liability. This was decided in Twycross v. Grant, and by this House in Shepheard v. Broome, 53 W. R. 111, [1904] A. C. 342. The language of the statute in terms applies to directors and others who knowingly issue a prospectus which does not disclose such a contract as is mentioned in the first part of the section, whether they knew of its existence or not. But it can hardly be supposed that the Legislature meant to brand with fraud a director who knowingly issued a prospectus, but who never knew of the existence of a contract which ought to be disclosed. I cannot, however, think that the section can be properly restricted so as not to apply to a director who knew of a contract such as is described in the first part of the section, but who forgot all about it when he issued a prospectus not referring to it. Whether such a director could be properly convicted on an indictment for fraud, or for something short of it, is quite another question, which your lordships have not to consider. I have already pointed out that no intent to deceive is necessary to support a civil action for damages based on section 38. I will merely observe that in common parlance persons talk of knowing perfectly well what for the moment is not present to their mind, and even what they cannot at the moment recall to their memory. With these observations on the construction and legal effect of section 38, I pass to its application to the cases before your lordships.

The Standard Co. was promoted by the Globe Co., and the prospectus of the Standard Co. stated that in the formation and issue of that company there were no promoters' profits in any shape or form whatever. This statement has been proved to be true. But there was a contract, dated the 27th of October, 1898, and made between the Globe Co. and the Standard Co., by which the Globe Co. agreed to transfer to the Standard Co. 5,000 fully paid up deferred shares of £1 each in the Austen Friars Syndicate; and in consideration of this transfer the Standard Co. was to allot and issue to the Globe Co. 40,000 fully paid up shares of £1 each of the Standard Co. This agreement was unfortunately not disclosed in the prospectus of the Standard Co. But I cannot doubt for a moment that it fell within the first part of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and ought to have been referred to in the prospectus. It was a contract which any prudent applicant for shares in the Standard Co. would have desired to understand before he took shares in the Standard Co., and was in that sense to that extent material, as explained in Twycross v. Grant. Every judge who has had to consider this question has come to the same conclusion, and to my mind this part of the case is so clear that it is unnecessary to say more about it. The prospectus was not issued until May, 1899, and the defendants were directors when it was issued, and when shares were allotted to persons who were induced by it to apply for shares in the Standard Co. All the plaintiffs in these actions did so apply. How it came about that the contract of the 27th of October, 1898, was not disclosed is by no means clear; but, whatever the real explanation may be, it was certainly not intentionally omitted by any of the defendants to these actions. It is clearly proved, and is now admitted, that, whether legally liable or not, they are all innocent of any fraudulent misstatement or concealment. Nevertheless section 38 entitles the plaintiffs to have the prospectus treated as fraudulent, and the next question is, Have the plaintiffs or any of them proved that they have sustained any damage by reason of the non-disclosure of the contract of the 27th of October, 1898? The plaintiffs took shares on the faith of the prospectus, and they have lost their money. This is their case; but it is at most only a primâ facie case, and when the facts are more closely investigated it is difficult to believe that a knowledge of the deed of the 27th of October, 1898, would have induced any of them to abstain from applying for shares. In the first place, the examination and cross-examination of the plaintiffs shows conclusively that the plaintiffs paid no attention whatever to the documents which were disclosed, and if another had been added to their number the result would have been the same. But, further, the contract of the 27th of October, 1898, when understood, turns out to be an ingenious but perfectly honest transaction, entered into in order to facilitate the acquisition by the Standard Co. of the preferred shares of the Finance Syndicate, all the shares of which the Standard Co. was formed to acquire. The contract conferred no profit whatever on the Globe Co., and, so far from disproving the statement in the prospectus that there were no promoters' profits, the contract shows that none were or could be made out of the transaction to which the contract related. In short, it is, in my opinion, plain that the non-disclosure of this contract has not caused any damage whatever to the plaintiffs, or any of them.

But, even if I am wrong in coming to this conclusion, I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to be protected by the plaintiffs' agreements to waive any fuller compliance with section 38 than is contained in the prospectus. This is a case in which all the defendants are honest men. If they are liable, they are so by reason of an unfortunate mistake on their part. None of them had the slightest intention to keep back anything. Whether the same can be said of all the other directors I do not know. In most of the cases in which the effect of a waiver clause has been discussed, the clause has been unsuccessfully relied on as a protection against trickery; but in the first of these, Greenwood v. Leather Shod Wheel Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 421, 48 W. R. Dig. 35, it was pointed out that although such clauses were worthless for such purposes, yet they might prove useful to protect honest men from unjust demands. These actions are instances in which the defendants can justly claim the protection of the waiver clauses contained in the prospectus and application for shares. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that both appeals should be allowed and the actions be dismissed with costs both here and below.

Judgment of Kekewich, J., and order of the Court of Appeal reversed, with costs here and below.

Solicitors, Burn & Berridge; Gilbert Robbins; Richardson & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L JJ.) Feb. 27.

LAW v. LLEWELLYN. (a.)

Defamation—Slander—Privilege—Magistrate sitting at sessions—Withdrawal of criminal charge—Words spoken in course of judicial proceedings.

A justice of the peace sitting at sessions to dispose of a criminal case which comes before him is acting judicially, and observations made by him on giving leave to withdraw such a charge are made by him in the course of a judicial proceeding, and are therefore privileged and not actionable, even if made maliciously and without reasonable cause.

Allardice v. Robertson, 1 Dow. & Clark 495, not followed.

This was an appeal from an order made by Channell, J., at chambers, under R.S.C. ord. 35, r. 4, directing the statement of claim in the action to be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action.

The plaintiff was a member of the Neath Town Council and of various other public bodies.

The defendant was a justice of the peace for the county of Glamorgan, and was on the 1st of July, 1905, the time of the speaking and publishing of the words complained of, sitting as chairman of the justices at a court of summary jurisdiction at Bridgend, in the said county.

The plaintiff appeared at the court by counsel for the purpose of preferring a charge against two men named Thomas for obtaining money by false pretences. The plaintiff was advised that in the absence of certain witnesses it would be impossible to secure a conviction against the accused. Acting upon his counsel's advice the plaintiff agreed to withdraw the charge and pay the costs of the solicitor of the accused upon their undertaking to bring no action against him in respect of the said proceedings or otherwise. This agreement was duly signed by the legal representatives of the said parties, and the court was then informed by counsel that the plaintiff had withdrawn the charge upon the terms mentioned.

The defendant then falsely and maliciously and without any reasonable cause whatsoever spoke and published of the plaintiff the words following: "It is our opinion that this has been a gross attempt to blackmail and it would have been well if the matter had come before the Public Prosecutor. From what we have heard of this man Edward Law, he has been in the habit of trying to extort money from persons by illegal means, and if he found himself in gaol for twelve months it would possibly do him a good deal of good."

The statement of claim did not show the exact order of events but it appeared, from evidence filed in the case that the defendant, before making these observations, said that the magistrates would allow the case to be withdrawn, and that he repeated this, after having made these observations.

The plaintiff brought the present action for damages for the alleged slander by the defendant.

On the 29th of January, 1906, Channell, J., on the application of the defendant, ordered the statement of claim to be struck out "as disclosing no reasonable cause of action," but gave leave to appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

Evans, K.C., Lush, K.C., Lewis Thomas, and H. S. Stowe, for the appellant.—Admitting the general rule that defamatory words spoken by a person acting in a judicial capacity in the course of any proceeding before him are privileged and not actionable, even if spoken maliciously, these words were not spoken in the course of a proceeding. The charge had been withdrawn, and the court could have had no knowledge of the facts. But even if these words were spoken in the course of a judicial proceeding, Allardice v. Robertson, 1 Dow. & Clark 495, is an authority that the privilege enjoyed by a judge of the superior court does not extend to a magistrate. This case was referred to without disapproval by Cockburn, C.J., in Seaman v. Nethercliffe, 25 W. R. 159, 2 C. P. D. 53.

Taylor v. Nesfield, 2 W. R. 474, 3 E. & B. 724; Scott v. Stansfield, 16 W. R. 911, L. R. 3 Ex. 220; Hodgson v. Scarlett, 1 B. & Ald. 232; Munster v. Lamb, 32 W. R. 243, 11 Q. B. D. 588; and Hodson v. Pare, 47 W. R. 241, [1899] 1 Q. B. D. 455, were also cited.

Bankes, K.C., and Fraser, for the respondent, were not called upon.

ROMER, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal fails. In opening the appeal Mr. S. T. Evans said, and in my opinion said rightly, that it was hopeless to contend at the present day that a justice of the peace sitting in petty sessions to dispose of a criminal case which comes before him is not acting judicially. Consequently a defamatory statement made by him in the course of the proceedings before him cannot be actionable as against that justice. That has been, to my mind, clearly settled beyond controversy by the two cases which have been referred to: Munster v. Lamb and Hodson v. Ware. Both cases are to the same effect and show that a magistrate is "a judge" within the meaning of the rule that defamatory observations made by a judge in the course of his judicial duties—that is, when sitting as a judge—are not actionable even though it is alleged or suggested that the observations were made without reasonable or probable cause and maliciously.

But Mr. Montague Lush boldly attempted to reargue that question, and he did so by referring to the decision in a Scotch case of Allardice v. Robertson. With reference to that case all I need say is this, that whether it correctly lays down the law in Scotland at the present time or not, as to which I cannot say, certainly it is a case dealing with Scotch law only, and is not binding upon this court. It cannot therefore be regarded as an authority for the proposition for which Mr. Lush cited it. It is not an authority against the law as I have stated it, and as illustrated by the cases to which I at first referred. It is said that Allardice v. Robertson was referred to without disapproval by Cockburn, L.J., in Seaman v. Nethercliffe. All I need say with regard to that is this, that if reference is made to the observations of the Lord Chief Justice in the latter case it will be noticed that he was not referring to Allardice v. Robertson for the purpose of approving it or anything of the sort. It was a case that had been cited to him, and all he said was that it was not an authority precisely covering the question which he had then to decide; and that clearly was so. The reference to the case by the Lord Chief Justice in no wise constituted a recognition by him that Allardice v. Robertson was an authority binding on the English courts for the point of law which it purports to decide.

That being so, so far as the law is concerned it is clear that this action against the defendant Mr. Llewellyn will not lie, if it be that the observations which are said to have been made by him, and which are said to have been libellous and malicious, were uttered by him in the course of his duty as magistrate. To my mind they clearly were uttered in such circumstances as made them privileged. The circumstances are stated in the statement of claim, and shortly they amount to this: The plaintiff had brought a criminal charge against two persons, and when that charge came before the defendant, sitting, as he did, as a justice of the peace in sessions, the plaintiff stated that he had withdrawn the charge and agreed to pay the costs of the solicitor of the persons against whom the charge had been made upon their undertaking to bring no action against him, the plaintiff, in respect of the proceedings he had instituted. Being a criminal charge, it could not have been withdrawn as a matter of course. In the circumstances it was clearly impossible for the magistrates to insist upon the charge not being withdrawn; that would have done no good, especially as the magistrates were of opinion that there was no real crime on the part of the persons against whom the charge had been made. In those circumstances, the chairman, Mr. Llewellyn, had to state why, in his opinion, and in that of his brother magistrates, nothing could be done except to allow the charge to be withdrawn, and it was upon giving leave accordingly that he made the observations which are said to be libellous.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In my opinion it was clearly within his jurisdiction at that time to make observations with regard to a pending summons; the observations he did make were, therefore, observations made in the course of his judicial duty, and consequently are not actionable. In those circumstances it seems to me this action is clearly frivolous and vexatious. As I have stated, the law is clear, the allegations in the statements of claim are clear, and that being so, it appears to me that the learned judge below rightly discharged his duty in striking out the statement of claim as being frivolous and vexatious. I am of opinion his decision was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Evans, K.C.—Your lordships have dealt with this case upon the assumption which must, of course, be taken from the statement of claim, that the words in question were spoken in the course of the proceedings. But suppose that the magistrates said "We will allow this case to be withdrawn, and then went on and added those words. There, I submit, the words could not have been spoken in the course of the proceedings, and that at any rate that is a matter which ought to be determined, and I ask for leave to amend the statement of claim.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—It makes no difference whether the magistrates said at first "We will allow this case to be withdrawn," and then uttered the words complained of, or whether he said, "In our opinion the facts are so and so," and then allowed the case to be withdrawn.

ROMER, L.J.—It makes no difference whatever, as the observations are made in the course of one transaction. We refuse leave to amend, and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Solicitors, H. G. Rastall, for A. Jeffreys, Neath; Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for T. J. Hughes & Lewis, Bridgend.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Joyce, J. } Feb. 8, 12, 20, 21, 22.

THELLUSSON v. VALENTIA. (a.)

Club—Sporting—Rules—Power to alter—Object of club—Particular sport—Abolition by resolution—Validity of resolution.

A club was formed in 1868, one of the objects of which was to provide grounds and facilities for the sport of pigeon-shooting. From time to time provision was made and facilities afforded for polo playing and other sports. One of the rules provided that any of the rules might be altered or added to, at any general meeting of the club, with the assent of a majority of two-thirds of the members. At the annual general meeting of the club, held on the 20th of May, 1905, a resolution was passed by the requisite majority that pigeon-shooting should be discontinued as from the 31*st of December*, 1905.

Held, that this resolution was valid.

Action.

The plaintiffs in this action were the Hon. Francis Thellusson, James Henry Hannay, and John A. Miller (on behalf of themselves and the other members of the Hurlingham Club).

The defendants were the Right Hon. Viscount Valentia, Major-General Sir H. P. Ewart, E. H. Baldock, the Right Hon. the Earl of Ancaster, the Right Hon. the Earl of Haddington (the trustees of the said club), and A. Lindsay Lister (on behalf of himself and the committee of the said club).

The Hurlingham Club was formed in 1868, and its objects were stated in rule 2 as follows: "The club is instituted for the purpose of providing a ground for pigeon-shooting, surrounded with certain accessories, and so situated as to render it an agreeable country resort, not alone to those who take part in pigeon-shooting, but also to their family and friends."

Rule 16 provided that the management of the club should be conducted by the committee, who should have powers to make bye-laws (consistent with the rules of the club).

Rule 30 (now rule 22) provided the means by which the rules of the club could be altered or added to.

Rule 60 (now rule 33) provided that "These rules and regulations shall be printed, and a copy of them shall be delivered to each member on his election, or transmitted to his address, but no member shall be absolved from their effect on any allegation of not having received them or of ignorance of their contents."

These rules were altered and added to from time to time, and the rules so altered and added to are contained in an edition published in 1904. By this edition it appears that rule 2 now provides that: "The club is instituted for the purpose of providing a ground for pigeon-shooting, polo, and other sports, surrounded with such accessories and so situated as to render it an agreeable country resort not only to members, but also to their families and friends." A portion of the club grounds has always been set apart and facilities been provided for pigeon-shooting.

At the annual general meeting of the club, held on the 20th of May, 1905, the following resolution was passed by the requisite (under rule 22) two-thirds majority: "Resolved, that pigeon-shooting be discontinued at the Hurlingham Club after December, 1905."

The plaintiffs then commenced this action asking for a declaration that this resolution is not binding on the members of the club, and that it is null and void, and for a declaration that the premises of the club are provided and held in trust (amongst other purposes) for providing a ground for pigeon-shooting.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Sturges, for the plaintiffs.—Pigeon-shooting was the primary object for which the club was instituted, and rule 2 was therefore a fundamental rule that could not be altered, in the manner contemplated, by a two-thirds majority under rule 22. It was not allowable to change the root object of the club and the trusts upon which its property was held: Baird v. Wells, 39 W. R. 61, 44 Ch. Div. 661; Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, 48 W. R. 452, [1900] 1 Ch. 656; Imperial Hydropathic Hotel Co., Blackpool, v. Hampson, 31 W. R. 330, 23 Ch. Div. 1; and Pickering v. Stephenson, 20 W. R. 654, 14 Eq. 322.

Younger, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the defendants.—No rule of the club is so fundamental as to be incapable of being altered in accordance with rule 22. Rule 2 is nothing but an act of management: Dawkins v. Antrobus, 29 W. R. 511, 17 Ch. Div. 615. Nothing is fundamental except that it shall remain a club: Walker v. London Tramways Co., 28 W. R. 163, 12 Ch. Div. 705. The plaintiffs are asking the court to compel the club to do that which it cannot do, to enforce specifically a contract that cannot be specifically enforced.

Andrews v. Gas Meter Co., 45 W. R. 321, [1897] 1 Ch. 361; Harrison v. Marquis of Abergavenny, 57 L. T. 360; and Punt v. Symons & Co. (Limited), 52 W. R. 41, [1903] 2 Ch. 506, also cited.

JOYCE, J., in giving judgment, said: Every member who had joined this club had done so subject to the exercise of the power of altering the rules under rule 22, and with full notice of all the provisions of the rules, if not otherwise, by virtue at any rate, of rule 60. The power of altering rules had been exercised from time to time, and the rules as they now stood embodied the result of all the alterations, including the alteration to rule 2. The bye-laws contained a provision that the shooting ground should be such portion of the club premises as the general committee for the time being should determine. In effect, it appeared that the management of the club was with the committee, subject to the control of the general meeting. This action was brought by some of the minority, asking to have it determined that the resolution passed at the annual general meeting held on the 20th of May, 1905, was null and void. Generally, the objection to the resolution was that it was incompetent for any majority, however large, to alter rule 2. The terms of the resolution did not, in fact, purport to alter the rules. It was, perhaps, inconsistent with some of the rules and bye-laws, but that inconsistency might be set right by a very few amendments, and possibly without in terms altering rule 2. But the real question was whether, having regard to the specific mention of pigeon-shooting in rule 2, the resolution was, on the face of it, necessarily invalid, whatever the circumstances might have been under which it was passed. There was nothing in the rules prescribing what expenditure or other provision was to be made for the shooting, but it had been the practice in the past to give prizes and make various arrangements to facilitate and encourage the so-called sport. There was, however, no sort of obligation to give these prizes or to invite foreigners to an international meeting. The committee, if so advised, might discontinue all that, and, instead of encouraging the sport, might make arrangements tending to have a contrary effect. It was within their discretion to give prizes for one sport in preference to others. The resolution, at any rate, authorized the committee to adopt that course—that was to say, to discourage pigeon-shooting, and, if and so far as was necessary, to alter the bye-laws accordingly. To that extent at least the resolution was valid, and might be acted upon with propriety by the committee. Under no circumstances could the court positively prescribe what arrangements or bye-laws the committee ought to make. The court could not manage the club and had no jurisdiction to give such positive directions, though it might forbid a definite act in violation of the rules. But was the resolution necessarily invalid at all? It did not propose to divert the funds of the club to any unauthorized objects. That would be illegal and might be restrained by injunction. Rule 2 did not limit the club to a single object, but described a numerous class of sports, among which pigeon-shooting was only one. If pigeon-shooting should be declared illegal the existence of the club would not be affected. There was no rule of law which required any company or association to continue to fulfil each and every of the several purposes for which it was originally formed. If pigeon-shooting were dropped the club might still efficiently fulfil its general purposes as laid down by the rules. If there was any limit to the powers of altering the rules it had not been transgressed. No rule was so fundamental, whatever might be the meaning of that expression, as to exempt it from addition or alteration. The trustees did not hold the ground upon a special or any trust to allow pigeon-shooting to be carried on there. They held it generally upon trust for the club, and subject to the directions of the committee. Without going so far as to say that the resolution was absolutely valid or binding until some corresponding or appropriate alteration had been made in the rules, I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to make any such declaration as was asked for. The action therefore fails, and must be dismissed.

Judgment for defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Wm. Sturges & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Nussey & Fellowes.

Chan. Div. } Joyce, J. } Dec. 8, 12, 19.

NORTH-EASTERN MARINE ENGINEERING CO. (LIMITED) v. LEEDS FORGE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Patent—Action to restrain threats of legal proceedings—Lapse of patent—Validity of patent—Infringement—Practice—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, rr. 4, 5—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.

The defendants L. F. Co., who were the owners of a patent which expired in 1903 for an improved boiler flue, brought an action for infringement against a firm, D. & Co., and finally obtained judgment in their favour in the House of Lords. L. F. Co. then threatened to take proceedings for infringement against the plaintiffs, who had purchased boiler flues from D. & Co., and commenced proceedings. L. F. Co. also brought an action against another firm, C. & Co., in which the defence was raised that the patent was invalid, and thereupon L. F. Co. gave an undertaking not to sue C. & Co., and stayed all proceedings. They also discontinued the action against the present plaintiffs, who thereupon asked for a similar undertaking to that given to C. & Co., which was refused. The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present action for a declaration that the patent was invalid, and that they had not infringed any rights of the defendants, also alleging that they had suffered damages by the threats of the defendants. The point as to whether the plaintiffs were entitled to relief, assuming that the patent was invalid, was ordered to be tried first.

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the plaintiffs had no cause of action, as the mere threat to commence proceedings would not give rise to a right of action, and that the plaintiffs' proper remedy was a petition for the revocation of the patent under section 26 of the Patent Act, 1883, notwithstanding that the patent had expired.

Points of law set down for argument by order.

The defendants, who were engineers carrying on business at Leeds, were the owners prior to 1900 of letters patent No. 8,591 of 1889, granted to one Devis, for an invention of "an improved boiler flue." These letters patent expired on the 23rd of May, 1903.

In March, 1900, the defendant company commenced an action against a firm called the Deighton Patent Flue and Tube Co. (Limited), to restrain them from infringing the said letters patent by making and selling boiler flues which were alleged to be infringements. At the trial of the action Cozens-Hardy, J., decided that the letters patent had been infringed. The Court of Appeal reversed this judgment, and in May, 1904, the House of Lords reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeal and restored the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J.

The plaintiffs in the present action had, prior to the hearing of the appeal in the House of Lords, purchased a large number of boiler flues from the Deighton Co. which were identical in form with those which were the subject of the action against the Deighton Patent Flue and Tube Co.

On the 3rd of April, 1901, and the 19th of March, 1902, the solicitors of the defendant company wrote to the plaintiffs threatening them with legal proceedings in respect of the use of the said boiler flues purchased from the Deighton Co., and on the 17th of June, 1904, after the judgment in the House of Lords, they again wrote "Having regard to the circumstances our clients have decided to take proceedings against you to recover damages for your wrongful action in this respect (i.e., infringing), and we have to ask you to give us the name of your solicitor who will accept service of the proceedings on your behalf." On the 29th of June, 1904, an action was commenced by the defendant company claiming damages from the plaintiffs for their alleged infringement of the said letters patent.

A large number of other firms of engineers and shipbuilders had purchased similar flues from the Deighton Co., and the Leeds Forge Co. had commenced an action against a certain firm, Clayton, Son, & Co., for infringing the said patent. Clayton & Co. pleaded the invalidity of Devis' patent and asked for a declaration that the said letters patent were invalid, and on the 31st of March, 1905, it was ordered that all further proceedings in the action should be stayed upon the Leeds Forge Co. giving an undertaking not to sue Clayton, Son, & Co. or their customers in respect of the use or sale of boilers constructed in accordance with the said patent.

The defendants, the Leeds Forge Co., discontinued the proceedings against the plaintiffs, the North-Eastern Marine Engineering Co., on the 14th of March, 1905.

On the 10th of May, 1905, the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to the defendants' solicitors complaining of the loss and inconvenience which the plaintiffs had suffered through the above-mentioned threatening letters and the commencement and discontinuance of the action, and asked that the Leeds Forge Co. should give a written undertaking that they would not commence any proceedings against them or any of their customers in respect of the flues purchased from Deighton & Co.

The defendants' solicitors refused to give any such undertaking as was asked for, and alleged that the action had been discontinued against the plaintiffs because the defendants were in a position to claim a larger measure of damages against the maker of the infringing flue, they undertook, however, that they would not proceed against the plaintiffs unless the defendants failed to secure their damages from the makers of the flues used by the plaintiffs.

Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced the present action, in which they alleged that the validity of the letters patent was admitted and was not in fact tried in the action against the Deighton Patent Flue and Tube Co. (Limited) and they claimed a declaration that the letters patent 8,591 of 1889 were invalid at the date thereof, and were so continuously down to the date when the term for which they were granted expired, and also a declaration that the plaintiffs had not infringed any legal rights of the defendants.

The defendants pleaded that, having successfully prosecuted up to the House of Lords an action for the infringement of the said letters patent, the plaintiffs had no cause of action upon the facts appearing in the statement of claim under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and also that no action would lie under section 32 of the Act of 1883 in respect of letters patent which had expired prior to the commencement of the action, and also that there could not be a suit for a declaration as to the invalidity of letters patent which had expired prior to the commencement of the action.

An order was made on the 11th of August, 1905, by Kekewich, J., that the point of law as to whether the plaintiffs are entitled to relief should be set down to be argued before the court, the defendants admitting, for the purpose of argument, the allegations of fact contained in the statement of claim.

Section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, provides that "where any person claiming to be the patentee of an invention by circulars, advertisements, or otherwise threatens any other person with legal proceedings or liability in respect of any alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the invention, any person or persons aggrieved thereby may bring an action against him, and may obtain an injunction against the continuance of such threats, and may recover such damages (if any) as may have been sustained thereby, if the alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase to which the threats related was not in fact an infringement of any legal rights of the person making such threats, provided that this section shall not apply if the person making such threats with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent."

Ord. 25, r. 4, provides that "the court or a judge may order any pleading to be struck out on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and in any such case or in case of the action or defence being shown by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious the court or a judge may order the action to be stayed or dismissed or judgment to be entered accordingly as may be just."

Rule 5: "No action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is, or could be, claimed or not."

Fletcher Moulton, K.C., and Bousfield, K.C. (Walters and Colefax with them), for the defendants, the Leeds Forge Co. (Limited).—There could not be an action under section 32 of the Patents Act for a declaration that the patent was invalid. In reality this was an attempt on the part of the plaintiffs to prevent the defendants from bringing a future action against the plaintiffs for infringement. The cause of action set out in the statement of claim was for damages sustained through the threats. By dropping the claim for damages the plaintiffs had admitted that they had no personal interest in the matter, which was necessary in order to enable any person other than the Attorney-General to bring an action for revocation of a patent. The sole basis of the action was the threatening letters.

Astbury, K.C., and Graham, for the plaintiffs, the North-Eastern Marine Engineering Co. (Limited).—The defendants had threatened and had commenced proceedings against another firm for infringment, but when the question as to the validity of the patent was raised they discontinued the action and gave an undertaking not to sue that firm or their customers. The plaintiffs in the present action asked for a declaration which would in like manner protect them. In Young v. Ashley Gardens Properties (Limited), [1903] 2 Ch. 112, 51 W. R. Dig. 83, the court made a declaratory order under ord. 25, r. 5, that the lessor was not entitled to impose unreasonable conditions, and that the lessee was entitled to assign without the further consent of the lessor, and in London Association of Shipowners and Brokers v. London and India Docks Joint Committee, [1892] 3 Ch. 242, 41 W. R. Dig. 84, a declaration was made, notwithstanding that a claim for consequential relief had been abandoned, that the regulations made by the docks committee were not binding on the shipping company. In Ellis v. Duke of Bedford, 47 W. R. 170, [1899] 1 Ch. 494, Lindley, M.R., pointed out that under ord. 25, r. 5, actions could be brought merely to declare rights, which was an innovation of a very important kind, and that under that rule an action would lie to assert the preferential rights which the whole class of growers were entitled to. If this patent had not expired the plaintiffs could have brought an action to have it revoked, but now, the patent having gone, they relied on the fact that as they could not petition against it they were entitled to sue for a declaration. They were entitled to get it out of the way in some manner inasmuch as though the patent had expired the liability for what was done during its existence had not expired. The declaration was the real relief that was asked for by the plaintiffs; no reliance was placed upon section 32 of the Patent Act, 1883, and the claim for damages was not persisted in. It was a common practice for the court to make a declaration that a deed was void, and there was no question but that the court had absolute power to make such a declaration. [JOYCE, J.—Why would not a petition lie for declaring the patent to be invalid even although the patent had expired? Would not that be the proper course to pursue?] If that course had been adopted the plaintiff would probably have been met with some technical objection that their remedy was gone, and, further, there was no authority for adopting such a procedure. [Bousfield.—It was very doubtful whether such a petition would lie as the form of order provided that the patent should be delivered up in order to be cancelled.] [JOYCE, J.—There was no reason why the paper containing the grant of the patent should not be delivered up after the expiration of the patent. That appeared to be the only remedy.] It was a matter for the discretion of the court rather than a limitation to its power. Ord. 25, r. 5, provided that no action should be objected to on the ground that a declaration was sought thereby, and in Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries, 52 W. R. 564, [1904] 2 K. B., p. 49, Collins, M.R., expressed a difficulty which he felt in making the declaration asked for, because the declaration would not be ancillary to the putting in suit of any legal right, but that difficulty did not arise in the present case. The only limitation to an action of this sort under the rules was in the discretion of the judge and the objection which the defendants had raised was not a demurrer on a point of law, but was a demurrer to your lordships' discretion, which was an unheard-of proceeding. [JOYCE, J.—As this was a Crown grant could the patent be revoked except in the statutory way.] The answer to the argument that such an action had never been brought before was that the circumstances which gave rise to it had never arisen before. There was no case in which such a declaration had been asked for and been refused.

Bousfield, K.C., in reply.—Even if the plaintiffs were right in saying that the patent was invalid, the mere threat on the part of the defendants to bring an action for infringement would not give the plaintiffs a cause of action. [JOYCE, J.—The plaintiffs now only ask for two declarations, and these were not based on the threats.] The practical outcome was that the defendants were entitled to the order asked for—viz., the dismissal of the action as the plaintiffs had asked for no relief, except what was based on the threats. The real question that had been argued was not the question of the declaration, but as to damages. Even if the court had power to exercise its discretion this was not a proper case in which it would exercise it. The plaintiffs had no cause of action except upon the ground of the threats, and upon that they could not succeed, as they would have to allege the invalidity of the patent, and the House of Lords had decided that the patent was valid. The plaintiffs must rely entirely on the discretion of the court, and there were no cases in which this discretion had been exercised, except where it was ancillary to the relief asked for. In Faber v. Gosworth Urban District Council, 88 L. T. 549, 51 W. R. Dig. 133, Swinfen Eady, J., pointed out that the jurisdiction to make a declaratory order ought to be exercized with extreme care, and Lord Davey in Barraclough v. Brown, [1897] App. Cas. 623, said there was nothing in the rule to enable the court to make a declaration on a subject to which its jurisdiction to give relief was excluded by statute. It was obviously incompetent for the judges to make rules of procedure to give the court power to deal with a matter which was outside its jurisdiction. London Association of Shipowners and Brokers v. London and India Docks Joint Committee was an instance where a declaration was made although it was contended that no right had been infringed. In Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries, 52 W. R. 564, [1904] 2 K. B. 44, the court did not make the declaration asked for, because on the true construction of the Truck Act they were not entitled to it, and also because it was not ancillary to the putting in suit of any legal right. In Young v. Ashley Gardens Properties (Limited) the question was only one of enforcing rights which the plaintiffs were entitled to. The jurisdiction of the court to make the declaration was not disputed, and Ellis v. Duke of Bedford was another case in which the question was one of enforcing a right. Such a declaration had never been granted in a case where it was not ancillary to any right claimed. For the purposes of this argument it was immaterial whether the defence was true or not. The defendants only admitted the plaintiffs' contention that the patent was invalid for the purposes of this argument, so that whether it was valid or not, in either case it afforded no ground of action to the plaintiffs, who were therefore not entitled to the declaration which they asked for, as it was only in the exercise of the discretion of the court, and could not be asked for as a matter of right.

Dec. 19.—JOYCE, J.—This case has been somewhat simplified by the statement made by counsel for the plaintiffs that no reliance is placed upon section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, or upon the claim for damages in the statement of claim. At the same time I think the claim for damages could not have been maintained, because upon the pleadings it was stated that the threats complained of were made bonâ fide and not without reasonable or probable ground. The action is therefore reduced simply to a claim for two declarations—namely, a declaration that the letters patent 8,591 of 1889 were invalid at the date thereof, and were so continuously down to the date when the term for which they were granted had expired, and a declaration that the plaintiffs have not infringed any legal rights of the defendants. No further relief is asked—I am omitting the last two claims by reason of what was said at the hearing—nor could any relief have been given before the Judicature Act, because there are no equitable grounds alleged nor any matters of equity upon which the defendants could have been restrained from suing the plaintiffs.

Now, the old rule as to actions for declaration was that such an action could not be maintained unless the plaintiff would be entitled to consequential relief whether he asked for it or not. Ord. 25, r. 5, introduced a new rule, which is that "no action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground simply that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby." To the operation of this rule there must, however, be some limitation. It cannot, I think, compel the court to entertain any and every action for a declaration, and it cannot be that a claim for any declaration whatsoever is a good ground of action. What the limitation is I am not prepared to say, and I am not going to attempt to define it, which is a thing which is always dangerous. There is an obiter dictum of the present Master of the Rolls in Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries (Limited), that the declaration must be ancillary to the putting in suit of some legal right. Whether this be as plain and satisfactory a definition as could be wished I venture to entertain some doubt, but on both sides it was put to me as a matter of discretion, that it was for my discretion, a discretion which certainly exists, and which according to the cases must be exercised with very extreme care and caution.

Really, this action is an action to have it declared that the present plaintiffs would have a good ground of defence if and when the present defendants sue them for infringement of the patent No. 8,591 of 1889, which they may or may not do; and in order to determine this, if the action proceeded there would have to be a trial with a large and possibly extravagant expenditure on both sides, but in particular by the present defendants, with special counsel and expert witnesses and the like as is usual in patent cases. Now, it seems to me that the first objection to this action is that the plaintiffs' proper remedy is that provided by section 26 of the Patents, &c., Act of 1883—viz., a petition for revocation of the patent. I am aware that the term limited by the patent has expired, but no satisfactory or even plausible reason has been suggested to me why that procedure is not available to the present plaintiffs in the circumstances of the present case. Even if that were not so, and the matter be purely one for the discretion of the court, it appears to me that the present defendants have broken no contract, they have committed no tort; it is not a case of conflicting claims to real or personal property, there is no dispute as to the rights or obligations of the respective parties under a will or other instrument the true construction whereof requires to be done by the court, or anything of that kind. Now, speaking generally, in a simple case not within section 32 of the Act of 1883 the mere fact that A. is supposed to contemplate bringing an action against B., or that A. may have stated that he had grounds for such an action does not, in my opinion, entitle B. to institute an action against A. to have it declared that A. has not a good cause of action against B. I think that is so, whether the result depends merely upon questions of law or upon facts as to which there would or might be a conflict of evidence with a protracted trial.

No doubt delay may in certain cases furnish a good ground for defence, but ordinarily an intending plaintiff may postpone his action as long as he pleases, at the risk of finding himself barred by some Statute of Limitations, and he may choose his own time for commencing proceedings. He is entitled to wait until he has collected the necessary evidence or has made such inquiries as he thinks fit, or has obtained the requisite funds or what not. Generally notice by A. to B. of an intended suit does not give B. a cause of action against A. To give such a notice is ordinarily a right and proper thing to do. Indeed, in some cases, previous notice is required by statute as a condition of suit. Section 32 of the Patents, &c., Act of 1883 being out of the way, I think that at the risk of defeat and costs the Leeds Forge Co. is legally and morally entitled if and when it pleases to bring at least an action against the North-Eastern Marine Engineering Co. for alleged infringement of this patent. If I have any discretion I decline to exercise it in favour of the present plaintiffs, notwithstanding their ingenuity in devising this novel form of action, which in my opinion is misconceived; and pursuant to the provisions of ord. 25, r. 4, I order this action to be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, J. H. & J. Y. Johnson, for Carter, Ramsden, & Carter, Leeds; Vincent & Vincent, for Day & Yewdall, Leeds.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) March 8.

MADDEN v. RHODES. (a.)

Trade union law—Wilfully withhold—Criminal mind—Branch union—Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), s. 12.

Section 12 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, provides: "If any officer, member, or other person being or representing himself to be a member of a trade union, registered under this Act . . . by false representation or imposition obtain possession of any moneys, securities, books, papers, or other effects of such trades union, or having the same in his possession, wilfully withhold or fraudulently misapply the same, or wilfully apply any part of the same to purposes other than those expressed or directed in the rules of such trade union, or any part thereof, the court of summary jurisdiction for the place in which the registered office of the trade union is situate, upon a complaint made by any person on behalf of such trade union may, by summary order, order such officer . . . Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the said trade union . . . from proceeding by indictment against such party. . . ."

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that no order can be made under this section against any of the persons therein named for "wilfully withholding" unless it be proved that there was fraud or criminality in the wilfully withholding.

Barrett v. Markham, L. R. 7 C. P. 405, followed.

Case stated by one of the Metropolitan police magistrates.

A summons was issued under section 12 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, by the appellant on behalf of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses, a society registered as a trade union under the said Act, against the respondents as trustees of the West-end branch of the said trade union, complaining that they being officers of the said trade union having in their possession certain moneys, securities, books, papers, and other effects of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses wilfully withhold the same. A copy of the existing rules of the society was exhibited with the case. A general committee of management of the society, termed an executive council, is elected by the conference of delegates of branches which meets periodically. Each branch of the society is "to appoint its own officers and conduct its own business in accordance with rules."

A dispute having arisen between the said executive council and the said West-end branch in respect of the duties and appointment of an officer (not mentioned in the rules) referred to as the out-collector of the West-end branch, the conference of the 10th of August, 1904, resolved "That it be an instruction from the conference that in future the out-collector of the West-end branch must make members and take contributions for all branches of the West-end district and such other branches as the executive council may direct, but no collector can be appointed without the consent of the executive council."

On the 28th of April, 1905, the executive council, reciting the continued refusal of the West-end branch to perform the duty imposed upon it by the above resolution, demanded "the resignation of the branch officers and committee and the appointment of loyal members of our amalgamation," and further authorized the appellant with another trustee to proceed to the West-end branch and "to compel the trustees of that branch to deliver up all moneys, books, vouchers, documents, and all property of whatever description held by them in trust for the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses."

The West-end branch replied with the following unanimous resolution: "This meeting of members of the West-end branch of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses, having considered the present situation in all its bearings, are satisfied that the branch officials have done nothing to justify the action of the executive council, and hereby demand the withdrawal of all adverse resolutions against the branch, and the acknowledgment of Mr. Willis's position as collector, failing which we authorize the the officers and committee to withdraw the branch from the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses, and pledge ourselves to support such action in any and every possible manner."

It was admitted that there was no fraud or criminality.

The magistrate dismissed the summons and stated this case.

Montague Shearman, K.C. (Edward Brown with him), for the appellants.—Unless there is a remedy under section 12 the trade union would have no remedy at all; its civil remedy in respect of disputes amongst the members inter se is taken away by section 4, and section 9 (which must be read with section 4) giving the right to sue or be sued by trustees only applies to actions by or against strangers. It is true that the first limb of section 12 speaks of "by false representation or imposition obtain possession . . ." but it is submitted that "wilfully withhold" is a fresh limb. [DARLING, J., referred to Knight v. Whitmere, 33 W. R. 907.] The magistrate decided against the appellant on the authority of Barrett v. Markham, L. R. 7, C. P. 405. That was a decision under section 24 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, a somewhat similar section to section 12, and it was there held that some fraud or misrepresentation must be shown. It is necessary for me to distinguish that case, and it can be distinguished. The words of the sections are not identical, it must be noted, as section 12 includes the word "wilful." Moreover, the Act of 1855 does not contain a section corresponding to section 4 of the Trade Union Act, which in certain disputes takes away civil remedy. In the Act of 1855 section 22 provided a civil remedy for the cases in question to which Wills, J., refers. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L C.J.—That was not the principle of the decision.] Finally, the magistrate there held as a fact that the inability to pay by the treasurer was not a withholding or misapplying under section 24 of the 1855 Act.

Hermann Cohen, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the magistrate has come to a right conclusion. If Barrett v. Markham is to be taken as an authority on this statute it is distinctly in point. The decision of Willes, J., in respect to an analogous section—viz., section 24 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1855—was that there could only be a prosecution in respect of a quasi-criminal case. The principle of that authority seems to me to rest on two grounds—(1) that there was an alternative civil remedy; (2) that the withholding must be "under circumstances imputing misconduct," which was the language used by Willes, J., one of the greatest judges. If Mr. Shearman could have distinguished that Act we should have been obliged to say that that case was not an authority binding upon us. He admits that the language of the sections is so very much alike that the principle seems to be the same; but he suggests that the alternative civil remedy given by the 1855 Act is not given by the Act of 1871. In my opinion section 9 of the 1871 Act goes quite as far as section 22 of the 1855 Act in respect to a civil remedy, and when it is said that that is taken away by section 4 I cannot agree with that contention. Section 4 has been considered more than once recently, and I think it will be found in general that the section is applicable to disputes between members of a trade union, and not between trades unions or between the branch of a trade union and the trade union. The section does not point to a dispute of this kind.

This was a claim against four trustees of a branch union and in my opinion it came directly within the remedy contemplated by section 9. I think the appeal fails, and, in my judgment, on the authority of the previous case.

RIDLEY and DARLING, JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for applicant, Pattinson & Brewer.

Solicitors for respondent, Andrews & Andrews.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Feb. 21.

CLACK v. CLACK. (a.)

Practice—County court—Right to reply.

If the defendant calls evidence to support his defence, the plaintiff by his counsel or solicitor has the right to reply in the county court, following the practice observed in the High Court.

This was an appeal from the County Court of Oxford, holden at Witney.

At the trial, after the close of the plaintiff's case, witnesses were called to support the defendant's case.

Upon the conclusion of the defendant's case, counsel for the plaintiff rose to reply, when the county court judge stated that there was no absolute right to reply, and he should not allow it in this case.

The solicitor appearing for the defendant supported the objection.

The jury having found a verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff applied to the county court judge for a new trial on the grounds—(1) Counsel had been denied his right to reply; (2) verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The county court judge refused the application on the first ground, but did not deal with the second.

The plaintiff now appealed.

Ames, for the appellant.—There is no statute which gives the right to reply in a county court after the defendant has put in evidence. The practice in the High Court is governed by ord. 36, r. 36, which is based on section 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and practically repeats the concluding words of that section—viz., "and the right to reply shall be as heretofore." This throws one back on the common law. Prior to 1854 the practice was universally observed that the plaintiff had the right to reply when the defendant had put in evidence: vide Tidd's Practice (9th ed.) and Chitty's Practice, 1842. There is nothing in the County Courts Acts to take away the right to reply given by common law. Section 164 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides (inter alia): "In any case not expressly provided for the general principles of practice in the High Court of Justice may be adopted and applied to actions and matters." In Dymock v. Watkins, 31 W. R. 331, 10 Q. B. D. 451, the Divisional Court refused to interfere, but there it was the defendant's counsel who claimed the right to sum up, and it was expressly held that at common law the right did not exist.

Turrell, for the respondent.—Section 164 of the County Courts Act, 1888, is not imperative, the words being "may be adopted." The rules of practice observed in the High Court need not necessarily be followed in the county court, as the decision in Dymock v. Watkins clearly shows. The court would not grant a new trial merely on the ground now put forward. The courts would never interfere where the appellant attempted to show that the court below had not rightly decided the question which party had the right to begin: Booth v. Millnes, 15 M. & W. 669. These cases are directly in point, as the right to reply depends upon the exercise of the right to begin.

Ames in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that this case requires further consideration by the learned county court judge; at present he has not dealt with the matter from a satisfactory point of view. I doubt, for reasons I shall give later, whether we can order a new trial in this case. The application for a new trial must be made to the county court judge. This is an appeal from his refusal to grant it. He has not considered on a proper basis what he ought to do after the argument of Mr. Ames on the application. In my judgment it would be better first to state what is the law with regard to this matter. It seems to me that section 72 of the County Courts Act, 1888, recognized the right of counsel to address the county court judge on behalf of his clients. I agree that there is no statute which gives the right to reply either in the superior courts or in the county courts. In the superior courts it originally depended upon section 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act, but now depends on ord. 36, r. 36, which is based on section 18, and has words also found in section 18, "The right to reply shall be as heretofore."

In the superior courts the right to reply depends upon a long-established custom that where the defendant calls evidence the counsel for the plaintiff has the right to reply. There have been a number of decisions to which it is not necessary to refer, but in which there has been a considerable amount of discussion whether the defendant has done enough to give the right to reply, as where he had referred to particulars of demand to prove the credit. Pollock, B., held, after consultation, that evidence having been given there was a right to reply. I need scarcely point out that this discussion could not have taken place if there had not been recognized a right to reply where the defendant had put in evidence. In the county courts to a very large extent the practice of the Supreme Court has been followed, and though it does not carry the matter far, yet section 164 of the County Courts Act, 1888, cannot be overlooked, which enacts that the practice should be assimilated to the practice of the Supreme Court where not otherwise expressly provided. But I think there must be some discretion in the conduct of this matter to be exercised by county court judges as by other judges. I can conceive that in the way cases are there tried it may be a necessity that the county court judges have a large discretion in regulating the practice, but they must exercise it consistently with old principles. One of those principles, the right to reply, depends upon the defendant having given evidence. I call attention to the book which Darling, J., has brought to my notice, Best's Treatise on the Right to Begin. Chapter 3 deals with the matter upon principles I have attempted to summarize, and cites a number of cases for the authority. The passage is: "It is universally admitted in every-day practice that where a party calls evidence or puts in evidence . . . the counsel who began has the right to reply." There are a large number of authorities cited for that, ending with the year 1832, the book having been written in the year 1837. That is an authoritative statement by a learned man for this rule, and I see no reason why it should not be followed in county courts, subject to a reasonable discretion to judges to point out that speeches need not be too long and subject to their endeavour to keep the matter to a reasonable length. Speaking for myself I think counsel has a right to reply in county courts in cases where the defendant has put in evidence. But should we in consequence order a new trial. There arises the difficulty which makes one think the application should be further considered. I think the right to begin is a guide as to what we ought to do, not only on the ground that the right to begin carries with it the right to reply. It is a kindred subject; it is a question of procedure. It appears from a number of cases (Hickman v. Ferine, 3 M. & W. 517, Branford v. Freeman, 20 L. J. Ex. 36, and also the the later case in Booth v. Millnes, 15 M. & W.) that where there has been an error in the way in which the case had been conducted in the court below, and in a matter which involves the same considerations—namely, on whom the onus of proof lies, the courts would not order a new trial unless of opinion that the decision of the judge "did clear and manifest wrong," that is, if the judge was of opinion that no injustice had been done, no new trial would be ordered. In this case, although Mr. Ames did not obtain the privilege of exercising his right, he tells us that the judge summed up in favour of the plaintiff. Still, if the county court judge arrives at the conclusion that the course he took led to a denial of justice he should grant a new trial. I am entitled to say further that in considering this matter the learned county court judge ought to regard our ruling that under ordinary circumstances there is a right to reply in the county court. The case ought to go back to the county court judge to further hear the application for a new trial.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree.

DARLING, J.—I should like to say this: It appears that objection was taken in the county court by the solicitor for the defendant, who asked the judge to say that there was no right to reply in the county court. I dare say that there is among solicitors some such impression which the judgment of my lord is sufficient to show is a false impression. It arose at a time when the county court dealt only with small debts, but people who practice now in county courts must remember that a large jurisdiction has been conferred, and the county courts now try cases as important as many cases tried in this court, and which were commonly tried at assizes. Therefore they should be careful to observe the rules which have long been laid down, and which, although they might have been neglected without harm when the courts were for small debts, would now lead to injustice where cases involving difficult points of law are now under their jurisdiction.

Re-hearing of the application for a new trial ordered.

Solicitors for appellant, Eldridge & Newnham.

Solicitor for respondent, Hatt, Oxford.

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) — Dec. 5, 6, 21.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. GLOSSOP. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Property passing on death—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 5, sub-section 3; s. 21, sub-section 5—Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), ss. 14, 15, sub-section 1.

Certain property described as the husband's fortune, and other property described as the wife's fortune, were settled upon trust (subject to certain life interests) to sell and invest and pay out of the income during the joint lives of husband and wife an annuity of £400 to the wife, and the residue of the income during the life of the wife to the husband; and after the death of the wife, if the husband survived, to pay the whole income to the husband for life; and after the death of the husband to pay the whole income to the wife for life, and after the death of the survivor upon certain trusts for children; and failing children, that the trustees should, after the death of the husband and wife, stand possessed of the husband's fortune in trust for his executors, &c., and should stand possessed of the wife's fortune, if the wife should survive the husband, for her executors, &c. There was no issue of the marriage, and the wife survived her husband. The question was whether estate duty was payable on the wife's fortune.

Held, following Attorney-General v. Penrhyn, 83 L. T. 103, that the case was not within the saving clause in section 15, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1896, and, following Attorney-General v. Strange, 46 W. R. 663, [1898] 2 Q. B. 39, not within section 21, sub-section 5, of the Finance Act, 1894, but that, following Attorney-General v. Wood, 45 W. R. 663, [1897] 2 Q. B 102, the case was within the meaning of section 5, sub-section 3, of the Finance Act, 1894, and that so much therefore of the wife's fortune as formed part of the capital which produced the income of £400 a year must not be deemed to have passed on the husband's death. Estate duty was therefore payable on the wife's fortune, except as to so much as her share of the capitalized value of the fund which produced the income of £400 a year.

Information filed by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown.

By an indenture dated the 18th of November, 1873, and made between Samuel Francis Bythesea of the first part, Mary Prideaux Michell, spinster, of the second part, and certain trustees (who were represented by the defendants in the action, and were thereinafter referred to as the trustees) of the third part, being a settlement made in consideration of a marriage then agreed upon and shortly afterwards solemnized between Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea and Mary Prideaux Michell, it was recited that certain hereditaments, the property of the said Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea, thereinafter referred to as the "husband's fortune," had become vested in the trustees upon trust for sale and to stand possessed of the sale moneys upon the trusts of the said indenture.

It was further recited that certain hereditaments, the property of Mary Prideaux Michell, had become vested in the trustees, but subject to the life estate of her mother Jenny Eleanor Michell therein upon trust after solemnization of the marriage to sell the same and to stand possessed of the sale money upon the trusts of the said indenture, and that certain sums of money being property of the said Mary Prideaux Michell had also became vested in the trustees. It was also recited that the said Mary Prideaux Michell had before the date of the said indenture transferred to the trustees certain stock (being property of Mary Prideaux Michell), and that Mary Prideaux Michell was by virtue of several assurances entitled to the securities and property, but subject as to certain parts thereof to the life interest of Jenny Eleanor Michell. It was also recited that the moneys to be produced by the sale of the hereditaments, securities, and property were thereinafter referred to as the wife's fortune, and that the husband's fortune and the wife's fortune should after the said marriage be held by the trustees on the trusts thereinafter declared.

The indenture witnessed that in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the said marriage. Mary Prideaux Michell, with the consent of Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea, assigned to the trustees certain property, including that known as the wife's fortune, to hold the same to the trustees their executors, &c., but subject as to part thereof to the life estate of Jenny Eleanor Michell, and as to one-tenth part of the same of stock and premises subject also to the life interest of the said Eleanor Michell Clark, upon the trusts thereinafter declared, and it was thereinafter agreed and declared that the trustees after the said marriage stand possessed of the husband's fortune and wife's fortune upon trust to invest the same as therein mentioned, out of the income arising therefrom to pay during the joint lives of Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea and Mary Prideaux Michell an annuity of £400 to Mary Prideaux Michell for her separate use without power of anticipation, and subject thereto to pay the residue of the income, and after the decease of Mary Prideaux Michell to pay the whole income to Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea during his life, and after his decease to pay the whole income to Mary Prideaux Michell during her life. And it was thereby agreed and declared that after the decease of the survivor the trustees should stand possessed of the trust property for such of the children and issue as Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea and Mary Prideaux Michell should by deed jointly, or the survivor should by deed or will appoint, and that failing issue then the trustees, after the death of Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea and Mary Prideaux Mitchell, should stand possessed of the husband's fortune in trust for Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea, his executors, &c., and should stand possessed of the wife's fortune and of the securities upon which the same might be invested, or of so much thereof as should not have been vested or been applied as aforesaid, upon trust if Mary Prideaux Michell should survive Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea, her executors, administrators, and assigns, but if Mary Prideaux Michell should die in the lifetime of Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea then in trust for such person as she should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for the persons who at the time of the failure of the trusts declared would be entitled under the statutes of distribution in case Mary Prideaux Michell had died intestate and without having been married.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 3rd of May, 1904, Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea died. There was no issue of the marriage. His will was proved in the Principal Registry by the executors, Mary Prideaux Bythesea, Augustus Bythesea Todd, and George Henry Pownall Glossop. Estate duty was paid at 5½ per cent. on £93,477 14s. 5d., including the sum of £5,710 3s. the value of the property settled by Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea by the indenture of the 18th of November. 1873, but not including any part of the property in the settlement called the wife's fortune. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that under these circumstances estate duty, under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1904, became payable on the death of Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea in respect of the principal value of the property settled by Mary Prideaux Bythesea, and referred to in the settlement as the "wife's fortune." They accordingly applied to the defendants for payment of the duty, but the defendants refused to pay the same and contended that no such duty was payable.

The informant concluded by praying that it might be declared that upon the death of Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea estate duty became payable under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value to be ascertained as provided in the Act of 1894 of all the property therein settled by Mary Prideaux Bythesea by the indenture of the 18th of November, 1873, therein called the wife's fortune (with the exception before mentioned) as property passing on the death of Samuel Francis Glossop Bythesea within the meaning of the Act, and that an account might, if necessary, be directed to ascertain the amount of the estate duty and interest thereon payable in respect of such property, and that the defendants might be ordered to pay the amount of the said duty and interest to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

By the Finance Act, 1896, s. 15, sub-section 1: "Where by a disposition of any property an interest conferred on any person other than the disponer for the life of such person or determinable on his death, and such person enters into possession and thenceforward retains possession thereof to the entire exclusion of the disponer or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise, and that the only benefit which the disponer retains in the said property is subject to such life or determinable interest, and no other interest is created by the said disposition, then on the death of such person after the commencement of this part of the Act the property shall not be deemed for the purpose of the principal Act to pass by reason only of its reverter to the disponer in his lifetime."

By the Finance Act, 1894, s. 21, sub-section 5: "Where a husband or wife is entitled either solely or jointly with the settlor to the income of any property settled by the other under a disposition which has taken effect before the commencement of this part of the Act, and on his or her death the survivor becomes entitled to the income of the property settled by such survivor, estate duty shall not be payable in respect of that property until the death of the survivor."

By section 5, sub-section 3: "In the case of settled property where the interest of any person under the settlement fails or determines by reason of his death before it becomes an interest in possession, and subsequent limiationt, under the settlement continue to subsist, the property shall not be deemed to pass on his death."

By section 14: "When property is settled on a person on himself for life, and after his death on any other persons with an ultimate reversion of an absolute interest or absolute power of disposition to the settlor the property shall not be deemed for the purpose of the principal Act to pass to the settlor on the death of any such person after the commencement of this part of this Act by reason only that the settlor being then in possession of the property as tenant for life, becomes, in consequence of such death, entitled to the immediate reversion or acquires an absolute power to dispose of the whole property."

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the defendants.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

WALTON, J., having set out the facts as above, continued: It is not disputed that the wife's fortune passed on the death of the husband, and estate duty is payable in respect of it unless the case can be brought within one or or other of the saving enactments relied on by the defendants. It can scarcely be said that section 15 (1) of the Finance Act, 1896, was relied on by the defendants, because it cannot be doubted that if I am bound by the decision of the Divisional Court in Attorney-General v. Penryn, 83 L. T. 103, the present case is within it. Section 15 (1) of the Act of 1896 is as follows: "Where by a disposition of any property an interest is conferred on any person other than the disponer for the life of such person or determinable on his death, and such person enters into possession of the interest and thenceforward retains possession thereof to the entire exclusion of the disponer or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise, and the only benefit which the disponer retains in the said property is subject to such life or determinable interest, and no other interest is created by the said disposition, then, on the death of such person after the commencement of this part of the Act, the property shall not be deemed for the purpose of the principal Act to pass by reason only of its reverter to the disponer in his lifetime." But if I am bound by that case section 15 (1) affords no defence to the claim of the Crown. It is open to the defendants to contend in the Court of Appeal that the judgment in that case was wrong, but I think that I am bound by it. The next enactment which I have to consider is section 21 (5) of the Finance Act, 1894. As applied to the facts of the present case, the sub-section may be read as follows: "Where the husband is entitled to the income of property settled by his wife and on his death the wife becomes entitled to the income of the property settled by her, estate duty shall not be payable in respect of that property until the death of the wife." The husband in the present case died, and there were no children. Under these circumstances, what did the survivor, the wife, become entitled to? Following the form of the settlement, the trustees on the death of the husband stood possessed of the property settled by the wife—that is, the "wife's fortune," and also of the "husband's fortune"—to pay the income of the husband's fortune and the wife's fortune to the wife during her life, and upon her death, as to the husband's fortune, for the husband, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and as to the wife's fortune for the executors, administrators, and assigns of the wife. It is only as to the wife's fortune that any question arises in this case. On the death of the husband the trustees stood possessed of the wife's fortune in trust to pay the income to the wife during her life and after her death for her executors, administrators, and assigns. If it is permissible to consider the wife's fortune separately from the husband's fortune, it seems to me that on the husband's death the wife became entitled absolutely not only to the income, but also to the corpus of the part described as the wife's fortune. And I see no reason why the wife's fortune should not be dealt with separately. It seems to me that the present case is governed by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Attorney-General v. Strange, 46 W. R. 663, [1898] 2 Q. B. 39. I think that on the death of the husband the wife was entitled to say to the trustees, "I am entitled to the property described as the wife's fortune; give it to me." In the words of Lord Lindley in The Attorney-General v. Strange: "They obviously have no choice in the matter. If she were to bring an action against them to compel them to transfer the funds they would clearly have to pay the costs." If this be so and she became entitled on the death of her husband not merely to the income but also to the corpus of the property, then, following Attorney-General v. Strange, I must hold that the present case is not within section 21 (5). The next section relied upon by the defendants is section 5 (3) of the Finance Act, 1894. It is in these words: "In the case of settled property, where the interest of any person under the settlement fails or determines by reason of his death before it becomes an interest in possession, and subsequent limitations under the settlement continue to subsist, the property shall not be deemed to pass on his death." It is said that this section applies, not to the whole of the wife's fortune, but to the capitalized value of the annuity of £400 a year. It is said that the husband had an interest in this property, as he would have been entitled under the settlement to the income of it—that is, to £400 a year—during his life if he had survived his wife; that this interest failed by reason of his death before it became an interest in possession, and the subsequent limitations to the wife continued to subsist. I think that the husband had an interest under the settlement, which failed by reason of his death before it became an interest in possession. But it is necessary to consider what interest he had which failed. What would he have been entitled to if he had survived his wife? The corpus out of which the £400 a year was payable was made up in part of the husband's fortune and in part of the wife's fortune. As I have already held, the husband's fortune may be considered separately from the wife's fortune. As to so much of this corpus producing £400 a year as was part of the husband's fortune, the trustees on the death of the wife would, if the husband had survived her, have held it on trust for the husband for life, and on his death for his executors, administrators, and assigns. In other words, as I have held with regard to the "wife's fortune," the husband on the death of the wife would have been entitled to this part of the corpus absolutely. It appears to me that his interest in this part of the corpus producing the £400 a year did not fail on his death. On the wife's death it would still belong to him, his executors, administrators, and assigns. But as to so much of the corpus producing the £600 a year as was part of the "wife's fortune" the case is different. If he had survived his wife he would have been entitled to a life interest in this, and this interest failed on his death before it became an interest in possession. The question remains whether as to this any subsequent limitations continued to subsist after the death of the husband. I have already held in effect that upon the death of the husband the wife became entitled to this property absolutely. But it appears to me that if this be so it has been decided in Attorney-General v. Wood, 45 W. R. 663, [1897] 2 Q. B. 102, that in such a case a limitation under the settlement does continue to subsist within the meaning of section 5 (3). In my judgment, therefore, so much of the "wife's fortune" as formed part of the capital which produced the income of £400 a year must not be deemed to have passed on the husband's death. In order to arrive at the amount an apportionment will be necessary. There will probably be no difficulty in making the apportionment. I think it can be made, and if any difficulty arises with regard to it I must deal with it. For this purpose there must be liberty to apply. The Attorney-General contended that the judgment of the House of Lords in Earl Cowley v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 47 W. R. 525, [1899] A. C. 198, afforded an answer to the contention of the defendants upon section 5 (3). It is quite clear that this section was not referred to in the arguments or judgments in Lord Cowley's case. And I think it had no application to the facts in that case. Lord Cowley's case shows that if section 5 (3) did not apply to the facts of this case no deduction could be made in considering what property passed on the death of the husband in respect of the annuity of £400 a year payable to the wife during the lifetime of the husband. Lord Cowley's case is not an authority upon the construction of section 5 (3). It is scarcely necessary to consider the other enactment which was relied upon by the defendants. This was section 14 of the Finance Act, 1896. This section admittedly can apply only to so much of the "wife's fortune" as formed part of the corpus which produced the income of £400 a year. And it seems to me to apply only where the property in question is settled on the settlor for life. In the present case the property in question was not settled by the wife on herself for life. It was settled upon herself for the joint lives of herself and her husband. But, however this may be, if the defendants are right under section 5 (3) of the Act of 1894, it is unnecessary for them to rely on section 14 of the Act of 1896. The result of my judgment is that the Crown is entitled to succeed except as to so much of the "wife's fortune" as is her share of the capitalized value of the fund which produced the income of £400 a year. Each party must pay its own costs.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for defendants, Young, Jones, & Co.

K. B. Div. (Bray, J.) Nov. 6; Dec. 21.

WILLIAMS v. GABRIEL AND OTHERS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Sale of the reversion—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Liability of lessor.

A lease contained the following covenant for quiet enjoyment: "And the lessor for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns doth hereby covenant with the lessee that the lessee . . . shall and may peaceably enjoy the demised premises during the said term without any interruption or disturbance by the lessor or any person claiming under him." A breach of this covenant was committed by the assignee of the reversioner.

Held, that the lessor was not liable for wrongful or negligent acts committed by an assignee of the reversioner whom he has not expressly or impliedly authorized to do the acts.

Action tried by Bray, J.

The facts and arguments are fully set out in the considered judgment of the learned judge.

Morle, for the plaintiff.

English Harrison, K.C., and J. T. Tanner, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

BRAY, J., read the following judgment: In this action the plaintiff sued the defendants as the representatives of Arnold Gabriel, deceased, for damages for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The statement of claim contained an alternative claim for trespass, nuisance, and negligence, but at the trial the plaintiff rested his case, as he was bound to do, on breach of covenant. The facts were as follows: On the 19th of October, 1886, Arnold Gabriel demised to the plaintiff a shop and a kitchen on the ground floor of a building known as Aberdeen-buildings, in Emmett-street, Limehouse, and four rooms on the first floor above the shop and kitchen, and portion of a yard adjoining the premises, to be occupied for the purpose of a coffee-house. The lease was for twenty-one years determinable by the lessee at the end of the seventh or fourteenth years, and the rent was £40. The only material covenant by the lessor was the covenant for quiet enjoyment, which was in these terms: "And the lessor for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns doth hereby covenant with the lessee that the lessee paying the rent hereinbefore reserved and performing and observing the covenants on his part hereinbefore contained shall and may peaceably enjoy the demised premises during the said term without any interruption or disturbance by the lessor or any person claiming under him." Aberdeen-buildings was a block of buildings recently built, intended to be let out in flats or tenements, and there were several floors above the premises demised to the plaintiff. About the year 1891 Gabriel assigned his reversion in the whole of the buildings to Jackson. There was no evidence that at this time the buildings were out of repair. Some considerable time before 1904 the buildings other than those occupied by the plaintiff got very much out of repair; all the tenants other than the plaintiff left, and the plaintiff's rooms became injured by wet. In 1904 Aberdeen-buildings got so dilapidated that proceedings were taken against the owners by the London County Council under the London Building Act, which resulted in the order of the 25th of March, 1904, by which the owners of Aberdeen-buildings were ordered to take down the structure on the ground that it was so far dilapidated as to have become and be unfit for use or occupation. At this time the reversion was vested in Messrs. Attenborough as mortgagees, a Mr. Hargreave being the mortgagor. On the 4th of July these gentlemen commenced to pull down the buildings, after a time completely exposing a part of the plaintiff's premises, and the plaintiff was forced by these operations to leave in May, 1905. The plaintiff alleged that this was an interruption of his quiet enjoyment for which the representatives of the original lessor were liable. There was no doubt that the plaintiff had suffered considerable damage, but the defendants denied liability in toto.

I have now to construe the covenant for quiet enjoyment. This form of covenant has been under the consideration of the courts in several cases, and has received judicial interpretation from several judges. The most important of these cases is Harrison, Ainslie, & Co. v. Muncaster, 40 W. R. 102, [1891] 2 Q. B. 680. In that case the defendants had let a mine to the plaintiffs with a covenant for quiet enjoyment, and subsequently let the adjoining mine to a tenant who, in the course of ordinary and proper working of the mine, struck a feeder, with the result that a large body of water flooded that mine and the plaintiffs' mine, and the plaintiffs claimed that the quiet enjoyment of their mine had been interrupted, and that the defendant, their lessor, was responsible. The first question that arose was whether there had been an interruption, and Lord Esher says: "The case of Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-on-Tweed, 33 W. R. 67, (1884) 13 Q. B. D. 547, is a clear authority that the interruption contemplated by the covenant need not necessarily be an interference with the title, but may extend to an interference with the enjoyment; and that decision, interpreted in that way, was, in my opinion, authorized by the case of Shaw v. Stenton, (1858) 2 H. & N. 858." He then proceeded to hold that on the facts of the case there had been an interruption. In my opinion I must hold that there has been an interruption here, and, indeed, this point was not seriously contested; but the interruption was by Messrs. Attenborough, the assignees of the reversion. I have to consider whether it was an interruption by any person claiming under the lessor. The word "lawfully" is not in the covenant, but I do not think its omission is of any importance. The words "any person claiming under the lessor" were interpreted by Lord Esher to mean a person claiming under him (i.e., the lessor) the right to do the acts which caused the interruption. The other Lords Justices do not use the same words, but I see nothing in their judgment to shew that they differed from Lord Esher. It may perhaps only be a dictum, as the Court of Appeal held that the defendants were not liable on grounds that do not apply here; but whether this be so or not, or whether I am bound by this decision or not, Lord Esher's interpretation is, in my opinion, the correct one. If it were not so the lessor would be liable for all interruptions by any persons claiming title through him, whether assignee or under tenant, and however wilful or negligent the interruption was. There must be some limit, and I think the limit suggested by Lord Esher is the right one. It comes to this, that the lessor agrees to be bound for any act of interruption by himself or by any person whom he has expressly or impliedly authorized to do the acts. If the lessor part with the property or adjoining property to a person, and that person is in a position to rightfully claim under his title from the lessor, that he is authorized to do these acts, the lessor will be responsible. This is reasonable, and what the parties might well have contemplated, because the lessor has really authorized the acts to be done; but to hold that the parties contemplated that the lessor was to be responsible for wrongful or negligent acts which he had not authorized would, in my judgment, be beyond reason. I was referred to a number of other authorities, and I must notice some of them: In Davies v. Town Property Investment Corporation, 51 W. R. 42, [1902] 2 Ch. 635, Byrne, J., cites and agrees with and acts upon Lord Esher's construction of the covenant. In Jenkins v. Jackson, 37 W. R. 253, (1888) 40 Ch. D. 71, Kekewich, J., holds the landlord liable for noise and vibration caused by dancing, on the ground that the landlord had authorized his tenant to use the room for dancing after he had repeated notice that the dancing caused a nuisance. That would be right on Lord Esher's definition. In Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-upon-Tweed Fry, L.J., giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal, held a lessor responsible because his tenant had in the proper and contemplated use of certain drains damaged the plaintiff, but refused to hold the lessor responsible for the excessive user of those drains. There is nothing in the judgments in Anderson v. Oppenheimer, (1880) 5 Q. B. 602, 29 W. R. Dig. 112, to the contrary. The lessor had put up the cistern, and if it had been improperly constructed it would be right that he should be responsible. In Shaw v. Stenton the excavation which caused the damage had been done by the defendant himself. If Lord Esher's construction be the right one, as I think it is, I have no difficulty in holding on the facts here that Messrs. Attenborough could not claim under the lessor, Arnold Gabriel, the right to do the acts complained of, and, therefore, that his representatives were not liable for what Messrs Attenborough did. There must be judgment for the defendants with costs, including costs of and occasioned by the adjournment.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment for defendants.

Solicitor for plaintiff, Joseph Sykes.

Solicitor for defendants, W. W. Wynne & Sons.

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) — Dec. 8.

JOHN HALL, JUN. v. RICKMAN. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Depreciation by reason of wear and tear—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 35), s. 12.

The appellants, a firm of shipowners, were the owners of a fleet of vessels, whose average age during the years of assessment was thirty-one years, also of a wooden hulk forty years old used by them in a coal-bunkering business. Prior to the first year of assessment the appellants had been allowed from their gross profits deductions by reason of wear and tear of sums amounting in all to 96 per cent. of the prime value, including sums expended on them by way of additions and repairs, other than ordinary repairs. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue found as a fact that the breaking-up value of the ship was considerably more than 4 per cent. of the prime cost, together with the repairs and additions referred to, and refused to allow any further sum for depreciation in respect of the ships under section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, or in respect of the hulk, on the ground that it was not "plant" within the meaning of the section.

Held, that the commissioners were not entitled to take the depreciation allowed in previous years, and that they were bound under section 12 to make a just and reasonable allowance in respect of the diminution in value by reason of wear and tear during the years of assessment.

Held, also, that the hulk was "plant" within the meaning of section 12.

Case stated by Commissioners of Income Tax.

The appellants, a firm of shipowners, were the owners of a fleet of vessels whose average age during the years of assessment was thirty-one years, also of a wooden hulk forty years old used by them in a coal-bunkering business.

The question which came before the commissioners for consideration was what was a fair and reasonable allowance to be made from the assessment as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the years of assessment of the ships and hulk comprised in the appellants' fleet.

It was admitted that prior to the first year of assessment the appellants' firm had been allowed from their gross profits assessed to Schedule D an amount by way of deduction for diminished value by reason of wear and tear in respect of their vessels, other than one called The Peninsula, sums amounting in the aggregate to not less than 96 per cent. on their first or prime cost, including such sums as had been expended upon them by way of addition or repair other than ordinary annual repairs; the latter had been allowed from time to time as an expense chargeable against repairs.

The commissioners found as a fact that these allowances had been made, and also that the breaking-up value of the ships in 1901 was considerably more than 4 per cent. of the first or prime cost together with the additions and repairs referred to. The hulk was formerly a sailing ship, but it had been dismantled and its rudder removed, and it was used as a floating warehouse for coal at Gibraltar; it was found as a fact that the total of the amounts allowed to the appellants in previous years in respect of her exceeded 100 per cent. of the first or prime cost together with expenditure by way of addition or repairs other than ordinary annual repairs.

The claimants claimed to be allowed in respect of all ships and of the hulk such amount as fairly represented the diminished value by reason of the wear and tear during the year of assessment of each of the ships and of the hulk, and contended that for the purpose of ascertaining the diminished value regard should be had only to the value at the year in question, and that no regard should be had to the allowances made in previous years, and they referred to the terms of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878.

The respondent contended that as the appellants had received in the previous years an allowance for the diminution in value by reason of wear and tear of 96 per cent. of the prime cost (together with additions and repairs) and as the breaking-up value of the ships was more than 4 per cent of their prime cost, the appellants were not entitled to any further allowance in respect of them. He further contended, on the same ground, that no allowance could properly be made in respect of the hulk, and also on the further ground that the hulk was a floating warehouse and was not plant nor machinery within the meaning of section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The commissioners came to the conclusion that the allowance already made and received by the appellants was a sum which was just and reasonable as sufficiently representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the years of assessment, and they were further of opinion that no allowance could be made in respect of the hulk on the ground that it was a floating warehouse and was not plant or machinery within the meaning of the section.

By section 12 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any Act relating to income tax, the commissioners for general or special purposes shall, in assessing the profits and gains of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade chargeable under Schedule D, or the profits of any concern chargeable by reference to the rules of that schedule, allow such deduction as they may think just and reasonable as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year of any machinery or plant used for the purposes of this concern, and belonging to the person or company by whom it is carried on.

Asquith, K.C. (Maurice Hill with him), for the appellants.

Sir E. H. Carson, S.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the respondent.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

WALTON, J., after reading the sections and stating the contentions above set forth, continued: The contention of the commissioners seems to me not in itself unreasonable, assuming, of course, that the vessels have been the property of the same owners during the whole of the period, which seems to be the fact in the present case. But what I have to do, however, is not what would be fair and reasonable having regard to all the facts past and present; I have to give effect to the Act of Parliament. Now it is not denied that during the two years in question the value of these vessels has diminished by reason of wear and tear; that being so, I think the commissioners must consider what would be a just and reasonable allowance to make in respect of that depreciation. I do not think that they are entitled to take into account the allowances that have been made in previous years. Those allowances may have been too large or too small, but that consideration cannot affect the question as to what is a just and reasonable allowance for the years in question. I think it can make no difference that the vessels continue to be the property of and to be used by the same owners; all the commissioners have to deal with is the amount of the depreciation during the years in question, and they must consider what is a fair and reasonable allowance.

As to the hulk, I think it is clearly plant, indeed, the Solicitor-General has not argued to the contrary.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Cattarns & Co.

Solicitor for respondent, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

House of Lords.

From C.A. (England). Dec. 15.

UNDERGROUND ELECTRIC RAILWAYS CO. OF LONDON v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue — Stamp — Conveyance on sale — Ad valorem duty — Purchase-money on contingency — Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 56, 57.

A company agreed to sell its undertaking to a new company, part of the consideration being that the purchasing company should, after providing for certain payments to their own shareholders, pay to the vendors a dividend of 3 per cent. per annum upon the amount paid up on the original capital issued by the new company.

Held, that, though payable on a contingency, this was "money payable periodically" within section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Order of the Court of Appeal (53 W. R. 325, [1905] 1 K. B. 174) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of Court of Appeal (53 W. R. 325, [1905] 1 K. B. 174) (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of Channell, J. (53 W. R. 61, [1904] 2 K. B. 198).

The case is set out at length in the court of first instance, and raised the question whether stamp duty was payable under section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891, under the following circumstances.

In 1902 the Metropolitan District Electric Railways Co. (Limited) agreed to sell its undertaking to the appellants, and part of the consideration was provided for by article 3 of the agreement as follows:

"The profits of the new company (the appellants) available for dividend in respect of each year shall be applied in the following order and manner, that is to say: First, in payment of a cumulative dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum to the end of such year on the amount for the time being paid up on any shares for the time being issued by the new company, and, secondly, in paying to the Traction Co. or its assigns as a further part of the consideration for the said sale such a sum as shall be equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. for such year on the amount for the time being paid up on such of the original ordinary share capital of £5,000,000 in the new company as shall for the time being have been issued by the new company."

At the date of the agreement the whole of the ordinary share capital of £5,000,000 above referred to had been issued, and £1,300,000 had been paid thereon. Upon this sum of £1,300,000 a dividend of 3 per cent. for the year would be £39,000.

Section 56 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, provides: "Where the consideration, or any part of the consideration, for a conveyance on sale consists of money payable periodically for a definite period exceeding twenty years or in perpetuity, or for any indefinite period not terminable with life, the conveyance is to be charged in respect of that consideration with ad valorem duty on the total amount which will or may, according to the terms of sale, be payable during the period of twenty years next after the day of the date of the instrument."

The commissioners were of opinion that the annual sum payable (contingently on there being profits sufficient to provide the same) was "part of the consideration for the sale," and that, so far as such sum was capable of ascertainment at the date of the agreement, ad valorem conveyance duty at the rate of 10s.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

per cent. was chargeable in respect thereof. The commissioners were further of opinion that, as the said annual sum was payable either in perpetuity or for an indefinite period within section 56 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, duty fell to be charged upon the sum of £39,000, multiplied by twenty, making at 10s. per cent. a duty of £3,900. They accordingly assessed duty at such figure in addition to other duty on the remaining parts of the consideration as to which there was no question.

Channell, J., took a different view.

This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Roskill, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the appellants.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and Rowlatt (Sir E. Carson, S.G., with them), for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion upon this case which my noble and learned friend Lord Lindley has written. I quite concur in it, and have nothing to add.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I think the judgments in the Court of Appeal are right.

Lord LINDLEY.—When the stamp duty payable on the conveyance in this case had to be ascertained, part of the consideration for the sale was 3 per cent. of the then paid-up capital of the purchasing company. This sum was a minimum sum, and it was payable periodically for an indefinite time. The amount payable in future was liable to be increased, but not to be diminished, except in certain events, to which I now allude. One of these events, and the only one in my opinion which creates any difficulty, was the possible insufficiency of the profits of the company to pay the amount referred to after paying a dividend of £5 per cent. on the paid-up capital of the company. That dividend of 5 per cent. had to be paid out of the profits of the new company to its shareholders before any further payment became payable to the selling company. The minimum sum payable periodically was so payable subject to a contingency—viz., the existence of a sufficiency of profits to pay, first, a dividend of 5 per cent. and then a further dividend of 3 per cent. We have, therefore, an ascertained minimum amount payable periodically as part of the consideration of the sale, but payable on a contingency. Is such a sum within section 56, clause 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891? I need not read it again.

Its language is very wide. It is contended that the words "money payable periodically" in that section do not apply to money payable on a contingency, because contingent payments are dealt with by section 57. I do not myself see how section 57 assists the appellants. Its effect seems to be that where the consideration for a sale consists of money payable on a contingency, such money is to be taken into account in ascertaining the stamp duty to be paid on the conveyance of the property sold. I see nothing in section 57 which either cuts down or excludes section 56. It is also contended that the words "money payable" in section 56 do not include money payable upon a contingency, because the contingency may never happen and no money may be payable. But the words of section 56 appear to me to be wide enough to cover all moneys which may become payable, and the latter part of clause 2 certainly favours this construction. Moreover, section 57 says that money payable on a contingency is to be taken into account; and that, to my mind, removes any doubt which might otherwise arise as to the inclusion of contingent payments in section 56. Then it is said that the purchasing company may be wound up, or may at some future time reduce its capital, and so reduce in future the minimum sum payable periodically to the selling company. No doubt these are possible events, but at most they are merely other contingencies on which the payment of the minimum sum depends. Unless the contingency of winding up or reducing the capital happens, the minimum sum continues to be payable. The fact that the minimum sum is payable on more contingencies than one is, in my opinion, quite immaterial. They only affect the ability of the purchasing company to pay, which is the only contingency of any importance. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal was correct, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, Bircham & Co.; Solicitor for Inland Revenue.

Privy Council.

(On appeal from the Court of Appeal for New Zealand.)

Dec. 1.

CLOUSTON & CO. (LIMITED) v. CORRY. (a.)

Master and servant—Wrongful dismissal—Damages for—Duty of judge—Justification—Jury.

Misconduct inconsistent with the fulfilment of the express or implied conditions of service will justify dismissal, but there is no fixed rule of law defining the degree of misconduct which will suffice.

In cases of alleged wrongful dismissal where the trial takes place before a judge and jury, it is for the judge to direct them by informing them of the nature of the acts, which as a matter of law justify dismissal, and he may guide them by calling their attention to the facts material to the determination of the issues raised.

The action was brought for wrongful dismissal.

The whole circumstances of the case appear in their lordships' judgment.

Lush, K.C., and Northcote, for the appellants.

Tyrrell Paine (Cohen, K.C., with him), for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords Macnaghten, Davey, James of Hereford, Robertson, and Sir Arthur Wilson) was delivered by Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, directing judgment to be entered for the plaintiff (the present respondent) for £875 and costs.

The material facts of the case appear to be as follows:

Prior to September, 1902, the plaintiff had carried on business in New Zealand as an agent for the purchase of barley and as a dealer in farm produce. He also conducted an insurance office business. The appellant company carried on a similar business in the same district.

On the 18th of September, 1902, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant company whereby the plaintiff undertook faithfully to serve the defendant company for five years as manager of the grain and produce department of the business of the company. He also undertook to obey all commands and instructions given to him, and to use his best endeavours to bring to the defendants the business agencies and clients of the firm to which he had belonged. In return the defendants undertook to pay the plaintiff £500 per annum and a percentage on the profits made on business introduced by him.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff entered upon his duties under this agreement, and continued in the defendants' service until the 17th of November, 1903, when he was dismissed. It is for this dismissal, alleged to be wrongful, the action was brought.

The statement of claim set out the above facts, and contained a claim for £3,000 damages.

The statement of defence justified the dismissal of the plaintiff on the grounds: First, that the plaintiff had disobeyed the orders of the directors of the defendant company. Secondly, that the plaintiff had on the 9th of November, 1903, been arrested in the streets of a township called Havelock, on a charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct, and fined for such offences.

The trial took place in March, 1904, before the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Zealand and a jury. In support of the allegations in the statement of defence that the defendants were justified in dismissing the plaintiff evidence was given to show that the plaintiff had, as agent for the defendants, made purchases of goods contrary to the orders given him by the directors of the defendant company; and secondly, that the plaintiff had in the month of November, 1903, grossly misconducted himself at a place called Havelock and had been convicted by a magistrate of drunkenness.

The first ground of justification was, during the argument before their lordships, very properly abandoned by the counsel for the appellants (the defendants), inasmuch as the second ground of defence presented facts of a much more serious character than the first. The evidence given by the defendants as to the plaintiff's drunkenness and the use of foul language at Havelock was very strong and virtually admitted by the plaintiff. His own account is as follows:

"I went to Havelock on the 8th of November. . . . I stopped on the night of the 8th at Duggan's Hotel. I arrived there at 7.30 p.m. I think I was sober when I arrived, but I am not sure of anything that happened there. I might have got drunk on the night of the 8th. I do not remember, but I misconducted myself on the 9th. I remember Mr. Taylor coming to me on the morning of the 9th. I was not drunk then. He came to me on business. I told him to go to hell because he had accused me of not replying, acknowledging the receipt of money he had sent to me. . . . The receipt of the money had been acknowledged. . . ."

Question: "Did you use foul and coarse language in a public street when there were ladies in the balcony of the hotel close by?" Answer: "I would not say that I did not. I think I did go to the sergeant of police to ask him to compel the publican to give me more drink. I do not know that I wanted to fight. I do not remember two gentlemen asking me to desist because there were ladies on the balcony. I got out of the lock-up at 11 p.m. on the 9th and started drinking again. I think I was mad when I was in the police-court on the 10th. There was a report of the affair in the Pelorus Guardian of what took place in the police-court. I cannot say whether or not it is inaccurate. Some of my friends tried to get the paper not to publish it. (Report put in.) I do not say anything in extenuation of my conduct, and it was not fit conduct for any person who held my office. I cannot say how many times a man can so act."

He also said, "I have commonly been drunk," and it was further alleged that the habitual drunkenness was known to certain officers of the defendant company.

In respect of this misconduct, the plaintiff was charged before and convicted by a magistrate at Havelock, and a report of the proceedings appeared in the press.

At the conclusion of the evidence the counsel for the defendants submitted—

(1) That unless the jury disbelieved the evidence as to the conduct at Havelock they must find a verdict for the defendants.

(2) That certain purchases admittedly made by the plaintiff were made in direct violation of the orders given to him by the board of directors of the defendant company, and that on that ground also the verdict should be entered for the defendants.

The learned Chief Justice declined to accede to this submission, but leave was reserved to the full court to enter a non-suit, or to enter a verdict for the defendant company.

The following questions were left to the jury:

"(1) Did the plaintiff obey the order and direction of the defendant company in the purchase of chaff from Woodward?

"(2) If so, was the defendant company justified in dismissing the plaintiff?

"(3) Was the defendant company justified in dismissing the plaintiff for his conduct at Havelock on the 9th and 10th of November, 1903?

"(4) What damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover?"

To the first of the above questions the jury answered, Yes. To the second and third, No. To the fourth, £875.

After the verdict had been given the learned Chief Justice expressed considerable doubt as to the course he ought to pursue, but in the result allowed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff for £875, reserving "full power for the court to enter a verdict for the defendant if it should turn out that the matter is wholly one of law." The Chief Justice added: "The facts in this case are not in dispute, and if it is the function of a judge to determine that the dismissal was justifiable, then the court is to have power to do so and to enter a verdict for the defendant, and also to grant a non-suit if it should be the opinion of the court that the plaintiff's conduct justified the defendants in dismissing him."

The defendants duly gave notice of motion, pursuant to leave reserved, to enter judgment for them—

(1) Upon the ground that upon the facts admitted by the plaintiff the learned judge ought either to have entered judgment for the defendant company or to have directed the jury to find for them, or to have directed a non-suit.

(2) Upon the ground that the learned judge refused to direct the jury as requested by the defendant's counsel that if they believed the defendant's evidence (which was uncontradicted) they must find a verdict for the defendant company.

(3) That the learned judge misdirected the jury in directing them that, the facts being admitted, the question whether such facts justified the dismissal of the plaintiff was a question for the jury.

(4) In the alternative, that there should be a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

By consent it was ordered that the motion founded on these notices should be removed into the Court of Appeal for hearing.

The case was argued in the Court of Appeal of New Zealand before the Chief Justice and Williams, Edwards, Denniston, Chapman, and Cooper, JJ. The case was fully considered, and elaborate and learned judgments were given by the members of the court The Chief Justice was of opinion that his direction at the trial was wrong, and that the verdict should have been entered for the defendants. The other members of the court were of opinion that the case was rightly submitted by the Chief Justice to the jury, and that the verdict they arrived at was correct, and ought not to be disturbed. From that judgment the defendant company obtained leave to appeal to his Majesty in Council.

Both in the arguments of counsel and in the elaborate judgments delivered by the judges of the Court of Appeal very many cases were referred to. Reliance cannot be placed upon all of them, for very much must depend upon the exact words used in the judgments given, and summaries composed by the reporters of trials at Nisi Prius may not always convey the exact ruling of the presiding judge. It is difficult also to determine whether the words quoted in the reports represent words of advice or of absolute direction. Still there are cases which can be quoted in support of either side of the question involved, and between some of them it is apparently impossible to avoid a conflict. It seems unnecessary to pass all these cases again in review, but their lordships have fully considered them, and are aided by them in arriving at the conclusion they now express.

In an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful dismissal from service, a defence which in former days would have been embodied in a plea of justification, is set up. Allegations of misconduct, drunkenness, the use of foul language in public, resulting in conviction, are made, supported by strong evidence virtually admitted by the plaintiff to be true. And upon such facts the question arises what is the power and the duty of the presiding judge. Ought he to withdraw the case from the jury and with his own hand enter a verdict for the defendant, or ought he to leave the case to the jury, asking them if they think the facts proved justified the dismissal of the plaintiff?

In the present case the tribunal to try all issues of fact was a jury. Now the sufficiency of the justification depended upon the extent of misconduct. There is no fixed rule of law defining the degree of misconduct which will justify dismissal. Of course there may be misconduct in a servant which will not justify the determination of the contract of service by one of the parties to it against the will of the other. On the other hand, misconduct inconsistent with the fulfilment of the express or implied conditions of service will justify dismissal. Certainly when the alleged misconduct consists of drunkenness there must be considerable difficulty in determining the extent or conditions of intoxication which will establish a justification for dismissal. The intoxication may be habitual and gross, and directly interfere with the business of the employer or with the ability of the servant to render due service. But it may be an isolated act committed under circumstances of festivity and in no way connected with or affecting the employer's business. In such a case the question whether the misconduct proved establishes the right to dismiss the servant must depend upon facts—and is a question of fact. If this be so, the questions raised in the present case had to be tried by the jury.

But in cases where the trial must so take place the presiding judge has important duties to fulfil. It is for him to say whether there is any evidence to submit to the jury in support of the allegation of justifiable dismissal. If no such evidence has in his opinion been given, he should not submit any issue in respect of such allegations. The judge may also direct, guide, and assist the jury. He may direct by informing them of the nature of the acts which as a matter of law will justify dismissal. He may guide them by calling their attention to the facts material to the determination of the issues raised, and he may assist them in a manner and to an extent there is no reason to define. There have been judges—more numerous in the past than in the present—who possessed and exercised the power of addressing a jury in terms of apparent impartiality, and yet of placing before them views which seldom failed to secure the verdict desired by the judge to be recorded. Some trace of the exercise of this influence may be found in the following terms in which Sir Frederick Pollock guided the jury in the case of Horton v. McMurtry, 5 H. & N. 667, 29 L. J. Ex. 260: "Gentlemen, I believe it is for you to decide whether this was a proper ground of dismissal—but if it be a matter of law . . . my opinion is that it is a good ground of dismissal." The jury found for the defendant.

For these reasons their lordships are of opinion that the learned Chief Justice was correct in submitting the issues of fact to the jury, and that in this respect the judgment given by the majority of the Court of Appeal is also correct. But a further question has to be determined. During the course of the argument before their lordships no information could be obtained as to the existence of any rules of procedure in New Zealand corresponding to those existing in this country enabling judgment to be entered according to the evident justice of the case: ord. 58, r. 4, 1875.

But since the conclusion of the arguments their lordships have been referred to rule 5 in the schedule to the Court of Appeal (New Zealand) Act, 1882, which apparently confers powers substantially identical with those existing in this country.

But so far as their lordships can gather from the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal of New Zealand the point that judgment should be entered for the defendants by that court was not submitted to it, and it certainly was not referred to in the judgments of the learned judges. And the learned Chief Justice, whilst expressing a strong opinion that the verdict was unsatisfactory, contented himself with saying: "I may further add that if I had come to the conclusion that it was a case for the jury only, then I should have been of opinion that their verdict was against the weight of evidence and that a new trial should be ordered; for I do not think that the verdict was one twelve reasonable men should have found."

Under these circumstances, while their lordships are of opinion that the verdict found for the plaintiff is so unsatisfactory that it ought not to be maintained, yet they refrain from exercising powers apparently not sought to be enforced by the appellants in the court below, or from exceeding the views expressed by the learned Chief Justice, and so they have come to the like conclusion, that the proper course to pursue is to direct that a new trial shall take place.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be discharged and this appeal allowed to the extent of ordering that the costs of all proceedings in the courts below shall depend upon the result of the new trial. The respondent will pay to the appellants their costs of this appeal.

Solicitors of appellants, Blyth, Dutton, Hartley, & Blyth.

Solicitors for respondent, Paines, Blyth, & Huxtable.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Feb. 14.

In re KEMPSTER.
KEMPSTER v. KEMPSTER. (a.)

Administration — Marshalling assets — Debts, funeral and testamentary expenses—Insufficiency of personal estate— Pecuniary legatees— Specific devisees— Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 2, sub-section 3.

Where a will contains a direction charging debts upon the real estate, and the personal estate is exhausted in paying the debts, the Land Transfer Act does not alter the old rule under which the pecuniary legatees were entitled to have the assets marshalled as against the specific devisees.

In re Roberts, Roberts v. Roberts, 51 W. R. 89, [1902] 2 Ch. 834, followed.

Adjourned summons.

By his will dated the 9th of October, 1903, Thomas Kempster appointed his wife, the plaintiff Deborah Kempster, and his daughter, the defendant Elizabeth Sparman Kempster, his executrixes, and bequeathed to each the sum of £50 free of legacy duty. He then directed that all his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses should be paid as soon as possible after his decease. He further bequeathed various specific legacies, and devised his real estate and gave the residue of his personal estate to the plaintiff for life, and after her death to be equally divided between his four children, one of whom was the defendant Deborah Sheppard.

The testator died on the 20th of January, 1905, and probate was taken out on the 25th of March, 1905.

The debts, funeral and testamentary expenses of the testator amounted to more than £200, and his personal estate did not amount to more than £156 The real estate of the testator was estimated to be of the value of about £750.

This summons was taken out by the plaintiff for the determination (inter alia) of the following question: Whether the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses of the testator ought to be raised and paid (so far as might be necessary) out of the real estate devised by the will in exoneration of the personal estate, so as to leave the personal estate not specifically bequeathed available for the payment of the pecuniary legacies given by the will.

The question turned on whether the Land Transfer Act, 1897, had altered the old rule in regard to the marshalling of assets. Section 2, sub-section 3, of the Act provides that: "In the administration of the assets of a person dying after the commencement of this Act, his real estate shall be administered in the same manner, subject to the same liabilities for debt, costs, and expenses, and with the same incidents, as if it were personal estate, provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the order in which real and personal assets respectively are now applicable towards the payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts or legacies, or the liability of real estate to be charged with the payment of legacies."

Maugham, for the plaintiff.—The Land Transfer Act does not alter the old rule in regard to the marshalling of assets in such a case as this. The proviso in sub-section 3 of section 2 provides against any such alteration. The pecuniary legatees are, therefore, entitled to have the assets marshalled as against the specific devisees: In re Roberts.

Greenland, for the defendant devisee.—The Land Transfer Act has rendered the charge contained in the will futile: Theobald on Wills (6th ed.), 819. The proviso in section 2, sub-section 3, does not conflict with the doubts expressed by Theobald.

P. T. Blackwell, for the defendant executrix.

KEKEWICH, J.—Previous to the passing of the Land Transfer Act a direction such as that contained in the will in this case was treated as a charge of the debts of the testator on his real estate. From that it was concluded that if resort were had to the personal estate for the payment of debts, the pecuniary legatees could come against the specific devisees of the real estate on the ground that the testator had intended the debts to be paid out of the real estate. Since the passing of the Act, real estate is treated as personal estate for the purpose of discharging debts, so that the necessity for a charge such as is contained in the will in this case no longer exists. The Act says that such a charge is unnecessary, not that it is not there. Also notwithstanding the doubts expressed by Theobald, section 2, sub-section 3, of the Act preserves the order in which assets were applicable before the Act. In re Roberts is applicable, and the pecuniary legatees are entitled to have the assets marshalled as against the specific devisees of the real estate.

Solicitors for the plaintiff and the defendant devisee, Foulgar, Robinson, & Miller, for E. J. Vine, Exmouth.

Solicitor for the defendant executrix, S. Myers.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } March 1.

In re J. W. CLARK, DECEASED. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Compulsory powers of purchase—Funds in court—Reinvestment in land—Part only of invested money provided from funds in court—Costs of application and expenses—Apportionment.

Upon an application for reinvestment in land of a fund paid into court by the London County Council as the price of land bought by the council under compulsory powers of purchase, the fund in court formed less than half the sum proposed to be reinvested,

Held, that the usual order must be made as to costs, following the form appearing on p. 2457 of Seton's Forms of Judgments and Orders, no special provision being made for the apportionment of the surveyor's and conveyancing fees.

Summons.

This summons was adjourned into court to be disposed of on a question of costs alone. The summons was issued under the following circumstances:

On the 4th of February, 1902, the London County Council served a notice to treat on the trustees of the will of J. W. Clark, with a view to acquiring the interest of the trustees in certain property situate in Walworth. Negotiations ensued, and ultimately the council agreed to pay £930 and the costs of the negotiations. Accordingly the sum of £950 was paid into court on the 19th of July, 1904, and the trustees conveyed their interest to the council by a conveyance dated the 18th of August, 1904.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

On the 4th of December, 1905, the trustees contracted, subject to the approval of the court, to buy twelve pieces of land situate at Southfields, with twelve messuages thereon, for the price of £2,178 17s. 3d. from a vendor registered with an absolute title. The investment was, therefore, one for which the funds were provided partly from a fund in court and partly from money in the hands of the trustees.

The trustees issued a summons asking (inter alia) that, pursuant to section 80 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), the council might be ordered to pay to the applicants their costs as thereby provided for including therein all reasonable charges and expenses of and incident to the said investment in the purchase of the said hereditaments and of this application and of all proceedings relating thereto, such costs, charges, and expenses to be taxed by the taxing-master in case the parties differed.

They desired that the order as to costs made upon their application should follow the form appearing on p. 2457 of Seton's Forms of Judgments and Orders, 6th edition.

It was, on the other hand, submitted by the council that the order as to costs should take the following form:

"And it is ordered that it be referred to the taxing-master to tax the costs of the applicants on this application, including therein all reasonable charges and expenses of and incidental thereto of the investment of the sum of £2,178 17s. 3d. in the purchase of the said land and of obtaining this order and of all proceedings relating thereto, and in such taxation the master is to distinguish thereupon the costs, charges, and expenses of the investment of the said sum of £2,178 17s. 3d. including all ad valorem fees and brokerage and scale fees . . . and it is, pursuant to section 80 of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ordered that the council do pay to the applicants their costs of this application to be taxed as aforesaid and such proportion of the costs, charges, and expenses so to be distinguished as aforesaid as the amount of the purchase-money contributed by the council bears to the whole purchase-money of £2,1781 7s. 3d.

Eve, K.C., and E. S. Ford, for the trustees of the will of J. W. Clark.—The order as to costs should be as appears on p. 2457 of Seton's Judgments and Orders. That form meets the requirements of the case, and does not work any injustice.

R. J. Parker, for the London County Council.—Seton's is not the only form to be considered. The form used must depend upon what is fair in the particular case. Under the form in Seton the taxing-master would not apportion the fees of conveyancing counsel or the surveyor's fees, or the non-sale conveyancing fees charged in the case of registered titles. In this case it would be unreasonable to adopt the form given in Seton. Why should the council pay a larger surveyor's fee because the applicants choose to increase the purchase price by adding money beyond the funds in court? It is unfair that the council should have to bear the whole of the conveyancing costs of purchasing an estate larger than the funds in court can buy: Ex parte The Perpetual Curate of Bilston, 37 W. R. 460, (1889) W. N. 17, and In re Power's Settlement, (1876) W. N. 205.

Eve. K.C., in reply.—When a surveyor charges a scale fee, then it is apportioned between the funds in court and the extra invested funds. In this case the title is an absolute title registered at the Land Registry, but the conveyancing counsel refuse that title and insist on making investigation, thus causing greater expense.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—This is an application for re-investment in land of the proceeds of land taken by the London County Council. The sum proposed to be invested is over £2,000, so that the money paid into court by the London County Council amounts to less than half that sum, the remaining part of it being provided by the applicants themselves. The only question now to be answered is, what order is to be made in respect of costs? The practice in such cases is well settled, and it follows the order found on p. 2457 of Seton's Forms of Judgments and Orders (6th ed.). That form is adapted to cases where part only of the purchase-money is provided out of funds in court. The taxing-master is not to allow costs incurred in a purchase so far as they are occasioned by the purchase-money exceeding the fund in court: see In re Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, before Kay, J., at chambers, March 24th, 1887. A memorandum of the practice was prepared by one of the registrars, and submitted to Kay, J., and he adopted the principle embodied in it. That case was followed by Chitty, J., in Reg. v. The Corporation of Carlisle. There is a different form of order for use in cases where the applicant provides part of the purchase-money from that which is to be used in cases where different companies contribute the whole of the purchase-money. In such cases as the present the practice is that when the purchase-money exceeds the fund in court and the applicant provides the balance the undertakers have to pay the whole of the costs except in so far as they have been increased by the fact of the outside purchase-money exceeding the fund in court. In this particular case it has been said that the rule may cause hardship by throwing upon the council the burden of a large part of the surveyor's fee and the costs of conveyancing. The council urge that they should have to bear only an amount in proportion to the fund paid into court, and that under the usual order the taxing-master will not apportion these fees and costs. There may, however, be cases in which there would be no necessity for employing a surveyor but for the fact of a part of the purchase-money being in court.

On the other hand, it is certainly difficult to say that the fees should not be apportioned when the purchase-money is large and the fund in court so small in proportion that it would be equalled by the fees.

There may, of course, be extreme cases in either direction, but I am not prepared to say that the form which has been in use for so many years works any injustice. In my opinion it would be impracticable, and provocative of additional expense, for the question as to what is the proper order to make in view of costs incurred, and how such costs should be apportioned, always to be entered into by the judge. It is always open for any party aggrieved by taxation to take out a summons to review taxation, but all those matters of detail properly belong to the province of the taxing-master. The order will therefore be made as in the form given in Seton and already referred to.

Solicitors, Burchell, Wilde, & Co.; Seager Berry.

Chan. Div.
Warrington, J. } Jan. 24, 25, 26; Feb. 6.

In re BRITISH POWER TRACTION AND LIGHTING CO. (LIMITED).

HALIFAX JOINT STOCK BANKING CO. (LIMITED) v. BRITISH POWER TRACTION AND LIGHTING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Receiver and manager—Debenture-holders' action—Express authority to borrow—Borrowing beyond amount authorized—Right to indemnity out of assets—Rights of creditors of the receiver and manager.

W. was appointed receiver and manager of the undertaking and property of a company in an ordinary debenture-holders' action, and by an order of the court he was authorized to borrow on mortgage of the assets of the company a sum not exceeding £3,000 and interest. W. carried on the business and borrowed the £3,000 for the purpose from his bankers, B. & Co. In addition, and without any further authority from the court for the same purpose, he borrowed £1,500 more from his bankers, and also incurred debts and liabilites to other creditors. The company was in course of liquidation under an order of the court. W. became bankrupt, and a new manager was appointed. The creditors of W., in right of his indemnity, claimed to be paid out of the assets of the company in priority of the claims of the debenture-holders.

Held, that the order authorizing the limited borrowing was intended to limit the general authority of W. to borrow as such manager, and that having incurred liabilities exceeding that limit without having obtained the previous authority of the court, he was not entitled to be be indemnified against them unless he could show that, having regard to all the circumstances under which they were incurred, he was justified in incurring them without first obtaining leave; that what circumstances would justify the conduct of a manager in so increasing such liabilities without leave could not be defined in general terms, except that it would not be enough to show that the expenses or liabilities were incurred bonâ fide and in the ordinary course of business; and consequently the claims of the creditors were referred to the registrar to be examined, having regard to the above declaration.

Summons.

This was a summons taken out by the plaintiffs in the action, which was an ordinary debenture-holder's action, for purpose of ascertaining whether a receiver and manager appointed in the action was entitled to be indemnified out of the assets of the company in respect of debts and liabilities incurred by him in carrying on the business of the company in excess of the amount which he had been expressly authorized by the court to borrow.

On the answer to this question depended whether the creditors of the manager in respect of such debts and liabilities were to be paid out of the assets of the company, the manager having become bankrupt.

There appeared to be no decision upon the question. The summons asked in the alternative that the respective priorities of the debenture-holders and the several classes of creditors might be determined.

The following are the facts as stated by the learned judge:

By an order in the action dated the 27th of August, 1902, Herbert Watkins was appointed receiver of the undertaking and property of the defendant company and to manage its business, but he was not to act as manager after the 30th of December, 1902, without the leave of the judge.

By an order of the 28th of August, 1902, it was ordered that for the purpose of paying the current week's wages and the amount due for gas, as mentioned in an affidavit of Mr. Hodgson therein referred to, the manager was to be at liberty to raise on mortgage of the assets of the defendant company a sum not exceeding £750 at interest at a rate not exceeding £5 per cent. per annum, and that such money, when raised, and interest was to be a first charge upon the assets of the defendant company and all the property and effects included in the debentures.

By a further order dated the 4th of September, 1902, it was ordered that the manager was to be at liberty to raise on mortgage of the assets of the defendant company such a sum as with the sum of £750 in the order of the 28th of August, 1902, referred to would not exceed £3,000, with interest at a rate not exceeding £5 per cent. per annum, and it was ordered that such money, when raised, and interest, was to be a first charge upon the assets of the defendant company and all property and effects included in the debentures. This order, as well as that of the 28th of August, was made upon the affidavit of Mr. Hodgson; and from that it appears clearly that except the £750 mentioned in the order of the 28th of August the money was required for the ordinary current expenses of carrying on the business of the company.

On the 4th of September, 1902, a petition for winding up the company was presented, upon which a winding-up order was made on the 16th of December, 1902. Meanwhile judgment was obtained in the action on the 29th of November.

On the 15th of December leave was given to the manager to carry on the business till the 13th of January, 1903, and on the 14th of January, 1903, further liberty to carry on the business for a period of three months was given. Each of the applications on which leave was so given was supported by an affidavit of the manager.

No application was, on either of these occasions, or at any other time, made for leave to borrow any further sum or to incur any further liability.

On the 11th of February, 1903, an order was made by which, after stating that Herbert Watkins desired to retire from his office of receiver and manager, and he consenting to the order, one George Pepler Norton was appointed receiver and manager, and it was ordered that he should forthwith, out of any assets coming to his hands, other than money borrowed by him for payment of wages as thereinafter authorized, pay the debts, if any, of the company which might have priority over the claims of the debenture-holders, and make provision for paying the liabilities properly incurred by the said H. Watkins as receiver and manager. By the same order Watkins undertook within ten days to lodge his first and final account. The order contained other directions not material for the purposes of this judgment.

On the 13th of February, 1903, Watkins left the country and took with him £465, the moneys of the company, insisting that he was entitled to retain that sum for his indemnity. Watkins did not lodge his account as directed by the order of the 11th of February, 1903, and on the 2nd of March, 1903, the registrar directed the new receiver to make out such an account of the receipts and payments of Watkins as he could.

By an order of the 10th of March, 1903, it was ordered that the new receiver and manager should be at liberty to raise on mortgage of the assets of the defendant company such sum or sums, not exceeding in all £1,000, as he might think necessary, with interest as therein mentioned, and that such moneys when advanced with interest should be a charge on the assets of the defendant company, ranking immediately after any moneys (not exceeding in all £3,000) borrowed by the said Herbert Watkins pursuant to the leave given to him by the orders of the 28th of August, 1902, and the 4th of September, 1902; but, subject to the direction as to the priority of the sum or sums thereby authorized to be borrowed therein-before contained, the order to be without prejudice to any right of Barclay & Co. (Limited) to obtain repayment out of the assets of the defendant company in priority to the debenture-holders of any sum in excess of the said sum of £3,000 which they might have lent to the said Herbert Watkins as receiver and manager. Barclay & Co. were the bankers of the former manager, and he had borrowed from them the £3,000 authorized by the order of the 4th of September, 1902, by means of an overdraft. He had overdrawn his account to the extent of £1,500 in addition. It is this excess in the overdraft to which the order refers. On the 5th of May, 1903, the account of the receipts and payments of Watkins as prepared by Norton under the directions given on the 2nd of March was filed, whereby it appeared that the total overdraft was £4,500, and that there were, in addition, outstanding debts to a considerable amount. Subsequently directions were given for the winding up of the business and a sale of the assets. These are now represented by a sum of about £8,700 Consols and a sum of about £50 cash in court. By an order dated the 19th of July, 1904, two inquiries were directed—first, what creditors there are in respect of debts and liabilities incurred by Watkins as receiver and manager, and what are the amounts due to such creditors respectively; and, secondly, whether the said Herbert Watkins, as such receiver and manager, is entitled to be indemnified out of the assets of the defendant company in respect of the said debts and liabilities or any of them, and, if so, to what extent. By an order of the 26th of July, 1904, it was declared that Barclay & Co. were entitled, in priority to all the holders of debentures issued by the defendant company, to a charge on the assets of the defendant company for £3,000 with interest as therein mentioned, being the amount borrowed in pursuance of the orders of the 28th of August, 1902, and the 4th of September, 1902; but that order was to be without prejudice to any question as between Barclay & Co. and the creditors in the order mentioned, whether the charge thereby declared was in priority to any right of indemnity out of such assets to which the said Herbert Watkins might be found to be entitled, and also to the rights, if any, of his creditors claiming the benefit of any such indemnity, and also without prejudice to the right, if any, of Barclay & Co. to claim the benefit of such indemnity as one of such creditors. Under the inquiry directed by the order of the 19th of July, 1904, claims have been carried in for sums amounting to upwards of £6,000 in addition to the authorized sum of £3,000. Watkins has returned to this country and has been adjudicated bankrupt. It was thought convenient that the court should settle the principle upon which the alleged right of Watkins to an indemnity and the consequent right of his creditors to be paid out of the assets of the company should be determined before the registrar proceeds to consider the details of the several claims. The present summons was accordingly issued by the plaintiff bank, which were holders of the above-named company.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Norton, K.C., and P. Wheeler, for the plaintiff bank.—The manager was limited to borrowing £3,000. He was not entitled to exceed that amount without obtaining the authority of the court. He has therefore no right to indemnity out of the assets of the company for anything more than the £3,000, at any rate in priority to the debenture-holders. Barclay & Co., from whom he borrowed, as to anything beyond £3,000, and the other creditors to whom he incurred debts can only claim against the assets through the manager's right of indemnity, and as he has no such right their claims fail. There is no case directly in point, but our contention is consistent with the authorities. [They referred to Morris v. Elme, 1 Ves. jun. 139; Thornhill v. Thornhill, 14 Sim. 600; Taylor v. Neate, 37 W. R. 190, 39 Ch. D. 538; Burt, Boulton, & Hayward v. Bull, 43 W. R. 180, [1895] 1 Q. B. 276; Strapp v. Bull & Co., 43 W. R. 641, [1895] 2 Ch. 1.] The manager is personally liable for the debts he has incurred: Ex parte Garland, 10 Ves. 110.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Hon. Frank Russell, for Barclay & Co. stated that their clients considered it their interest to support the view of the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. R. Atkin, for creditors.—The manager incurred the debts bonâ fide in the conduct of, and for the purposes of the current expenses of the business, and of preserving the assets, and he ought to be indemnified out of them. He had a special authority to borrow up to £3,000, but he also had a general authority to borrow the moneys necessary for carrying on the business which he was appointed to manage, and having done so, the court will confirm his action. This principle underlies Strapp v. Bull and Taylor v. Neate.

They also referred to Batten v. Wedgewood Coal and Iron Co., 33 W. R. 303, 28 Ch. D. 317; Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon, & Co., 32 W. R. 989, 9 App. Cas. 434, 438.

Cave, K.C., and L. Riley, for other creditors, supported the same view, and referred to Ex parte Izard, 31 W. R. 418, 23 Ch. D. 75, and In re Glasdir Copper Mines, 22 Times L. R. 100, W. N. (1905), p. 172.

Norton, in reply, referred to Leadham v. Chawner, 4 K. & J. 458, 7 W. R. Dig. Ch. 86, and In re Dunn, 52 W. R. 345, [1904] 1 Ch. 648, as cases where a receiver and manager was not allowed out of the assets costs and debts incurred by him as manager.

WARRINGTON, J.—The law as to the position of a manager appointed by the court, where no special provision is made for meeting expenses and liabilities incurred by him, is not disputed, and is, indeed, beyond dispute. It is, on the one hand, his duty to carry on the business, and for that purpose to enter into proper contracts on his own responsibility, and it is, on the other hand, his right to be indemnified out of the assets against expenses and liabilities properly incurred in the execution of his duty: Burt v. Bull, [1895] 1 Q. B., p. 276, and Strapp v. Bull, [1895] 1 Ch., p. 1. Moreover, though I do not find this anywhere expressly laid down, I think that expenses and liabilities bonâ fide incurred in the ordinary course of the business would primâ facie be treated as having been properly incurred. But is the position of the manager the same in cases where, as here, he is authorized to borrow a sum not exceeding a certain limit for the general purposes of the business he is carrying on? I say advisedly, "for the general purposes," for what I am about to say is not intended to apply to cases where the authority to borrow is for some special purpose. The effect of an authority to borrow for general purposes is to provide at the expense of the parties interested in the assets a special fund out of which the manager can indemnify himself, and the amount of that fund is fixed after considering what the parties interested state as to the requirements of the business. What is the result as the manager's general right to indemnity? That he is not deprived of it altogether follows, in my opinion, from the decisions in Strapp v. Bull above referred to, and In re Glasdir Copper Mines (1905). On the other hand, when the court thus protects the manager by providing a special indemnity, it cannot be that he is nevertheless entitled, without any further authority, to incur expenses and liabilities to an unlimited extent and to require them to be met out of the assets. It seems to me that the true position in these cases is that the order is intended to limit his general authority, and if he finds that the fund provided by the court is not sufficient, it is his duty to cause the matter to be brought before the court, so that, if it sees fit, it may increase it, or give him leave to incur further expenses or liabilities, which come to the same thing. If, without such an application, being made he incurs, expenses and liabilities exceeding the limit, he is, in my opinion, not entitled to be indemnified against them unless he can show that, having regard to all the circumstances under which they were incurred, he was justified in incurring them without first obtaining leave. If he succeeds in showing this, then I think the expenses and liabilities would be properly incurred, but not otherwise. What circumstances would justify the conduct of the manager, in so increasing such expenses and liabilities without leave cannot, I think, be defined in general terms, but must be determined in each particular case. I will only say that in my opinion it would not be enough to show that the expenses or liabilities were incurred bona fide and in the ordinary course of business. As regards authorities, there is, in my opinion, none which throws any light upon the case. It is true that in Strapp v. Bull and In re Glasdir Copper Mines managers with special powers to borrow were treated as entitled to an indemnity for expenses outside the limit; but in neither case was the present question raised; and I cannot but assume that the parties there did not desire to question the propriety of the manager's conduct in incurring such expenses. It was argued that the rights and duties of the manager were fixed once for all by the original order. I cannot take this view. It seems to me that the court can at any time limit the authority of its own officer. The result is that it is still open to the manager, and through him to the claimants, to show that his liabilities to the latter were properly incurred so as to entitle him to an indemnity, and them to payment through him. I was, indeed, asked to say that, under circumstances which were put in evidence, the manager in this particular case was entitled to no indemnity at all. I cannot come to this conclusion; and I think it better not to discuss the evidence, inasmuch as it will have to be gone into on the examination of the several claims before the registrar, and I am anxious not to prejudice questions the complete materials for deciding which may not be before me. I propose to declare that Herbert Watkins, the late receiver and manager, is entitled to be indemnified against those debts and liabilities only (over and above the permitted overdraft of £3,000) as to which he shall satisfy the judge that, having regard to all the circumstances under which the same respectively were incurred, he was justified in incurring them without first obtaining the leave of the judge. That part of the summons which refers to the priorities of the several classes of creditors had better stand over until the registrar has dealt with the several claims having regard to the above declaration. The costs of all the parties of the present application to be allowed (other than the bankrupt's trustee) out of the assets.

Solicitors, Jacques & Co., for Dickons & Aked, Halifax; Howe & Rake, for Lucas, Hutchinson, & Meek, Darlington; Herbert Smith & Co.; Tippetts, for J. W. Wall, Bootle.

Chan. Div.
Warrington, J. } Jan. 23, 30.

In re Mercantile Lighterage Co. (Limited). (a.)

Taxation of costs—Liquidator of company—Solicitor and client costs—Inclusion of taxed party and party costs—Method of calculation of one-sixth part—Disbursements—Professional charges—Existing practice in taxing office—Taxation of liquidator's bill of costs—Ord. 65, r. 27 (38b).

In a bill of costs of a retiring liquidator to be taxed as between solicitor and client, costs which have been already taxed and paid as between party and party are properly included, and in determining whether one-sixth part of the bill has been disallowed, these party and party costs must be treated as part of the bill, and in determining the same question the professional charges are alone to be considered, and disbursements should be disregarded. These principles apply both to bills taxed under the Solicitors Acts and to others. The existing practice of the Taxing Office upon this question is not in accordance with the rules, and is incorrect.

This was a summons to review a taxation of costs, which raised two important questions as to what ought to be included in such bills for the purpose of determining whether one-sixth part of the amount of the bill had been disallowed under ord. 65, r. 27 (38*b*).

The applicant, R. Wood, was a former liquidator of the above company.

By an order of the 5th of May, 1905, made in the voluntary winding up of the company, it was directed that the costs, charges, and expenses of Mr. Wood as between solicitor and client properly incurred in the winding up should be taxed and ascertained accordingly, and a new liquidator was appointed.

Mr. Wood accordingly brought in his bill, showing in separate columns disbursements of £239 3s. 9d. and professional charges £563 9s., making together £802 12s. 6d. Of this amount two items of £162 13s. 4d. and £9 4s. 6d. (called in the schedule of objections items 3 and 4) represented certain party and party costs of Mr. Wood as liquidator which had already been taxed and paid, and for which he was ready to give credit. The sum of £162 13s. 4d. consisted of £73 17s. 6d. disbursements and of £88 15s. professional charges, and the sum of £9 4s. 6d. consisted of £3 3s. 6d. disbursements and £6 10s. professional charges.

Upon taxation of the bill the registrar had struck out these sums upon the ground that, as they had already been taxed and paid, it was unnecessary to include them. Having thus reduced the amount of the bill, he taxed the remaining items, and disallowed items amounting to £139 2s. 5d., consisting of £62 1s. 7d. disbursements and £77 0s. 10d. professional charges. Regarding all the disbursements as part of the bill for this purpose, in conformity with the existing practice in the Taxing Office, he held that more than one-sixth part had been disallowed; and accordingly, under ord. 65, r. 27 (38*b*), he struck out £18 6s for drawing and copying the bill of costs and £7 6s. 8d. for attending taxation (called items 1 and 2).

(a.) Reported by Neville Tebbutt, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The present summons was thereupon taken out.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the applicant.—First, the sums of £162 13s. 4d. and £9 4s 6d., party and party costs, were properly inserted in the bill and should not have been struck out; and, secondly, professional charges only, and not disbursements, should have been considered in determining whether the bill had been reduced by one-sixth part. If this course had been adopted the amount disallowed would have been less than one-sixth of the bill, and consequently items 1 and 2 should have been allowed. As regards the second question, the existing practice in the taxing office is contrary to the rules and wrong. Ord. 65, r. 27 (38*b*), under which the registrar proceeded, and under which alone he could disallow these items, applies to professional charges only, and not to disbursements. "Professional charges" cannot include disbursements, and the two classes are contrasted in rule 19*h* of the same order. In In the Goods of Rose Kennedy, Cunningham v. M'Donagh, [1904] 2 Ir. Rep. 417, the Irish court held, upon similar rules, that professional charges only were to be considered. The Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), in section 37, with reference to the taxation of bills, speaks of "fees, charges, and disbursements." Until June, 1889, when the present sub-rule was passed, disbursements were expressly ordered not to be included. In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603, only decided what were professional disbursements and what not. Next the party and party costs were rightly inserted in the bill. Theoretically the whole of the items of these costs should be inserted, but in practice and to avoid unnecessary trouble in copying only the lump sum is put down: Waller v. Lacy, 1 M. & G. 54.

J. D. Israel.—Rules 19*h* and 27 (38*b*) were made in different years, and the contrast between "disbursements" and "professional charges" may not have been intended in the latter sub-rule. The words "exclusive of disbursements" which were in the former rule have been omitted, showing the intention to alter the rule. The practice of the office of including disbursements is settled and should not be disturbed. As regards the insertion of items 3 and 4 for party and party costs these are quite unnecessary, the bill having been already taxed and paid, and should not be inserted merely to prevent the operation of rule 27 (38*b*). Waller v. Lacy was decided under the Solicitors Act, and does not apply to a taxation of a person not a solicitor.

WARRINGTON, J.—The order is to tax, not the difference between the party and party and the solicitor and client costs, but the costs as between solicitor and client, and I should have thought, independently of authority, that this means the whole costs, and not merely so much as has not already been paid. But the form in which the bill has been carried in is in accordance, as I understand, with the long-established practice of the taxing office, which practice rests on the authority of several cases, of which Waller v. Lacy, 1 M. & G. 54, is an example. Tindal, C.J., on this point says (at p. 69): "The third question is whether the charges in respect of extra costs are sufficiently stated, and it appears to me they do not comply with the requisites of the statute. Those charges by themselves are not intelligible to the officer of the court. An attorney's bill, generally speaking, ought to give a history of the cause, so as enable the officer to judge of the propriety of the various items of which it is composed; but if part only of the charges are set forth he has not sufficient materials whereon to form his judgment. A delivery of a bill containing merely the extra costs is certainly not according to the general practice, which is for the attorney to deliver a bill of the whole costs, giving his client credit for the sum that has been received. Here these separate and disjoined items do not furnish the necessary information, and are consequently not a sufficient compliance with the statute, which requires a bill to be delivered for the purpose of enabling the client, should he think proper, to have it taxed." It has been suggested that this and the other cases are confined to taxations under the Solicitors Act. I can see nothing to limit their application to such taxations, and the reasons given by Tindal, C.J., apply as much to taxations such as the present as to taxations under the Act. There seems to be no valid objection to the mode in which the costs taxed and paid are included—viz., in a lump sum. This is also in accordance with the usual practice. For these reasons I think the registrar was wrong in the course he took, and I allow the objection, so far as these items are concerned. The other objection is this: The registrar, purporting to act under ord. 65, r. 27 (38*b*), has disallowed the costs of drawing and copying the bill and of attending the taxation. Ord. 65, r. 27 (38*b*), is as follows: "If on the taxation of a bill of costs payable out of a fund or estate (real or personal), or out of the assets of a company in liquidation, the amount of the professional charges contained in the bill is reduced by a sixth part, no costs shall be allowed to the solicitor leaving the bill for taxation, for drawing and copying it, nor for attending the taxation." The registrar, for the purpose of arriving at the sixth part, has added to the professional charges the amount of the disbursements. In doing so he has followed the settled practice of the taxing office, though I understand if he had felt himself at liberty to act on his own construction of the rule he would have taken a different course. Is the practice in accordance with the true construction of the rule? The question turns on what is the meaning in the rule of "the professional charges contained in the bill." In the same ord. 65, r. 19, it is provided: "In every bill of costs the professional charges shall be entered in a separate column from the disbursements, and every column shall be cast before the bill is left for taxation." This shows that in this order "professional charges" has a meaning of its own, distinct from, and, indeed, contrasted with, "disbursements"; and speaking for myself I can see no doubt or ambiguity in the matter, and I think the sixth should be arrived at by taking the "professional charges" by themselves without regarding the disbursements. This is in accordance with the Irish case of In the Goods of Rose Kennedy. As, however, I found that the contrary practice was established, I requested Master Shearme to furnish me with a memorandum as to its origin. This I have received. The facts appear to be that sub-rule 38*b* as first published in May, 1889, contained after the words "professional charges" the words "exclusive of disbursements." The words "exclusive of disbursements" were afterwards struck out, and the rule of June, 1889 was signed as it now appears. In my opinion, even if I were entitled to look at the rule of May, 1889, in order to construe the rule now in force (which I do not think I am), it would not help me. The words omitted did not really alter the sense, and I could only conclude that the committee struck them out as redundant and in the interests of good draftsmanship. But I am also informed by the taxing-masters that the Incorporated Law Society made representations to the Lord Chancellor upon the rule as first drawn, with the object of having disbursements included for the purpose of arriving at the sixth, and that the intention of the Rule Committee in altering the rules was to give effect to these representations. These are matters to which I am not entitled to listen. I must take the rule as it stands and say what it means. As to this I have already expressed my view, and I must, therefore, allow this objection also, and refer the taxation back to the registrar accordingly. I need not say that I have been reluctant to interfere with a practice which has been so long established; but when there is, as I think, a plain construction of a rule, I consider it my duty to give effect to it. If the rule so construed is not in accordance with the intention of the Rule Committee, it is open to them to alter it.

Solicitors, Atkinson & Dresser; Walter B. Styer.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Feb. 27.

CROCKER v. MAYOR, &c., OF PLYMOUTH. (a.)

Local authority — Education authority — Salaries of teachers—Control of managers by education authority —Privity of contract between teacher and education authority—Education Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 42), s. 7.

A teacher who has been engaged by the managers of a school maintained but not provided by the local education authority, cannot sue the local education authority to recover unpaid salary, there being no privity of contract, although the local education authority may have always paid the salary direct to the teacher up to the period in dispute.

Appeal from the County Court of Devonshire, holden at Plymouth.

By an agreement of the 22nd of March, 1899, the plaintiff was engaged by the managers of Compton School, Plymouth, as assistant schoolmistress at a salary of £50, increasing to £80, subject to three months' notice on either side.

The 1st of April, 1903, was the day appointed for the coming into operation of the Education Act, 1902. New managers were duly appointed, and the plaintiff continued to give her services the same as heretofore.

The local education authority paid the salaries of the teachers direct.

On the 4th of August, 1903, the following resolution was passed by the local education authority: "Resolved, that the marriage of principal and assistant mistresses in provided and non-provided schools shall be equivalent to three months' notice to terminate the engagement."

On the 11th of August, 1903, the following letter was sent by the town clerk to the managers of Compton School: "I beg to inform you that the authority have decided that the marriage of principal and assistant mistresses in future shall be equivalent to three months' notice to determine the agreement."

No express notice of this resolution was given by the authority to the plaintiff, although she heard of it from an outside source.

The plaintiff married on the 9th of August, 1904. She had from the 1st of April, 1903, to the 30th of November, 1904, been paid her salary by the authority.

On the 30th of November, 1904, she received the following letter from the town clerk: "I beg to inform you that the three months' notice, to which under the regulations your marriage was equivalent, having now expired, the salary sent herewith will be your final payment as a teacher on the staff of the Compton Mixed School."

The plaintiff continued to teach down to the month of April, and it was in respect to the salary for this period that she sued the local education authority.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant now appealed.

Education Act, 1900, s. 7, sub-section 1: "The local education authority shall maintain and keep efficient all public elementary schools within their area which are necessary, and have the control of all expenditure required for that purpose other than expenditure for which, under this Act, provision is to be made by the managers; but in the case of a school not provided by them only so long as the following conditions and provisions are complied with: (a) The managers of the school shall carry out any directions of the local education authority as to the secular instruction to be given in the school, including any direction with respect to the number and educational qualifications of the teachers to be employed for such instruction, and for the dismissal of any teacher on educational grounds; and if the managers fail to carry out any such directions, the local authority shall, in addition to their own powers, have themselves the power to carry out the direction in question as if they were the managers; but no direction given under the provision shall be such as to interfere with reasonable facilities for religious instruction during school hours." Sub-section 3: "If any question arises under this section between the local education authority and the managers of a school not provided by the authority that question shall be determined by the Board of Education." Sub-section 7: "The managers of a school maintained but not provided by the local education authority . . . shall (subject to the powers of the local education authority under this section) have the exclusive power of appointing and dismissing teachers."

Rawlinson, K.C. (Mackenzie with him).—Admitting that the contract with the old managers continues with the new managers, still the contract is with the managers, not the local authority. The local authority may be under a statutory obligation to provide funds for the managers, but that would not inure to the benefit of a third party. There is no priority of contract between the local authority and the teacher. It is true the local authority has paid the salary direct, but there is nothing in the Act to compel it to do so; it need only put the managers in funds. The managers could not bring an action themselves against the local authority but would have to proceed as provided by section 7, sub-section 3, and section 16: Young v. Cuthbert, 22 T. L. R. 252. Secondly, if the local authority is bound in the general case to the school teacher the obligation came to an end when the managers did not carry out the direction open to them: section 7, sub-section 1 (a). Thirdly, if this be an action for services rendered, the local authority has paid for services rendered up to the 30th of November, 1904, after which date express instructions were given to the plaintiff that her services would no longer be required; the local authority could only be bound from that date by an express contract which would require to be under seal. Fourthly, assuming a binding contract, the plaintiff was aware of the "resolution," and therefore continued the contract with that condition added.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hence she broke the contract herself on the day of the marriage.

Barlow, for the respondent.—The local authority is a party to the contract, as evidenced by their conduct —(a) payment of salary, (b) the passing of a resolution to bind the plaintiff. The alleged direction was no direction at all. It was not in respect to an "educational ground." The court can construe the section to ascertain what the Legislature meant by an "educational ground," section 7, sub-section 3 notwithstanding.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case of extreme difficulty, and if the view I take of it is not the correct one, it should receive further consideration. As far as I am concerned we are face to face with this question, as to the effect of section 7. Has the education authoriy to make a personal contract between itself and the teachers? After the best consideration I can give I am not satisfied that it has. If the statute to which I am about to refer did not contemplate the providing of money by the local authority for the purposes of the managers, I think there would be a great deal in Mr. Barlow's point that an implied contract might be raised by the mere payment of money by the education authority to the teacher. In ordinary circumstances there arises what has sometimes been called a novation, where it would be held that by arrangement a person not originally a party to the contract, in this case the local education authority takes the place of one of the parties to the original contract, and in his place becomes bound to the other party—in this case the teacher. If this case had to be determined solely by these considerations we might hesitate to reverse the judgment of the county court judge. If that were so we should have to consider the point which I do not think was really for us, as to what is the effect as the education authority purporting to limit the employment of teachers upon grounds which it might be contended was something other than educational qualifications. I think we must not shut our eyes to the scheme of this Act. This is one of those Acts of Parliaments which should be considered as far as possible in respect to its intention and we ought to give effect to the provisions from a reasonable point of view. It was from such a point of view that we have expressed our opinion in respect to an Act of Parliament a little time ago, and the same observation applies to other cases which have come before us. Now, at the time this Act was passed there were teachers who had contracts with managers under ordinary private contracts. The managers would be responsible for the payment of the salaries and would meet the expenditure out of the Government grant or from other sources where the schools were supported by voluntary contribution; but the persons liable to pay would be the managers. Now this Act of Parliament comes in and makes certain changes, which are referred to in this case before us. Whilst it leaves to the old managers the duty of keeping the school in order such as repairing the schoolhouse and other matters, it takes away from them the obligation to provide the funds. We have to consider whether it is a necessary consequence of the provisions regarding the finding of the funds that the State has therefore created a contract between the educational authority and the teacher or whether it has imposed a statutory obligation upon it to pay the salary of the teacher. I am not dealing with the form, but with the substance. I exclude the case of a contract between the teacher and the education authority where the facts clearly show a contract between them; the case which presses me most is this: Does not this statute show that there was a duty upon the educational authority to pay a properly appointed teacher, and this might be put as an action alleging a new appointment by the managers, the rendering of services under that appointment, and the obligation of the local education authority to pay.

If the effect of this statute is that these allegations could be established I think that this action might be maintained and the plaintiff entitled to recover. I think the declaration could be so framed. Without repeating myself, but bearing in view what was the existing state of things, what has section 7 provided? Apart from the direction of novation, Mr. Barlow must find an obligation to pay personally the teacher in section 7. The first words upon which he relies are "and have the control of all the expenditure required for that purpose other than expenditure for which, under this Act, provision is to be made by the managers"; that refers to what I have already stated—viz., providing school accommodation and other matters. Therefore these particular words do not help him at all. [His lordship then read section 7 (1) (a).] It must be stated in Mr. Barlow's favour that if and although the teacher be appointed by the managers and the managers do not dismiss the teacher on "educational grounds," the education authority can so dismiss him. Then comes sub-section 3, as to which I shall say a word later on as to disputes between the local education authority and the managers as to what is an "educational ground." The comes sub-section 7. [His lordship read it.] The power of appointing teachers carries with it the power to fix the salary to be paid by the managers, and although I do not attach too much importance to the practice under the Act, it is a fact that the contracts are made by the managers. Therefore, it seems to me, the statute recognizes the appointment by managers, involving the duty of paying the salary and the dismissal by the managers. It seems to me to be recognized by the statute that the ordinary contractual relationships were to remain as before the Act. Then the words "have the control of all the expenditure required for that purpose," and I assume to these words be added the following "of paying the teacher." Would such words be sufficient to give effect to an implied contract between the education authority and the teacher. In my opinion they would not. I think they point clearly to the expenditure under their control; to provide sufficient funds to meet the demands of the managers. The section indicates that the education authority is the paymaster of the teachers in respect of contracts made between the managers and teachers. Therefore, it seems to me, looking at the existing state of things and the changes made by the Act, that there is not sufficient evidence in the Act of Parliament to displace the primâ facie inference that the contract was in fact made between the managers and the teachers. There is not sufficient evidence that it is correct to take the view that this statute meant the duty to be upon the education authority to pay the teachers, which could be enforced by the teacher by action.

One word on the other point, which does not arise after the decision I have come to, but as at present advised it seems to me that a question between the educational authority and the managers touching the qualifications of a particular teacher from an educational point of view is a matter to be decided under section 7, sub-section 3, and not a matter which can be raised in a court of law. I come to the conclusion that this action fails on the ground that there is no privity of contract by operation of the statute between the teacher and the education authority, and that the mere payment is consistent with the duty that the education authority has to discharge and is not sufficient to establish privity of contract so as to enable the teacher to recover in this action. Therefore, though the point is a difficult one, the appeal must be allowed.

RIDLEY, J.—I must say that I should have been inclined to think that, although the contract was with the managers, still, if it be shown that there is a statutory obligation upon the education authority to provide money to fulfil the contract, a declaration, or, in modern terms, a statement of claim, might be framed. It would be sufficient to prove an obligation on the part of the educational authority to provide money for the fulfilment of the contract. But we must look at section 7. We see the obligation is not an absolute one, and only so long as the managers carry out the directions of the authority "as to the secular instruction to be given in the school, including. . . ." [His lordship read the section.] In the present instance a resolution has been passed which affects the plaintiff, and subjects her to three months' notice. We know that the matter has been submitted to the Board of Education, and has been determined by that board; and, as I understand it, the ground of dismissal was an "educational ground," and it therefore follows that the obligation which arises on the education authority ceased to exist, for it only existed so long as the managers carry out the directions of the education authority. I do not think that there is anything which compels us to say that there is a novation, but an action might have been maintained if it could have been shewn that there was a contract and a statutory obligation imposed by an Act of Parliament providing that a third person must pay. I have nothing more to add to the judgment of my lord.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The section turns on section 7 of the Act of 1902, and it is rather curious when one looks at it that no direct provision is made for the payment of salary to the teacher by anybody at all, neither by the manager or the education authority and the only way in which one can gather that they are to be paid and who is to pay them is by looking at section 7, where it says: [His lordship read section 7, sub-section 1.] The Act does not say the managers are to pay the salaries. The school cannot be kept efficient without teachers and therefore it follows from that that anyone would consider that the education authority should provide the money to pay the teachers. They shall control the expenditure; that gives them very great powers, powers with regard to the teachers, but there is nothing in this Act of Parliament to prevent the education authority, if they choose to do so, paying what they pay in respect of teachers to the managers of the schools, leaving the managers of the schools to pay the teachers according to the agreements that the managers of the schools have with the teachers, for it is the managers who have to engage the teachers, who engaged them before the statute and have to still. It is true that the section gives power to the education authority to exercise some amount of control over the teachers themselves, as to what they teach, as to the number and educational qualifications, but still it is left to the managers to engage and dismiss, and to the local education authority is given the power to control the managers in the doing of these things. Here the education authority did what I understand to be the common practice, they paid the teachers direct, and it is said that for that reason that there was privity between the education authority and the teacher to pay the teacher, and if it did not pay the teacher would sue. I do not think so. I think the claim is as pointed out by my lord and my brother Ridley. Then section 7, sub-section 1, provides "in the case of a school not provided by the education authority only so long as the following conditions are complied with." [His lordship read sub-section 1 (a).] I take a simple case. Suppose the education authority were to say "you are teaching Greek and we won't have Greek taught," and the managers were to decline to obey the directions: "this is a most useful language and we intend to teach it." Then the section says they shall only maintain and keep the school so long as such a condition is complied with as they have the right to exact and they would have the right to say "if you will not accept our instructions we will not provide the money." It seems to me they would have a perfect right. But if Mr. Barlow is right, that would be no control. The statute would not have given the managers the slightest trouble, because the managers would say to the teachers "we cannot pay though we do not mean to satisfy the education authority, but you can bring actions against them; we advise you to bring your action against the education authority. We will provide what to teach, and you bring your action." That is the dilemma which the Act of Parliament could not have contemplated. And that very case seems to have arisen because a statute was passed in 1904 [Education (Local Authority Default Act), c. 18] which says (section 1, sub-section 1 (b)) that "if it appears to the Board of Education that the managers . . . have . . . incurred any expenses for which provision should have been made by the local education authority . . . pay to the managers such amount in respect of these expenses. . ." and such sums shall be a debt due to the Crown from the education authority. It looks as though the very kind of thing what I have put either had happened or it was contemplated would happen, and instead of leaving the teachers to sue the education authority, this statute was passed. It may be the Act was required for other purposes; possibly they refused to pay money for objects other than the salary of teachers; I do not know, but it does seem to me it had in view what I have suggested but I do not say it is conclusive. It may be that there was the remedy advocated by Mr. Barlow and the Act was passed in order to provide a better remedy, or it may be that this statute was absolutely necessary because the teachers could not sue the education authority. I am inclined to think that the statute was passed because the Legislature agreed with our decision that the teachers could not sue the education authority. I agree with the judgments given by my lord and brother Ridley.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for appellant, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for Ellis, Town Clerk of Plymouth.

Solicitor for respondent, Crowders, Vizard, Oldham, & Co., for Shelley & Johns, Plymouth.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Feb. 21.

LAVELL v. RICHINGS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Distress—Implements of trade—"To the value of £5"—Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c 21), s. 4—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 147.

A hired cab is an implement of trade.

Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, s 4, provides: "From and after the passing of this Act the following goods and chattels shall be exempt from distress for rent—namely, any goods or chattels of the tenant or his family which would be protected from seizure in execution under section 96 of the County Court Acts, 1846, or any enactment amending or substituted for the same."

Section 147 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the present operative section referred to in the above statute, provides: "Every bailiff . . . may seize and take any of the goods and chattels of such person (excepting . . . the tools and implements of his trade to the value of £5 which shall to that extent be protected from such seizure)."

Held, that if there be upon the premises only one implement of trade, and no other goods there, although its value exceeds £5 it cannot be distrained for rent, but comes within the protection of section 147 set out above.

This was an appeal from the County Court of Middlesex holden at Southwark.

For the purposes of this case it will only be necessary to state briefly the grounds of appeal, viz.: (1) That a hired cab is not an implement of trade; (2) that its value being admittedly in excess of £5, it does not come within the protection of section 147 of the County Court Act, 1888, although at the time of the distress there were no other goods whatsoever but the cab upon the demised premises.

Francke, for the appellant.—A cab is not an implement of trade; it was only hired, and there was nothing to prevent the cabman pursuing his calling by hiring another cab. Darling, J., refers in Marten v. Fraser, 85 L. T. 611, to the origin of this class of legislation. On the second point there is no decision, but the section seem plain, "tools to the value of £5."

Radcliffe, K.C. (Schwabe with him), for the respondent.—The same argument might be used as to all implements of trade—viz, that the workman might hire tools elsewhere after the distress. The second point turns purely upon the wording of the section. It is submitted that you must protect the tenant to the extent of £5, and if incidentally you must protect him to a greater extent that is the landlord's misfortune.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case raises an interesting point, and I dare say a novel point, although it seems to me it was indirectly before the court in Churchward v. Johnson, 54 J. P. 326. The question is whether the learned county court judge was right in taking the view that a cab, at the time being used by a person who owed the rent, comes within the words "excepting the tools and implements of his trade, which shall to that extent be protected from such seizure." It is admitted that the cab was worth £35, therefore largely in excess of £5, and it is admitted that it was the only thing upon the premises for the distraint. It has been ingeniously argued that this is not an implement of trade because he could go elsewhere and earn his trade by hiring another cab. That may be true in some aspects, but in Fenton v. Logan, 9 Bing. 676, where the question was as to the limited protection of implements of trade, the plaintiff sought to set aside the verdict on the ground that the threshing-machine was an implement of trade in use, and as such privileged from distress. In dealing with the case Tindal, C.J., says: "It was held that materials delivered by a manufacturer to a weaver to be by him manufactured at his home were privileged from distress . . . but that a frame or other machinery delivered by the manufacturer to the weaver for the purpose of being used in the weaver's house . . . was not privileged unless there were other goods upon the premises sufficient to satisfy the rent due."

Therefore I point out that that case recognized two things, that the hired threshing-machine would have been privileged if in use, that it was an implement of trade to which the limited privilege would attach, but that they must go to other articles first. Therefore the cab which this man has hired is properly regarded as an implement of trade. I do not think it is absolutely clear, but it seems to me the learned county court judge came to a right conclusion.

What is the meaning of the section having regard to the limited value? That depends on the words "to the value of £5."

It seems to me that the view of the learned county court judge is the better view, that you must at least leave tools to the amount of £5, and if by accident there are no tools of less value than £5, the protection is not taken away. In order to give effect to Mr. Francke's argument you must go the length of saying that in the case, say, of ten sewing-machines each of the value of £10 there could be no protection because no one of the machines was below the value protected. In Churchward's case, in 54 J. P., a sewing-machine was seized, and Mr. Radcliffe says this point was incidentally referred to; it was a point open to consideration. I come to the conclusion that where there is only one thing upon the premises, and that exceeds £5 in value, the protection applies, and the county court judge was right.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the fact that this is an implement of trade is shown by the analogy of a sewing-machine. On the second point I also agree with my lord that the statute does not only apply to what Mr. Francke contends, where you can seize something of less value than £5; I think it must apply where the thing exceeds £5 in value where that is the only thing to be seized. It must be remembered that in taking away implements of trade the workman may have no trade to which he could go, and that in its turn might lead to a public danger; I think that was the reason of this kind of exemption. But at the same time I have not said, and have not meant to say, in Marten v. Fraser that because that was the original reason therefore the exemption was to be confined to those persons only who could not live without the implements protected. The burden is not cast upon the bailiffs of deciding such a point as that. The section is specific—they are not to take the implements of a man's trade.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for appellant, H. E. Tudor.

Solicitor for respondent, J. Aplin Nicholls.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Darling, JJ.) Oct. 26.

MORLEY v. MAKIN AND OTHERS. (a.)

Principal and agent—Undisclosed principal—Baptist minister—Appointed to the pastorate by a document signed by the deacons of the chapel—Fund insufficient to pay salary—Claim against deacons to make good deficiency.

Held, that the defendants were not personally liable as agents for an undisclosed principal to make up arrears of salary due to the plaintiff, although they had invited him to become pastor of the Baptist chapel of which they were the deacons, and had signed the document under which he became pastor, because there was evidence on the face of the document that the salary of the pastor was to be payable out of the chapel fund, of which fund the plaintiff himself was treasurer, and from which he had paid himself salary as it became due, so long as the fund was sufficient to meet it.

Appeal by the plaintiff against a judgment of the judge of the Hadleigh County Court, who held that the defendants were not personally liable for the sum claimed in the action.

The plaintiff was appointed pastor of a Baptist church by a document signed by the defendants, who were four deacons of the church.

The document, which was dated December, 1901, was in the following terms: "From the Strict Baptist Church, worshipping at George-street, Hadleigh, Suffolk, to Mr. G. W. Morley, minister of our Lord Jesus Christ, we send you Christian greetings. Dear Brother,—In the providence of our Triune God you have been brought into our midst to preach the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour, which has been food to our souls. We, the undersigned, as deacons of the above church, do now invite you to pastorate (authorized by a unanimous vote at our last church meeting. Also at our finance committee meeting a unanimous vote was recorded and a good majority of the congregation) at a present salary of 25s. per week. We regret to state that our present income will not warrant anything higher now, but we hereby promise that if the dear Lord shall prosper us financially you shall be benefited thereby. In case of termination of pastorate by three months' notice. We do earnestly desire and pray that our God will abundantly bless us as a pastor and people, and add to the church daily souls that are eternally saved: John Makin, F. Wright, C. Woods, W. Watson (deacons)."

The fifth defendant was a Mr. Sewell, who was not a deacon, but had taken a leading part in the matter and on whose behalf the notice of dismissal was given to the plaintiff and which the county court judge had held to be valid.

Since 1902 the plaintiff had himself acted as treasurer, and out of the surplus from time to time left in his hands had paid himself the salary due to him. On the 20th of November, 1904, the three months' notice to cease acting as minister was given him. At the termination of the notice £34 13s. 8d. was due to him as salary, and it was this sum that was claimed by him in the action from the four deacons who, it was alleged, were personally liable, as deacons of a Baptist Church, for the salary of the pastor.

C. E. Jones, for the plaintiff.—Under the document of December, 1901, the pastor was to receive a salary of 25s. per week. That document was signed by the deacons of the chapel, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover arrears of salary from them personally as they contracted with him as agents for an undisclosed principal: Burls v. Smith, 7 Bing. 705.

Henlé, for the defendants, was not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—When the facts of this case are fully appreciated it is to my mind clear that the decision come to by the learned county court judge was quite right. No doubt if this had been, as Mr. Jones contended it was, a case of the defendants acting as agents for an undisclosed principal, they would have been personally liable on the document. But this is not that case at all. It is a case where the pastor accepted the pastorate hoping and believing that the congregation would be able to pay him. On the face of the document itself the plaintiff had pointed out to him the fund out of which he was to be paid and there is not a word in it to indicate that the defendants were to be personally liable. We have been told that from 1902 he acted as treasurer and paid himself out of the surplus of these funds the salary due to him. Then he was dismissed, and he turns round and in effect says, "Although I have been paying myself out of these funds, nevertheless I look to you as deacons of the chapel for payment of the balance." As my brother Wills pointed out, it is a fallacy sometimes to say that someone must pay for service rendered, for often a fund and not an individual must be held liable. That was the case here. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the facts here show clearly that this was a class of case in which the judge was justified in holding that the defendants were not liable and dismissing the action.

DARLING, J.—I concur.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Bankes, Ashton, & Holley, Bury St. Edmunds.

Solicitors for the defendants, Birkett, Ridley, & Francis, Ipswich.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills, Darling, Walton, and Jelf, JJ.) Nov. 3.

REX v. PALIN. (a.)

Criminal law—Falsification of an account—Employer's account—Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 24), s. 1.

By the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 24): "Whereas it is expedient to amend the law so as to punish the falsification by clerks, officers, servants, and others of their employers' accounts, books, writings, or documents: Be it enacted . . . (1) That if any clerk, officer, or servant, or any person employed or acting in the capacity of a clerk, officer, or servant shall wilfully and with intent to defraud, destroy, alter, mutilate, or falsify any book, paper, writing, valuable security, or account which belongs to or is in the possession of his employer, or has been received by him for or on behalf of his employer, or shall wilfully and with intent to defraud, make, or concur in making any false entry in, or omit or alter or concur in omitting or altering any material particular from or in any such book or any document or account, then in every such case the person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Held, that in the second part of the section the word "such" governed not only "book," but also the subsequent words "document or account," and in consequence it is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove that the account alleged to have been falsified "belongs to or is in the possession of his employer, or has been received by him for and on behalf of his employer."

Case stated for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved by the chairman of Quarter Sessions for the County Palatine of Lancashire, sitting at Preston.

(1) The defendant was indicted under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 24 (Falsification of Accounts Act), s. 1, the the second part of the section.

(2) The first count of the indictment was: "That Benjamin Higginson Palin, on the 30th day of July in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and five, then being servant to Edmund Arthur Le Gendre Starkie, unlawfully, wilfully, and with intent to defraud did make and concur in making a false entry in a certain account, to wit, an account of certain rabbits delivered by the said Benjamin Higginson Palin to certain tenants of the said Edmund Arthur Le Gendre Starkie, his master, by falsely entering in such accounts twenty-two rabbits as having been delivered by the said Benjamin Higginson Palin to one John Coates, a tenant of the said Edmund Arthur Le Gendre Starkie, whereas in truth and in fact the said twenty-two rabbits were not delivered to the said John Coates, as he, the said Benjamin Higginson Palin, well knew at the time when he made such false entry as aforesaid, and which said entry was in the words and figures following: 'List of rabbits, Coates 22,' against the form of the statute," &c.

(5) At the close of the prosecution counsel for defendant objected that as there was no evidence that the account belonged to or was in the possession of the defendant's employer or was received by him for or on behalf of his employer, the prosecution "had failed to prove an offence under the said statute."

(6) He referred to the preamble of the said statute as defining its scope and purpose, and further contended that the word "such" governed not only "book," but also the subsequent words "document or account."

The prisoner was found guilty, sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. The question for the court was whether the defendant was rightly convicted on the indictment.

No counsel appeared for the defendant.

George Elliott, for the prosecution.—The section makes a difference between book and document or account. Archibald's Criminal Pleading (23rd ed.), p. 592, points out that the account need not belong to or be in the possession of the employer. Section 83 of the Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 29), which deals with the falsification of books, &c., belonging to a public company or body corporate is couched in similar language, and there it states "in any book of account or other document."

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We all think this conviction cannot stand. I express no opinion as to the wording of section 83 of the Larceny Act, or whether that section requires that the documents therein should be the property of the company or not. We have to deal with the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875, and it seems to me that the preamble is important. [His lordship read it.] In this case the prisoner appears to have made a false entry in his own account, and that does not seem to me to fall within the statute. It is quite plain that under the first part of the statute the book, paper, writing, valuable security, or account—the word "document" does not occur there—must be in the possession or constructive possession of the employer; but it is contended that the last part of the section as to making false entries is wider in its scope, and that as it refers to any such book "or any document or account"; it is not essential that the document or account should belong to the employer. That construction would reduce the section to an absurdity and would make the first part of the section unnecessary. To say that it is an offence to destroy, alter, mutilate, or falsify any document belonging to an employer, and also that it is an offence to make a false entry in any document or account, whether belonging to an employer or not, is to make the second and subordinate part of the section far wider than the first part and to go beyond the purview of the Act as declared in the preamble. This conviction must therefore be quashed.

WILLS, DARLING, WALTON, and JELF, JJ., concurred.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitors for prosecution, W. J. & E. H. Tremellen, for Baldwin, Weeks, & Baldwin, Clitheroe.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Feb. 22.

BISGOOD v. NILE VALLEY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Reconstruction—Memorandum of association—Sale of property of company to new company for partly paid-up shares—Winding up—Option to shareholders of old company to take up new shares—Time limit for exercising option—Realization by liquidator of shares not taken up—Division of proceeds among dissentient shareholders—Scheme held ultrà vires.

The defendant company, being in financial difficulties and desiring to raise more capital, proposed to enter into an agreement with a new company for the sale of its property and undertaking to that company in consideration of partly-paid shares therein, and the shareholders of the old company were to have the option of taking these shares in exchange for their existing shares. Shares not accepted within a certain time were to be sold by the liquidator, and the proceeds, after paying expenses, divided rateably among the shareholders who would, had they claimed, have been entitled to those shares. By its memorandum of association the company was empowered to sell its undertaking for shares in any other company, whether wholly or partly paid up, and to distribute the shares in specie. A shareholder in the old company brought an action to obtain a declaration that the agreement was ultrà vires and void, and also for an injunction to restrain the company from carrying into effect any agreement in the terms of the draft agreement.

Held, that the draft agreement was ultrà vires, as not being a sale justified by the provisions of the memorandum, and as being in substance an attempt to force the shareholders to provide more capital under penalty of forfeiting their shares.

Manners v. St. David's Gold and Copper Mines (Limited), [1904] 2 Ch. 593, 53 W. R. Dig. 28, followed.

Motion to restrain the defendant company and its directors from acting upon a resolution passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the company authorizing the directors to enter into a certain agreement for the sale of the assets of the defendant company to a new company upon the terms of the draft agreement.

The Nile Valley Co. (Limited) was incorporated on the 6th of April, 1903, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, with a nominal capital of £250,000, divided into 250,000 shares of £1 each, of which 218,257 were issued as fully paid or credited as fully paid.

The objects for which the company was established, as set out in clause 3 of the memorandum of association, were, inter alia, as follows:

(1) To acquire (from another company) certain mining rights or concessions over lands situate in Egypt, and all other its undertaking and assets, subject to its liabilities.

(2) To carry on the business of an exploration, financial, investment, and mining company in all its branches.

(3) To invest in or upon, subscribe for, purchase, or otherwise acquire and obtain options over, and either conditionally or otherwise, stocks, shares, investments or securities of all classes and descriptions, and whether or not fully paid up, and to make payments thereon as called up, or in advance of calls, and the same to hold, sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of, advertise, deal with, turn to account, give options over and re-acquire from time to time as may be expedient.

(10) To sell, let, dispose of, or deal with the undertaking of the company, or any part thereof, for such consideration as the company may think fit, and in particular for shares, debentures or securities of any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of this company. To distribute any of the property of the company among the members in specie.

(15) To sell, improve, manage, develop, lease, mortgage, dispose of, turn to account, or otherwise deal with all or any part of the property and rights of the company.

(20) To distribute among the members in specie by way of dividend or bonus, or upon a return of capital, any property of the company or any proceeds of sale or disposal of any property of the company, but so that no distribution amounting to a reduction of capital be made except with the sanction (if any) for the time being required by law.

Clause 156 of the articles of association provided that in the event of the liquidation of the company the surplus assets of the company, available for distribution among the members, shall belong to and be divided among the members in proportion to the amounts paid up or credited as paid up on the shares held by them respectively.

157. If the company should be wound up (whether voluntary or otherwise) the liquidators may, with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution, divide among the contributories in specie any part of the assets of the company, and may, with the like sanction, vest any part of the assets of the company in trustees upon such trusts for the benefit of the contributories as the liquidators, with the like sanction, shall think fit, and if thought expedient any such division may be otherwise than in accordance with the legal rights of the contributories of the company, and in particular any class may be given preferential or special rights, or may be excluded altogether or in part, but in case any division other than in accordance with such legal rights shall be determined on, any contributory who would be prejudiced thereby shall have a right to dissent and ancilliary rights as if such determination were a special resolution passed pursuant to section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862.

On the 3rd of February, 1906, the company issued a circular to the shareholders which stated that, the directors having found that the funds in hand were not sufficient to enable the company to bring its operations to a successful issue, had decided to ask the shareholders to authorize the sale of the undertaking and assets of the company to a new company to be incorporated with a capital of £250,000 in 250,000 shares of £1 each. The short heads of the scheme were set out in the circular as follows: (1) All the assets and undertaking of the company are to be sold to the new company for 218,257 shares of £1 each credited as 16s. paid, that is to say, with a liability of 4s. per share. (2) It is then proposed to ask the shareholders to put the company into liquidation so that each shareholder of the present company shall be entitled to subscribe for the one new share credited as 16s. paid for each share now held by him. All shares not subscribed by shareholders will be sold by the liquidator.

A notice dated the 3rd of February, 1906, was given that an extraordinary general meeting of the company would be held on the 12th of February, 1906, for the purpose of considering and, if thought fit, passing the following resolution—viz.: "That an agreement expressed to be made between this company (therein called the old company) and the Nile Valley (New) Co. (Limited) (therein called the new company), proposed to be formed for the purpose of acquiring the assets and liabilities of the old company on the terms therein mentioned, in the form of the draft which has been read and explained to this meeting be and the same is hereby approved, and that the directors be and are hereby authorized to enter into the said agreement with the new company when formed, and to carry the same into effect with such modifications (if any) as they may approve."

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The meeting was held on the 12th of February, when the resolution was passed by the shareholders.

The terms of the draft agreement so far as they are material were as follows:

(1) The old company shall sell and the new company shall purchase as on the 1st day of January, 1906, all and singular the lease, concessions, lands and buildings, plant, machinery, ore, gold, goods, chattels, moneys, credits, shares, debts, bills, notes, and things in action of the old company and the undertaking and business thereof with the full benefit of all contracts and agreements and of all securities in respect of the said things in action to which the old company is entitled and all other the real and personal property of the old company whatsoever and wheresoever.

(3) As a further part of the consideration for the said sale if the old company shall go into liquidation within six calendar months from the date hereof, the new company shall pay and at all times hereafter keep the old company, its liquidators and contributories, indemnified against all the costs and expenses of and incident to the winding up of the old company and of carrying the said sale into effect.

(5) The new company shall allot and issue to the old company or its nominees 218,257 shares in the new company of £1 each, with the sum of 16s. credited as having been paid up thereon, to be numbered 1 to 218,257, both inclusive.

(6) If the old company shall go into liquidation before the said 218,257 shares shall have been allotted to the old company or its nominees the following provisions shall apply and the said shares shall be allotted accordingly:

(a) Every member of the old company (including holders of bearer share warrants) shall in respect of each share therein held by him be entitled as of right to claim an allotment to himself or herself or to his or her nominees of one £1 share in the new company, with the sum of sixteen shillings credited as having been paid up thereon, and the new company shall allot the shares so claimed. The remaining four shillings per share shall be paid as to one shilling when the claim is made, and as to one shilling on allotment, and as to the balance as and when required.

(b) The liquidator of the old company shall, within fourteen days after the old company shall have gone into liquidation, give notice in writing to each registered member of the old company stating the number of shares the member is entitled to claim as of right under this agreement, and the amount per share payable on claiming the same and the situation of the registered office of the new company and the time within which the claim for allotment must be sent in to the new company, and there must be enclosed therewith proper forms of claim addressed to the new company for signature by the member. (The clause also provided that the notice in the case of registered members was to be given by post, and in the case of holders of bearer share warrants such notice was to be given by advertisement.)

(c) A registered member entitled to claim an allotment as aforesaid must claim the same within fourteen days from the date of the notice to be given by the liquidator informing him thereof or within such extended time as may be fixed by the liquidator, and a holder of bearer share warrants entitled to claim an allotment as aforesaid must claim the same within one calendar month from the date of the first advertisement of the notice of such right to claim as hereinbefore provided or within such extended time as may be fixed by the liquidator by sending in to the new company a claim in writing for the allotment of the shares, and such claim must be signed by the member making the same and must be accompanied by a sum of one shilling per share claimed, and where it requests that the allotment of the shares may be made to a nominee or nominees of such member it must be countersigned by such nominee or nominees.

(d) As regards that proportion of the said shares in the new company which members of the old company shall be entitled to claim as aforesaid, but shall not within the periods of fourteen days or one calendar month within such extended time as aforesaid claim, the said liquidator shall use his best endeavours to sell the same for what they will fetch, and the proceeds of sale thereof, after paying all expenses of and incident to the sale, shall be distributed rateably among the members who if they had claimed would have been entitled to such shares in accordance with their rights and interest, and in substitution for such shares the new company shall upon the request of the said liquidator allot to such purchasers the shares sold to them respectively credited as aforesaid, but such request to be effective must be made within three months from the date of the liquidation or such later date as may be agreed upon by the new company.

(e) Any such sale as aforesaid may be made by the said liquidator either by public auction or private contract and either together or in lots and either with or without reserve and subject to any special or other conditions with power to sell parts thereof with calls of additional shares and with power to buy in and resell and generally upon such terms and conditions and in such manner as the said liquidator shall in his absolute discretion think fit.

(12) If within four calendar months from the date hereof 100,000 shares shall not be claimed by the old company or the members of the old company under the provisions of clauses 4, 5, and 6 hereof, the new company may by notice in writing to the old company or its liquidator determine this agreement, in which case neither the old company nor its liquidator nor the new company shall have any claim on any account against the other, except that the old company or its liquidator shall pay the costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the preparation of this agreement and the stamp duty thereon and of and incidental to carrying the said agreement into effect, the formation and registration of the new company and the registration fee and stamp duties in connection therewith.

The resolution to carry this draft agreement into effect having been passed, notice was given of another extraordinary general meeting to be held on the 22nd of February for the purpose of passing a resolution that the company be wound up voluntarily, but before this meeting was held, the plaintiffs, who were dissentient shareholders, thereupon commenced these proceedings, by which they asked for a declaration that the resolution passed at the extraordinary general meeting of the defendant company held on the 12th of February, 1906, was ultra vires, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant company and its directors from entering into and carrying into effect any agreement on the terms and in the form of the draft agreement.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Beebee, for the plaintiffs.—What is attempted to be done by this draft agreement is ultrà vires, and the plaintiffs are entitled to prevent the company from dealing with its undertaking in such a way as to deprive them of their rights under section 133 of the Companies Act, 1862. The attempt in clause 6 (c) of the draft agreement to fix a limit of time within which the shareholders must claim the shares they were entitled to vitiates the agreement. Clause 12 of the agreement is a threat to the shareholders that if they did not subscribe the necessary number of shares the whole agreement would fall to the ground, with the consequence that the company would have to bear a heavy expense for which they obtained no benefit. The whole object of the agreement is to exclude those shareholders who were not willing to come in under the scheme and to forfeit their shares. It is an attempt to get out of the obligation of complying with 161 of the Companies Act, 1862. The question is whether the company had power to do this. The most recent case where such an agreement has been considered is Manners v. St. David's Gold and Copper Mines (Limited), [1904] 2 Ch. 593, where the scheme provided that the members of the old company had an option to take shares in the new company upon which there was a considerable liability, but which they could not be compelled to take, the consequence of refusal being the loss of the existing paid-up shares held by the refusing members, as under the scheme their share of the assets was forfeited and the proceeds handed over to the purchasing company, and it was held that the contract was ultrà vires, and that the whole transaction was a mere device to compel the members to provide additional capital when no further call could be made. It is true that there is a distinction between that case and the present one, in that there the unapplied-for shares were to be sold and the proceeds applied in reduction of the obligation of the new company under the scheme. The agreement in the present case is framed to get round this difficulty, but the effect is the same, as in point of fact the shares that were unapplied for became forfeited, therefore the decision in that case applied. If the purchasing company made default all the expenses would be thrown upon the dissentient shareholders, as the liquidator would have parted with all the assets, except with the money from the realization of the unapplied-for shares which belonged to the dissentient shareholders. The scheme therefore was not one which the court would approve; it was only a device to make shareholders provide further capital. In Mason v. Motor Traction Co. (Limited), [1905] 1 Ch. 419, 53 W. R. Dig. 29, where one of the objects of the company was, as in the present case, to sell its undertaking for shares, it was decided by Buckley, J., that the company could sell for partly-paid shares, as the word "shares" was not confined to shares fully paid. But it had never been held that such a reconstruction as was involved in the present scheme could be carried out.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Shewell Cooper, for the company.—The agreement is in the form that is very commonly used, and the company wish to know whether it is ultrà vires. When the capital of a company is exhausted, further capital must be raised, or the company be wound up. The scheme in the present case has been framed so as to give equal benefit to all the shareholders, who have the option of taking shares in the new company with a small liability, the liquidator selling the shares not taken up and dividing the proceeds among the dissentient shareholders rateably. It is an advantage for the liquidator to be able to deal with the shares in blocks as a better price can be obtained for them thereby. In Postlethwaite v. Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining Co, 38 W. R. 246, 43 Ch. D. 452, it was held that such an option to take shares could not remain open for ever, and that it was only reasonable for the purchasing company to stipulate, and for the liquidator and shareholders of the selling company to agree, that a limited time should be fixed within which alone the option should be exercisable, and also that the scheme was not vitiated by the insertion of a time limit. That was a case under section 161, but the principle is the same whether the agreement is outside or inside section 161. The present case is entirely different from Manners v. St. David's Gold and Copper Mines (Limited). In that case the company got the benefit of the shares that were not taken up; that was the especial hardship in the case, and Romer, L.J., held that the contract was ultrà vires of the selling company because it contained that provision. Cozens-Hardy, L.J., also based his judgment upon the same grounds. That provision is entirely wanting in the present case and, therefore, that case does not apply. The scheme has been framed to give each class of shareholders the maximum they can possibly get, and it ought, therefore, not to be objected to as being ultrà vires. If the precedure provided by section 161 be adopted the company would have to value its assets and the claims made against it, and the dissentient shareholder would then get his share of the balance, but that is a ruinous procedure when, as here, the dissentient shareholder holds only a few shares; instead of this, under the scheme a shareholder obtains his quota of shares with the liability attached, and if he does not take up the shares the proceeds of them, which is much more advantageous for him. Rateably according to their rights and interests means in proportion to the shares held by the dissentient shareholders.

KEKEWICH, J.—I have no doubt that this agreement cannot stand as it is. I do not propose to go through the whole of it. It is admitted that this is not an agreement intended to be effected under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, ss. 161 and 162. There is to be a winding up and the sale of the company's undertaking and assets is to be carried through in that winding up, and through the machinery of the liquidator, but not under the statutory provisions to which I have referred. Therefore we need not inquire what the statute gives. We need not inquire whether this is anything different from what the statute gives, because the statute has nothing whatever to do with it. There is a liquidation of the company which is a voluntary liquidation, and the company is still in existence, still carrying on business, and still entitled to sell, if they have any power at all to sell under the memorandum and articles of association, as a going concern.

The first question is, have they power to sell? That is easily answered. Under sections 10 and 15 of clause 3 of this memorandum of association there is power to sell not only "the undertaking"—which is all that is covered by section 10—but also "all or any part of the property and rights of the company." They might sell the undertaking, or they might sell the whole or any part of the assets as a going concern; and they may sell that, according to section 10, at any rate "for shares." They may sell the undertaking for shares; and I will assume, though it is not expressed, that they may sell any part of the property for shares. That is not expressed, and there may be a small point upon that; at any rate, they may sell their undertaking for shares, and the expression "the undertaking" would cover a great deal. If they may sell for shares they may sell for partly paid-up shares—shares which are not wholly paid up—in some other company. So far there is no difficulty. They might, therefore, make a sale of the whole undertaking and assets of the company to another company for partly paid-up shares in that other company. To work it out properly, all the shares would have to be under the control of the liquidator, but if there were no liquidator, under the control of the directors, in which case they would have to realize those shares as part of the assets of the company, and, after paying the costs and expenses, and, of course, clearing the company from debts, they would have to divide those proceeds among all their shareholders, in proportion to their nominal interests in the company. Of course, a question might arise where shareholders had not paid calls and so on, and the partnership rules would come in; but substantially in a case of this kind, where they are all fully paid up, it would be in proportion to their nominal interest in the company. That would be the proper mode of proceeding. It is not, however, proposed to follow that course in the present case. They propose to allot the shares in the new company direct to the shareholders in the old company. I am not sure that they have the right to do anything of the kind. The shares in the new company are intended to be partly paid-up shares, and I do not see how this old company, or the liquidator, can compel a shareholder in the old company to take shares in the new company, one or more, whether it is the rateable proportion or any other number, imposing thereby a liability. That is a difficulty in the way of the scheme. But that has been foreseen and an attempt has been made to get over it. Those shareholders who are willing to accept partly paid-up shares and the liability, are to have their shares. Then comes the difficulty, what are you to do with those who will not? You cannot force it. You cannot force anything upon them at all. They are entitled to their shares in the assets of the company, including, of course, as it is a winding up, their share in their proper proportion of the proceeds of sale of those shares which are allotted to the consenting shareholders. But it is not proposed to give them anything of that kind. It is proposed, as they are obstinate and refuse to take any allotment—I am not using the word in an offensive sense, because they are entitled to be obstinate and refuse—it is proposed, as they are obstinate and refuse to take an allotment of shares, that they shall have something else. Now, what is that something else to be? Those shares which are not taken are to be sold by the liquidator for what he can get for them. There is a certain time-limit fixed within which the obstinate refusal is to be expressed. There is a certain time within which the liquidator is to sell. As at present advised, I see no objection to a reasonable time-limit in either case, and I see no reason for supposing that the time-limit fixed is not reasonable in either case. But undoubtedly he is to sell—not necessarily, of course, all at once, because probably that would be impossible, but he is to sell when and as he can. But he is to sell. If eventually he has to sell for "an old song," as the saying is, then for "an old song" the shares must go. He has got to realize, and when he has got it all, or, of course, if he prefers, when he has got a substantial sum in hand, he is to distribute it, of course after paying the expenses of the sale. That means, as I understand it, the sale of all those shares which he has sold up to the time of distribution, and if there is no distribution then undoubtedly all of them that have been realized. What remains in his hands is to be distributed among those members who have not come in, the dissenting members—what I have called the obstinate refusing members. They are to have a share in this fund, be it small or be it large.

Now I confess that I cannot follow the meaning of the language in which the rateable distribution is expressed. I am told that it is perfectly clear, and that it only means that all the rights and interests of the shareholders are to be taken into consideration at the time of the distribution. I do not understand what rights and interests have to be taken into consideration, how there can be anything open for discretion. "Rateably" implies that there is some proportion which has to be ascertained; and the proportion, it seems to me, must necessarily be the value that the interest of the particular shareholder receiving his quota bears to the total interest of those who have stood out. I do not think there is any other right or interest to be considered, "rateably" seems to me necessarily to imply that. Therefore, each shareholder in each distribution (and there may be only one distribution) will get his share with the others, his proportion of the proceeds of sale less expenses. That may be extremely unfair to some shareholder whose shares may have been sold for a good price on the market; there may have been a slump, and the rest of the shares may have been sold, as I have said before, for "an old song." Then those shareholders whose shares were sold for "an old song" will have their proportion calculated exactly in the same way as his, though his shares were very likely sold for a larger sum. That seems to me to be unfair and to work injustice. But, apart from that, is this fair to these dissenting shareholders at all? It seems to me that it is (to use a common expression) putting a pistol to their heads and telling them, "If you do not come in, all you will get is your proportion, whatever it may be, of the sale of those shares which are held by dissentient shareholders; if you do come in, you will have to accept shares with a liability, and, if you will not take that—and we admit and must admit that we cannot force you to take that—then you will have to take what you can get in that way, which must be a very small amount. You will have nothing whatever to do with the new company; you will have nothing to do with shares in the new company, of course, because you said you would stand out; all you get is your rateable proportion ascertained in that way." That seems to me to be unfair. I do not propose to go into the rest of the agreement, because I think it all turns on that as a hinge. I think it comes precisely within what Romer, L.J., describes in the case of Manners v. St. David's Gold and Copper Mines (Limited). He says, at the top of p. 606: "It is a scheme whereby the shareholders of a company, who have paid up their shares in full and are not under any liability to furnish any further capital, are told, 'You must pay up more capital, and if you do not, you shall forfeit all share and interest in this company as a going concern.' Such a scheme is wholly improper and ultra vires." The distinction between that case and this is obvious, as, of course, has been relied upon. There the dissenting shareholder would get nothing. The proceeds of sale of their shares was to go to the company, to go away from them altogether. The observations of Romer, L.J., and the observations to be found in the other judgments are of course relied upon here. There is that difference in substance, that here the shareholder is to get his rateable proportion, that is the substance. It seems to me to come to the same thing. The directors in effect say, "You are under no liability, we cannot force you to come under liability, but we can force you and will force you to forfeit your shares."

Whether the shares are forfeited by taking them all away or forfeited by dealing with them in a way that is not sanctioned by any contract between the parties, and not to be even justified by any passage in the memorandum and articles of association, seems to me to be perfectly immaterial. You take away from the shareholders that which is their own. You say to them, "If you do not come in, at any rate you shall not have your shares, you shall have something else," which I do not think will be ascertained fairly, but whether it is ascertained fairly or not it is not in the bond. I think the shareholders are entitled to insist on the bond, and, therefore, I propose to restrain the company from proceeding on the agreement in its present shape. How far alterations will modify all difficulties is another matter, but I do not think the agreement can stand as it is.

An injunction was granted until the trial or further order restraining the company from entering into or carrying into effect the draft agreement.

Solicitors, Bisgood & Marshall; Worthington, Evans, Dauney, & Co.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Feb. 6.

In re VALPY.
VALPY v. VALPY. (a.)

Will—Exemeration—Mortgage debt—Contrary intention —Locke-King's Acts (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69; 40 & 41 Vict. c. 34) —Real Estate Charges Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 69).

A testator, by clause 9 of his will, devised the X estate to specific devisees. By clause 14 he devised the Y estate and all other real and personal estate not by will or codicil otherwise disposed of to trustees on trust for sale and conversion. By clause 15 he directed the trustees to pay out of moneys arising from sale and ready money his debts, except charges and mortgage debts (if any) on property specifically devised, which debts were to be paid primarily out of the property charged therewith. At the dates of the testator's will and death the only mortgage was on the Y estate.

Held, that, the Y estate not being specifically devised within clause 15 of the will, there was a "contrary intention" within the Real Estate Charges Act, 1867, and that the mortgage on the Y estate must be borne rateably by the mixed residuary fund.

Originating summons.

This was a summons to determine questions arising in connection with a will dated the 29th of November, 1894.

The testator died on the 18th of December, 1904.

By clause 9 of his will he devised an estate known as the Thorpe Estate, together with a freehold house No. 15, Finsbury-pavement, to Alicia Valpy for life or until she should marry again with remainder to Oliver Harris Valpy absolutely.

By clause 14 of his will he devised and bequeathed an estate known as the Enborne Lodge Estate and all other his real and personal estate not thereby or by any codicil otherwise disposed of to his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion.

By clause 15 of his will the testator directed that his trustees should, out of the money to arise from the sale and conversion of his said real and personal estate under the trust lastly thereinbefore contained and out of his ready money pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts "except charges and mortgage debts (if any) on property specifically devised, which debts are to be paid primarily out of the property charged therewith," and should also pay or provide for the legacies and annuities thereby or by any codicil bequeathed, and all death duties in respect of his estate or in respect of the devises and bequests in his will or any codicil contained, which devises and bequests should be taken by the devisees and legatees free of duty, and should divide, pay, and transfer the residue of the said money, and he bequeathed the same in the following manner—namely, such part thereof as consisted of the proceeds of sale of his residuary estate other than the Enborne Lodge Estate unto four children, Frederick Harris Valpy, Janet Valpy, Anna Margaret Valpy, and Constance Maitland Valpy, and a grandson Oliver Harris Valpy, in equal shares, and such part of the said money as consisted of the proceeds of sale of the Enborne Lodge Estate unto the said Frederick Harris Valpy, Janet Valpy, Anna Margaret Valpy, and Constance Maitland Valpy in equal shares.

One of the four children was an executor and trustee of the will.

At the date of the testator's will and at the time of his death the only mortgage or charge on his estate was a mortgage on the Enborne Lodge Estate dated the 25th of March, 1868.

At the date of his will and death the testator had no real property other than the Thorpe Estate and the Enborne Lodge Estate and the house in Finsbury-pavement. The object of this summons was (inter alia) to ascertain whether the mortgage debt was to be borne by the Enborne Lodge Estate alone or by the Enborne Lodge Estate and the general residue rateably.

J. M. Paterson, for the executors and trustees.

T. K. Crossfield, for the children interested in the Enborne Lodge Estate other than the trustee.—The only specific devise is that of the Thorpe Estate contained in clause 9 of the will, and the Enborne Lodge Estate is not specifically devised within the meaning of clause 15 of the will. In effect the testator has directed all his debts, except mortgage debts on the Thorpe Estate, to be paid out of the mixed residuary fund. There is, therefore, a sufficient contrary intention within the meaning of the Real Estate Charges Act, 1867, and the mortgage on the Enborne Lodge Estate must be paid out of the mixed residuary fund.

T. J. C. Tomlin, for the grandson.—There is not a sufficient contrary intention within the meaning of of the Real Estate Charges Act, 1867. The Enborne Lodge Estate is specifically devised within clause 15 of the will, and the mortgage debt must therefore be borne by that estate alone: see Nelson v. Page, 17 W. R. 27, 7 Eq. 25; Elliott v. Dearsley, 29 W. R 494, 16 Ch. D. 322.

SWINFEN EADY, J., held, in the first place, that the Enborne Lodge Estate was not specifically devised within the meaning of clause 15 of the will; and then continued: The true construction of clause 15 of the will is that it really amounts to a direction to pay the testator's debts, "except charges and mortgage debts (if any) on the Thorpe Estate," out of the mixed residuary fund. In my opinion that is a "contrary intention" within the meaning of the Real Estate Charges Act, 1867 s. 1. The section provides that on the construction of the will of any person who may die after the 31st of December, 1867, a general direction that the testator's debts shall be paid out of his personal estate shall not be deemed to be a declaration of an intention contrary to or other than the rule established by the Real Estate Charges Act, 1854, unless such contrary intention shall be further declared by words expressly or by necessary implication referring to all or some of the testator's debts or debt charged by way of mortgage on any part of his real estate. The will now in question refers to the mortgage debts (if any) on the Thorpe Estate, and directs all other debts to be paid out of the mixed residuary fund. That is a clear implication that the mortgage debts other than those (if any) on the Thorpe Estate are included in the general direction to pay the debts.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There is, therefore, a "contrary intention" within the Real Estate Charges Act, 1867, and the mortgage debt on the Enborne Lodge Estate must be borne rateably by the mixed residuary fund.

Solicitors, Valpy, Peckham, & Chaplin; Dimond & Son.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) Dec. 12.

REX v. SOMERS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Highways—Rights of way—Declaration of road to be a public highway—Consent of "occupier"—Construction—Certiorari—Highways Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61), s. 36.

Section 36 of the Highways Act, 1862, enacts: "Where the inhabitants of any parish are desirous of undertaking the repair of any driftway, or private carriage or occupation road, within their parish, in return for the use thereof, the district surveyor may, at the request of the inhabitants of such parish assembled in vestry duly convened for the purpose, and with the consent in writing of the owner and occupier of every part thereof, apply to the justices in petty sessions to declare such driftway or road to be a public highway to be repaired at the expense of the parish . . ."

Held, the owner and occupier of the road, whose consent in writing must be obtained in writing, does not include persons who have mere rights of way or easements over the road.

Rule nisi calling upon certain justices of the peace for the county of Somerset to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into this court all and singular the orders under the hands and seals of the said justices, and bearing date on or about the 12th day of December, 1904, whereby, in pursuance of the provisions of the statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 61, s. 36, it was ordered and declared that the private carriage and occupation road, as therein fully described, was a public highway to be repaired at the expense of the parish of Bleadon, upon the following grounds: (1) The said order was made without jurisdiction; (2) the General Estates Co. (Limited) are occupiers jointly with the Great Western Railway Co. of the said road, and their consent in writing was not obtained, and they at no time had notice of the application to the justices at petty sessions to declare the said road a public highway to be repaired at the expense of the parish; (3) The provisions of section 36 of the Highway Act, 1862, were not complied with in that no consent in writing as required by the section was obtained from the owners and occupiers of every part of the said road.

The rule was moved on behalf of the General Estates Co. (Limited). The road in question was a portion of a driftway set out under the Bleadon Enclosure Award made under the Act 28 Geo. 3, c. 14.

The Bristol and Exeter Railway Co., whose successors in title are the Great Western Railway Co., had acquired the freehold. By a deed of covenant dated the 7th of January, 1863, the Bristol and Exeter Railway Co. granted to one Henry Davies, a predecessor in title of the General Estates Co. (Limited), his heirs and assigns, a right of way for all purposes over the road in question for ever in consideration of the sum of £50, and a covenant by him, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to keep and preserve the said road in good and substantial repair at all times for ever thereafter.

Subject to the payment of certain charges to the General Estates Co. (Limited), for traffic other than foot passengers the public have for upward of forty years used the said road, which has been regularly kept in repair by the said company. The order of the justices was made on the 12th of December, 1904, with the consent in writing of the Great Western Railway Co., but the General Estates Co. (Limited) did not receive any notice of the application to the justices, nor did the said company give their consent in writing. The justices did not show cause by counsel, but filed an affidavit, paragraph 10 of which was as follows: "It was proved to our satisfaction on the reading of the said consent (i.e., the consent of the Great Western Railway Co.) that the only right which the General Estates Co. (Limited) had over the said road was a right of way which had been granted by the Bristol and Exeter Railway Co., the predecessors in title of the Great Western Railway Co., to the General Estates Co. (Limited) or their predecessors in title, and further, that there were numerous other owners and occupiers of land on the western side of the Great Western Railway Co.'s main line from Bristol to Exeter who from time immemorial had had and exercised rights of way and passage for agricultural purposes over the said private carriage or occupation road, and we were of opinion that parties having a mere right of passage over the said roadway are not occupiers or owners of any part of the said road within the meaning of the said Act."

The case is only reported on the question of the meaning of the word "occupier" within section 36.

Macmorran, K.C. (Bonsey with him), for the Axbridge Rural District Council.—The words owner and occupier refer to the owners of the servient tenement, not of the dominant tenement. It is the owners of the land over which the road passes whose consent is necessary, because they are giving up their private use of the road to the public, the compensation being that the road is to be henceforth repaired at the expense of the public. Persons with mere rights of way over the road do not require to be protected; they can use the road after it becomes a public highway and suffer no loss.

Russell, K.C. (Mackenzie with him).—The word "occupier" has reference to those who have rights over the land, not to persons who grant the rights. The persons with rights over the land are an ascertainable number, whether great or small, and the fact that in this case there are a large number of persons with various rights is only a difficulty in the way of obtaining the requisite consent. The word occupier occurs in section 68 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, and was construed to mean, in favour of my present argument, a person lawfully upon the highway: Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. Wallis, 14 C. B. 213, at pp. 223, 224. This case has been approved constantly: see Charman v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 37 W. R. 8, 21 Q. B. D. 524, at p. 527, Lord

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Esher, M.R.: "The decision in Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. Wallis was, I think, a strong decision, but it was the decision of a very strong court. It amounts to this, that if a man is driving his cattle along a road which runs alongside a railway, or even allowing them to be upon it, he is entitled to protection under section 68 as an 'occupier' of land adjoining the railway."

They referred also to Selby v. Crystal Palace District Gas Co., 10 W. R. 636, 31 L. J. Ch. 595.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case raises a difficult point. It must be decided upon general principles of law. I do not think the mere reading of the section enables one to say definitely which side is right. The view I take is that the rule must be discharged. But I can quite understand that persons could come to a different conclusion if they did not follow the force of the views which I am about to express as to the construction of the section. [His lordship read the section set out above.] It is contended that the consent of people who have special rights in respect of any "drift way or any private carriage or occupation road" must be obtained even though the rights be those of a licensee or owner of an easement, not an occupier or owner of the road in the legal sense of ownership of the land over which the road passes. My view of the section is that it deals with certain limited rights over property which is, under nearly all circumstances, in the occupation of somebody else than the owner. It deals with a "drift way," which is, I think I am correct, a right of driving cattle; with a "private carriage road" which is obviously through private property, with an "occupation road," a road through fields which persons have the right of using, the fields still remaining in the occupation of the persons who farm the land. It is contemplated that the road is going to become a public highway, and, in exchange for the use of the road by the inhabitants they are going to bear the expense of the repair and maintenance of the road. It seems to me that persons only entitled to rights of using the road ought to have nothing to say in the matter. There could be no right of compensation in such a case, as suggested by counsel. They still have the right of way, but now in common with others, and they could not be compensated for refraining from adopting a dog-in-the-manger attitude, although, of course, if a man says, "I have a short cut to the railway station, and rival traders have to go round a longer way," I can understand it being urged he would be placed in a worse position than he was before. I do not think the section is dealing with persons who had a mere right of way. I think the section is dealing only with servient owners, who, in consideration of permitting all the inhabitants of the parish to use the road, instead of as formerly some few persons, are to be relieved of the burden, if any, of maintaining the road. These rights of way over these roads are not the rights of the "owner or occupier" within the meaning of that section. The people to be protected, and whose consent therefore is necessary, seem to be the owners of the property, not the persons with mere rights of way. With regard to the Chalmers case and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway case, cited by Mr. Russell, they are cases referring to an entirely different branch of law. Whatever may be the liabilities of railways to protect cattle from straying on to their lines, it can afford no help to us to discover who are the occupiers contemplated by section 36. I quite agree that for many purposes the word "occupier" may be used for people using the road, as in the illustration I referred to in the course of the argument—namely, a driver of a carriage, as the carriage passes along the road. But to say that the expression is used in other branches of the law does not render assistance. I come to the conclusion that in this case there was the consent of all persons who properly came within the term "occupier" of the road. The rule must be dismissed.

LAWRANCE and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Rule dismissed.

Solicitors for the Axbridge Rural District Council, Mead & Co., for F. Wood, Wrington.

Solicitor for the appellant, G. M. Percy.

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) — Dec. 8.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. COOK. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Inhabited house duty—Separate dwellings—Revenue Act, 1903 (3 Ed. 7, c. 46), s. 11, sub-section 1 (a).

A house was divided into separate sleeping "cubicles" to accomodate 343 working men, each man having a separate cubicle, arranged on three landings round a central hall, with reading and dining-rooms, &c., on the ground floor which were used in common by the inmates.

Held, that these cubicles were sleeping places, and could not properly be said to be places in which anybody dwelt, and were in consequence not separate dwellings within the meaning of section 11 of the Revenue Act, 1903.

Case stated by Commissioners of Income Tax upon an appeal against two assessments to inhabited house duty, of which the following sections of the statutes and facts are material:

By section 11 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1903, it is enacted (so far as it has a bearing on this case) that "(1) Where a house, so far as it is used as a separate dwelling-place, is used for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings (a) the value of any dwelling in the house which is of an annual value below £20 shall be excluded from the annual value of the house for the purpose of inhabited house duty; (2) the provisions of this section, as respects dwellings of an annual value not exceeding forty pounds shall not take effect with regard to any such dwelling unless such a certificate as to accommodation and sanitary condition is produced . . . as is mentioned in section 26, sub section 2, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1890."

Section 26, sub-section 2, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1890 (which was repealed by section 17 of the above-mentioned Act), provided: "The assessment to inhabited house duty of any house originally built or adapted by additions or alterations, and used for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings for persons at rents not exceeding for each dwelling the rate of seven shillings and sixpence a week and occupied only by persons paying such rents, shall be discharged by the said commissioners, provided that a certificate of the medical officer of health . . . shall be produced to them to the effect that the house is so constructed as to afford suitable accommodation for each of the families or persons inhabiting it, and that due provision is made for their sanitary requirements."

By section 4, sub-section 1, of the Customs and Revenue Act, 1891, the words "where the annual value of each dwelling shall not amount to twenty pounds" are substituted for the words "for persons at rents not exceeding for each dwelling the rate of seven shillings and sixpence a week and occupied only by persons paying such rents" in the above-recited section.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The premises forming the subject of appeal were buildings erected by the appellants under the powers conferred by Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, for the purpose of providing accommodation for men of the working classes. They contained accommodation for 343 men, and consisted of separate dwelling-rooms or cubicles arranged on three landings round a central hall or covered yard, reading and dining-rooms, scullery, lavatories, baths and washhouse, catering department, office and quarters for superintendent and staff. The walls of the sleeping-rooms or cubicles extended up to the ceiling, except upon the side nearest the landing, on which side there was an opening about eighteen inches high between the wall and the ceiling for light and ventilation. The door of every sleeping-room or cubicle was fitted with a bolt in the inside, and each sleeping-room or cubicle provided separate and private sleeping accommodation for one man, not more than one man being allowed to occupy each. The occupant was allowed to use the other apartments and offices, except the quarters for superintendent and staff. A charge of 6d. a night was made for each sleeping-room or cubicle and for use of the other departments and offices, but many of the occupants had occupied the same sleeping-room or cubicle for years continuously. The sleeping-rooms or cubicles were furnished, were cleaned, and the beds therein made by the staff, and the halls (of which there were three) were used in common by the occupants of the sleeping-rooms or cubicles by way of access thereto. The other rooms used in common were on the ground floor, and communicated internally with the entrance-hall. A separate locker for the use of each occupant was provided in a common room on the ground floor. The dining-room was used in common by the occupants for taking their meals, which might be obtained at a shop on the premises or otherwise, and in the lodgers' kitchen, which was used by the occupants for the preparation of their food and for washing up, was a hot plate, on which they were at liberty to cook their own food. Crockery, spoons, knives and forks were provided by the appellants for the use of such occupants as did not provide their own. The lavatories were used by the occupants in common for their personal ablutions. The bath rooms, which were separated and enclosed, were used separately by any occupant on payment of one penny. The washhouse was used in common by the occupants for cleansing their clothes.

There was a catering department, consisting of a kitchen and scullery (other than the lodgers' kitchen and scullery), in which food was prepared and cooked, a larder and storeroom, in which it was stored, and a shop; but the occupants of the sleeping-rooms or cubicles were not allowed access to this department, except to the shop window, which opened into the dining-room. Cooked and uncooked food was sold at the shop to the occupants between 6 a.m. and 10 p.m., the catering arrangements being in the hands of the superintendent of the house.

The greater number of the occupants of the sleeping-rooms or cubicles paid their rent each night, but many paid it weekly, and a large number had occupied sleeping-rooms or cubicles for periods varying from thirteen years to three months.

The rules provided (inter alia) that single night tickets might be obtained and also periodical tickets for a period not exceeding seven nights; that lodgers should be admitted to the dormitories at intervals of a quarter of an hour from 7 p.m; that cubicles must be vacated before 8.30 a.m. on week days and 9 a.m. on Sundays. Smoking or the use of lights in the cubicles or dormitories was strictly prohibited. A certificate as to the accommodation and sanitary condition of the buildings had been given by the medical officer of health.

The commissioners held that the premises were not a house used for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings, and confirmed the assessment.

Macmorran, K.C. (Ryde with him), for the appellants.—It is submitted that the principle laid down in the case of Seaman v. Lee, 68 L. J. Q. B. 593, 47 W. R. Dig. 77, governs this case; there the separate dwellings were not structurally completely severed from each other, and certain parts of the house were used in common.

Sir E. H. Carson, S.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the respondents.—That case was quite different on the facts; there the tenant had complete control of his own dwelling. Here the cubicles are not separate dwellings at all, and more like the rooms of a hotel.

WALTON, J.—I think this is a reasonably clear case. It may be that houses of this character ought to have the benefit of some exemption either total or partial. I have only to determine whether this particular house is exempt under the existing legislation. In order to bring the case within the statute it seems to me that it is plainly necessary to make out that the cubicles in question are dwellings, i.e., separate dwellings; if they are not, the case does not fall within it. [His lordship here stated the facts substantially as set out in the case.] It seems plain to me that what is provided on the three upper floors of the house is sleeping accommodation only, while on the ground floor there is accommodation of a different kind, that is to say, reading and dining-rooms, sculleries, lavatories, baths, washhouse, catering department, and servants' quarters. In my opinion the cubicles are merely sleeping places and cannot be properly styled separate dwellings. It has been contended for the appellants that a house is not an inhabited dwelling-house unless somebody sleeps in it, or at any rate that sleeping accommodation is the test to apply, in the sense that there must be accommodation for sleeping, whether anyone actually slept there or not; that a dwelling-house is not a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act of Parliament unless there is sleeping accommodation provided. But it does not necessarily follow that that which is a bedroom and nothing but a bedroom is a dwelling. As I am of opinion that these cubicles were sleeping places, and could not be properly said to be places in which anybody dwelt, it follows that they were not separate dwellings within the meaning of the section and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for applicant, Seager Berry.

Solicitor for respondent, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) — Dec. 8.

NICHOLLS v. MALINS. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Inhabited house duty—Office for professional purpose—48 Geo. 3. c. 55. Schedule B, r. 2—57 Geo. 3, c 25, s. 1—House Tax Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36), Schedule—Customs and Inland

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Revenue Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15) s. 13, sub-section 2.

The respondent occupied premises consisting of a dwelling-house and an office; the latter he used for professional purposes, the former as a residence. Both buildings were within the same curtilage, and there was only one entrance from the street, which was common to the office and dwelling-house. The building of the office was not physically joined to the house, nor was there any covered passage between the two, though they were within the same curtilage; persons passing from one to the other had not to go outside the curtilage.

Held, that this office was not so separate and so distinct as to be a tenement within the meaning of sub-section 2 of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, and that it was therefore not entitled to the exemption given by that sub-section.

Case stated by commissioners of income-tax upon appeal against an assessment to inhabited house duty. The following are the material facts found in the case:

The premises consisted of a dwelling-house fronting the public street, with the usual domestic out-offices, yards and garden, &c., and also a building in the same curtilage, which was used by the respondent as an office only, for the purpose of his profession as a solicitor, and as holder of his public appointments, the respondent being the owner and occupier of the whole of the premises. On the south side of the dwelling-house, and under a portion of its upper storeys was a passage three feet wide, leading from the street to the yard; the yard was also on the south side of the dwelling, and at the west end of the yard was the building used as an office. The front door of the house was in the passage, and on its north side, and at the end of the passage nearest the street was an outer door, which remained open all day, but was locked about 11 p.m.; the locking of this door shut off all communication between the street and the whole of the premises, including the dwelling and the office. The outer door had to be opened in the morning by one of the domestic servants before the respondent's clerks could get to the office. There was also another door in and across the passage on the inner side of the front door to the house, which was kept open during the day, but was locked at night earlier than the outer door next the street, the key being taken into the dwelling.

Access to the whole premises was obtained by the outer door next the street, to the dwelling by the front door in the passage, and also by a back door leading out of the yard into the back part of the house, and reached by passing through the two doors in and across the passage, to the office by a door opening in to it from the yard, and also reached by passing through the same two doors in the passage. There was no internal communication whatever between the office and the dwelling, and the former could only be reached from the latter by going out of either the front door or back door and crossing the yard and entering the entrance-door of the office.

The premises used as the dwelling were old, and the office was built long afterwards by the respondent, in what was then the yard of the house, for use as an office only; the office had never been used as a dwelling, and no one slept in it. The respondent could, if he chose, let off the dwelling to a tenant, retaining the office for his own purposes, or he could let the office and retain the dwelling. When the entrance-door to the office from the yard was closed no one from the dwelling could enter it. The respondent interviewed clients and officials on business matters in the house only on occasions when the office was closed. Letters, notices, and documents relating to business and official matters were, when the office was closed, delivered at the dwelling.

The commissioners were of opinion that no liability to inhabited house duty existed in respect of the office, and restricted the assessment to the duty on £45, the annual value of the remainder of the premises.

The surveyor of taxes appealed.

Sir E. H. Carson, S.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the appellant.—This case falls within the provisions of rule 2 of Schedule B of the House Tax Act, 1808, and the schedule to the House Tax Act, 1851. There is only one house. Both office and residence is within the same curtilage. To come within the purview of section 13, sub-section 2, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, the office in question must be separately occupied.

Grant v. Langston, [1900] A. C. 383; Browne v. Furtado, [1903], 1 K. B. 723, 51 W. R. Dig. 66; London and Westminster Bank v. Smith, [1902] 87 L. T. 244; and Russell v. Coutts, [1881] 9 R. 261, were referred to.

The respondent did not appear.

WALTON, J.—The question which I have to decide is whether the respondent's office is to be included in the valuation of the dwelling-house; in other words, whether in point of fact the office constitutes a part of the dwelling house, which is the subject-matter of assessment.

In order to fall within the statute the property must come within the description in the schedule of the House Tax Act, 1851, "an inhabited dwelling-house, with household and other office, yards and gardens therewith occupied," and consideration must also be given to the rules for Schedule B of the House Tax Act, 1808 (which are still applicable), rule 2 of which says that "every coachhouse, stable, brewhouse, washhouse, laundry, woodhouse, bakehouse, dairy, and all other offices, and all yards, courts, and curtilages, and gardens, and pleasure-grounds, belonging to and occupied with any dwelling-house, shall, in charging the said duties, be be valued together with such dwelling-house."

In the present case the office was within the same curtilage as the dwelling-house. I need not describe the premises in detail. There was only one entrance from the street, and it was common to the office and dwelling-house. The office and the dwelling-house were used together for the purpose of residence, and also for professional purposes; the house was at times used partly as an office, and the office was no doubt used exclusively for professional purposes. In a sense there was no structural communication between the house and the office; that is, the building of the office was not physically joined to the house, nor was there any covered passage between the two, though they were within the same curtilage. Persons going to either had to pass through the same external door, and to pass from one to the other had not to go outside the curtilage. I have come to the conclusion that unless the office falls within some exemption it must be included in the valuation of the dwelling-house.

That being so, the only exemption under which it is suggested that is it capable of being brought is that created by section 14, sub-section 2 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, which provides that "every house or tenement which is occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit, shall be exempted from the duties by the said commissioners upon proof of the facts to their satisfaction." In that sub-section "tenement" included part of a house. There is no doubt that the office was occupied solely for the purpose of a profession; the question therefore arises whether it was a "tenement" which was occupied solely for that purpose. The question of what kind of a tenement or what kind of a part of a house comes within sub-section 2 has been considered in several cases, and amongst others in a Scotch case of Russell v. Coutts, and the view expressed by the Lord President on this point has been adopted by the House of Lords; it was in these words: "The meaning of the word 'tenement' in this statute is a part of a house so divided and separated as to be capable of being a distinct property or a distinct subject of lease." In the same case Lord Shand said: "I think the line must simply be drawn by looking at the particular premises, and ascertaining whether they are so structurally shut off from the rest of the building occupied as to form an entirely separate tenement of themselves." Obviously that means having regard to the existing conditions under which the premises are used and with such access as they now have to the street. I have come to the conclusion that this office is not so separate and so distinct as to be a tenement within the meaning of sub-section 2, and that it is not entitled to the exemption given by that sub-section; this appeal must therefore be allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

K. B. Div. (Channell, J.) } Nov. 3, 6, 23.

COMPANIA NAVIERA VASCONGADA v. CHURCHILL & SIM.

COMPANIA NAVIERA VASCONGADA v. BURTON & CO. (a.)

Bill of lading — Goods shipped in apparent damaged condition — Misstatement — "Shipped in good order and condition" — "Quality and measure unknown" — Estoppel — Harter Act, 1893 (U.S.)

A master of a vessel signed bills of lading in reference to goods shipped on his vessel as "shipped in good order and condition" and "quality and measure unknown." The charter-party provided a form of the bill of lading to be used, in which was inserted both these terms. The goods were in apparent damaged condition when shipped, and were delivered in a damaged condition. The indorsees of the bills of lading, to whom the property passed, acting on the statement in the bills of lading, acted to their prejudice by taking the bills of lading as a good delivery under their contract with the shippers. The indorsees, in an arbitration with the shippers — a foreign firm, who were not insolvent — obtained an award, but had not sued upon it. Owing to the damaged condition of the goods, expense and delay were incurred in allotting the parcels to the indorsees.

Held, that the master by so signing the bills of lading bound his owners; that it was the duty of the master to notice the apparent condition of the goods; that "condition" referred to external and apparent condition; and "quality" referred to that which was not usually apparent, at all events to an unskilled person; that the words "quality and measure unknown" did not strike out the words "good order and condition"; that the master was not bound by the charter-party to make an untrue statement; that the words "shipped in good order and condition" could not be sued on directly as a breach of contract, they were words not of promise but in the nature of an affirmation of fact; that the owners were estopped from denying the condition of the goods as stated; and that the indorsees were not bound to sue upon their award against the shippers before suing the owners of the ship.

Actions tried in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs' claims were for amounts due for freight and dock dues.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the vessel Virgen de Lourdes; the defendants were indorsees of bills of lading in reference to certain timber carried on board the said vessel.

By a contract dated the 26th of November, 1904, Messrs. Reeves, Powell, & Co. (Limited), agreed to sell to Messrs. Churchill & Sim certain timber for shipment January and February, 1905. ". . . sellers guarantee that the wood shall be shipped fresh and merchantable and equal to the average of the season's shipments from Port Arthur, Texas, where the shipment is to be made. Payment of amount of invoice (after deducting . . .) to be by cash less 2 per cent. discount on presenting the invoice, bill of lading, and policy of insurance. . . ."

By a charter-party dated New Orleans, the 9th of November, 1904, it was agreed between the owners of The Virgen de Lourdes and Reeves, Powell, & Co. (Limited) that the vessel should take a cargo of sawn pitch pine to Holland, completing at one port on the east or west coast of the United Kingdom. By clause 6 it was provided that: "The bills of lading shall be prepared by the shippers of the cargo in the form indorsed on this charter, and shall be signed by the master, quality and measure unknown, freight and all conditions, clauses, and exceptions as per this charter." Clause 19 provided that: "The master shall sign for the number of pieces shipped, and the owner shall be responsible for the number of pieces so signed for by the master or his duly authorized agent, fraud, clerical, and other obvious errors excepted. . . ."

Indorsed on the charter-party was a printed form of a bill of lading which contained the following clauses: "Shipped in good order and condition"; "to be delivered in like good order and condition"; "quality and measure unknown."

The timber prior to and at the time of shipment was in apparent damaged condition, being saturated with petroleum.

The defendants were indorsees of two bills which were as follows: "Shipped in good order and condition by Reeves, Powell, & Co. (Limited) in and upon the . . . steamship . . . Virgin de Lourdes . . . now lying in Port Arthur, and bound for London, England, viâ other loading ports, as per charter dated New Orleans, La., Nov. 9, 1904 . . . pieces of sawn pitch pine timber . . . (branded R. P., marked Y. with red paint) . . . and to be delivered in like good order and condition at the aforesaid Port of London, Eng. . . unto order of shippers or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the same as per charter-party dated Nov. 9, 1904, all the terms and exceptions contained in which charter are herewith incorporated and form part hereof. . . . This bill of lading is subject to all the terms and provisions of and to the exemptions from liability contained in the Act of Congress of the United States . . . approved 13th day of February, 1893 . . . dated in Port Arthur, Texas, January 12th, 1905. Quality and measure unknown."

The Act of Congress of the United States (13th February, 1893) is known as the Harter Act. The Harter Act, 1893, section 4, provides: "That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners, masters, or agent of any vessel transporting merchandize or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to issue to shippers of any lawful merchandize a bill of lading, or shipping document, stating, among other things, the marks necessary for identification, number of packages, or quantity, stating whether it be carrier's or shipper's weight, and apparent order and condition of such merchandize or property delivered to and received by the owner, master, or agent of the vessel for transportation, and such document shall be primâ facie evidence of the receipt of the merchandize therein described."

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The property in the bills of lading passed respectively to the defendants.

On arrival the timber was found to be stained and saturated with petroleum. Its marks were indistinguishable.

The defendants, acting on the statement in the bills of lading that the timber was shipped in "good order and condition," accepted the bills of lading and took delivery, and paid the vendors the contract price. Owing to the obliteration of the marks and the condition of the timber delay and expense was caused in allotting the parcels, and warehouse rent was incurred. The timber not being in accordance with the contract the defendants and the shippers went to arbitration and an award was made in favour of the defendants. That award was not proceeded with, though the shippers, a foreign firm, were not insolvent.

The defendants counterclaimed for the depreciation in the value of the goods; for the cost of sorting; for the warehouse rent, and for interest on the money paid to the vendors during the time the timber was lying unsorted and unsaleable.

The defendants admitted the claim for freight.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Chaytor, for the defendants.—By virtue of the Bills of Lading Act the defendants could sue. They were entitled to damages because the contract in the bills of lading was to deliver the timber in good order and condition (excepting perils of the sea) and of that contract there had been a breach: Leduc v. Ward, 36 W. R. 537, 20 Q. B. D. 475. Having signed the bills of lading "shipped in good order and condition" the shipowner, by the master, is estopped from denying that condition. Persons who received such bills of lading were intended to act upon such a statement. In fact the defendants did so act, and acted to their prejudice, for they accepted the bills as a good delivery and paid the contract price to the vendors: Grant v. Norway 10 C. B. 665, 20 L. J. C. P. 93; Howard v. Tucker, 1 B. & Ad. 712; Grafton Sear v. Wingate, 85 Mass. Rep. 103, 3rd Allen; Cox v. Bruce, 35 W. R. 207, 18 Q. B. D. 147. There was an obligation on the master to state the apparent order and condition of the goods shipped, by virtue of the Harter Act, s. 4, which was incorporated into the bills of lading. Though the damaged condition was apparent, the master signed for the goods as in "good order and condition." The incorporation of that Act created a contractual duty on the owners to state correctly the apparent condition to the defendants. There was an incorrect statement and damage followed. There is no necessity for the defendants to get the award satisfied before suing the plaintiffs; the defendants have not been paid their loss.

Scrutton, K.C., and Dawson Miller, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs delivered the timber in the same state as it was shipped. The words "good order and condition" were struck out by the words "quality and measure unknown": Properino Palasso, 2 Asp. M. C. 158; The Ida, 2 Asp. M. C. 551. The master considered that the oil did not cause damage—that was an honest mistake throwing no liability on the shipowner: Craig & Rose v. Delargy, 6 Ret. 4 Sess. Cas. 1269; Cox v. Bruce. Even if the statement as to the timber being in good order and condition was untrue, the shipper could not sue on the bill of lading as he caused the damage himself. As the indorsee had only the rights that the shipper had, the indorsee could not sue: Cox v. Bruce; Craig & Rose v. Delargy. There is no estoppel. There was no duty between the shipowner and indorsee other than contractual rights by indorsement. For estoppel there must be duty. Some documents, for instance a Lloyd's certificate, sometimes contain incorrect statements which are intended to be acted upon and are acted upon, yet do not amount to estoppels: Thisdon v. Tindall, 40 W. R. 141, 7 Asp. M. C. 76; Braginton v. Chapman, 7 Asp. M. C. 76 (note); Le Lievre v. Gould, 41 W. R. 468, [1893] 1 Q. B. 491. Section 4 of the Harter Act imposes a duty to state the apparent condition, but the words primâ facie evidence show that the statement can be contradicted. The defendants, having an award against a solvent firm, have suffered no damage. That award should be proceeded with before suing the plaintiffs. The defendants have no cause of action.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 23.—CHANNELL, J.—The actions were brought to recover the freight on three parcels of timber carried under three bills of lading, the defendants Churchill & Sim being the indorsees of two bills of lading, and the defendants John Burton & Co. of the third. The facts as to all three parcels were the same. The actions were consolidated, and the freight being admitted subject to counterclaims, the only question in dispute arose on the counterclaims. The bills of lading stated in the common form that the timber was "shipped in good order and condition." It is alleged that it had been damaged prior to the shipment, and the question principally argued was as to what remedy, if any, the indorsee of the bill of lading had against the shipowner under such circumstances. It is surprising to find that a question so likely to arise has not been settled long ago, but it seems not to have been, and I therefore took time to consider the authorities. There are other questions in the case which it will be convenient to deal with first, as if they are decided in favour of the plaintiffs the main question does not arise. The timber on its arrival was found to be badly stained and saturated with petroleum, and there is no doubt that it became so stained whilst it was being brought alongside for shipment or when alongside ready for shipment, but before it was taken on board. The plaintiffs contended that, notwithstanding the staining, the timber could properly be described as shipped in good order and condition, because they said the petroleum would not necessarily damage it, and for some purposes, such as that of its being used for piles, it was as good as if not so stained and saturated. It was, however, clear on the evidence that the selling value of the timber was seriously depreciated, and it had not been intended for piles. In my opinion, not only was there damage in fact, but it was damage of such a character that it must have been apparent to any one. It was in fact noticed at the time of shipment. The mate made note of it in his log and says that he drew the captain's attention to it. The captain, whose evidence was taken some time after the mate had given his account and after it was admitted by every one that the damage could not have been done on board, denies the mate's statement and endeavours to make out that he formed the opinion at the time that there was no damage. In the face of the other evidence I cannot accept the captain's account. In my opinion it was a misstatement to say that the timber was shipped in good order and condition, and, if necessary, I should be prepared to find that it was a negligent misstatement. It is next said that this statement was qualified or neutralized by the words coming lower down: "Quality and measure unknown." For this Mr. Scrutton quoted The Ida, 32 L. T. Rep. 541, and Craig v. Delargy, 16 Sc. L. R. 751, where somewhat similar words were held to qualify what would otherwise have been an admission. It seems to me that while in reference to some things and to some defects in them "condition" and "quality" may mean the same thing, yet that they do not either necessarily or even usually do so. I think that "condition" refers to external and apparent condition, and "quality" to something which is usually not apparent, at all events to an unskilled person. I think a captain is expected to notice the apparent condition of the goods, though not the quality. He may qualify or (except perhaps when the Harter Act applies) erase the words "good order and condition"; but if he leaves them in he does not, in my opinion, get rid of the admission as to condition (meaning thereby apparent condition) by saying that the quality is unknown It is probably unnecessary for him to protect himself as regards quality, which it is not his business to know anything about, except perhaps when the description of the goods set out in the bill of lading contains words importing a statement as to the quality. Next it was said that in this case the charter-party obliged the captain to sign bills of lading in the form indorsed, and that this form contained the words "good order and condition," and that, the terms of the charter-party being incorporated in the bill of lading, the indorsee of the bill of lading ought to have known that the captain was only signing that which he was bound by the charter-party to sign. I do not, however, think that the captain was bound by the charter-party to sign an untrue statement in the bill of lading. He was, in my opinion, at liberty to qualify the words according to the truth, without departing from the form. Moreover, the Harter Act was also incorporated, and by that he is bound to state in the bill of lading the apparent order and condition. The next question is whether the captain in making that statement as to good order and condition was acting within the scope of his authority so as to bind his owners, or whether his making an untrue statement on this point can be said to be outside his authority, as the signing of a bill of lading for things not on board has been held to be. On this I think that, even when the Harter Act does not apply, the statement is within his authority, and, whatever its effect may be, it binds the owner and not merely the master personally.

In Cox v. Bruce, 35 W. R. 207, 18 Q. B. D. 147, 56 L. J. Q. B. 121, one of the cases in which Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. 665, was acted on, Lord Esher, M.R., says that the case itself shows that the captain had "authority to bind his owners with regard to the weight, condition, and value of the goods under certain circumstances," and he appears to draw the same distinction which I have drawn between quality and condition. Further, when the Harter Act applies, as it seems to do here from the manner in which the bill of lading is made subject to its terms and provisions, the liability of the owner appears to be concluded by the fourth section. As my view on all these preliminary points is in favour of the defendants, it becomes necessary to consider what remedy the defendants have against the shipowner arising from the misstatement as to the apparent condition of the goods at the time of shipment. The defendants put their case alternatively either as a claim on the contract contained in the bill of lading, or by way of estoppel. First, as to the suggested breach of contract. No doubt by the Bills of Lading Act the indorsee to whom the property has passed becomes a party to the contract made originally between the shipper and shipowner and evidenced by the bill of lading. But, as has been pointed out in more than one case, the contract must be construed in the same way between the original parties and the substituted parties; and it is necessary to see exactly what the original contract is. It seems to me that the contract is to deliver the goods in the same condition as that in which they are shipped, coupled with an acknowledgment that the condition at the time of shipment was good. The words "shipped in good order and condition" are not words of contract in the sense of a promise or undertaking. The words are an affirmation of fact, or perhaps rather in the nature of an assent by the captain to an affirmation of fact which the shipper may be supposed to make as to his own goods. So far, therefore, as the words of the bill of lading, apart from the incorporation of the Harter Act, are concerned, I see no contract that the condition of the goods is correctly described. Section 4 of the Harter Act makes it the duty of the captain to insert in the bill of lading a statement as to the condition of the goods, and I agree that this means that he is to make a true statement; but I have a difficulty in seeing that the clause that the bill of lading is to be "subject to all the terms and provisions and to the exemptions from liability contained in" the Harter Act imports a contract that the statement as to the condition of the goods is true. I think, therefore, though not without some doubt so far as the effect of the incorporation of the Harter Act is concerned, that the cause of action must be based on estoppel, and not on breach of contract. It seems to me, however, that the case does come within the recognized rules as to estoppel. The statement, as I have pointed out, is one of fact. If not exactly intended to be acted on, it must be known that it would probably be acted on. Bills of lading are transferable, and the object of the shipper in asking for the insertion of the statement that the goods are in good condition at the time of shipment is clearly rather to have evidence to offer to his transferee than for his own direct benefit. The advantage of what is known as a clean bill of lading is obvious, and I think it would be idle for a master of a ship to say that he did not contemplate a purchaser of the goods acting on the statement that the goods were shipped in good condition. In England there appears no direct authority, but I think there are passages in several judgments in accordance with my view and none to the contrary. In America this question has been considered in Sear v. Wingate, 85 Mass. 103, 3 Allen where there is what seems a well-reasoned judgment as to the estoppel between the indorsee of a bill of lading on the one hand and the master and the shipowner on the other, and the rule is laid that there is such an estoppel between the indorsee and the master as to statements in the bill of lading so far as they relate to matters which are, or ought to be, in the master's knowledge, and that the owners are estopped in the same way by such statements if they are within the scope of the master's authority. Passages to the above effect from that judgment are quoted with approval in Parsons on Shipping and in the Scotch case Craig v. Delargy (16 Sc. L. R.). Lord Shand quotes the passage from Parsons, and says: "That passage from a writer of eminence on this subject undoubtedly gives weight to the argument of the pursuers in this matter (that is, the argument that there was an estoppel), but I find that, with the exception of a case which is referred to in support of the concluding words of the passage, all the authorities referred to are American." He goes on to say: "I do not think it is necessary here to decide the general question as to the effect of a representation in the bill of lading, though if it did arise, I must say that the American law seems to me to be rested on reasonable grounds." There is, therefore, the authority of Lord Shand's opinion on the question I am deciding. As the estoppel arises on a direct statement of fact which is incorrect, I do not consider that the question of negligence really arises, but, as I have already said, I should be prepared, if necessary, on the facts of this case to find the statement to be negligent, provided, of course, that there is a duty towards the indorsee to take care.

As to this duty, although in my view the incorrect statement cannot be sued on directly as a breach of contract, yet I think the transfer of the contract to the indorsee does create a privity between the indorsee and shipowner, and this gets rid of the doctrine of Le Lievre v. Gould, 41 W. R. 468, [1893] 1 Q. B. 491, and the other cases in which it has been held that the duty arising solely out of contract is only a duty towards parties to the contract. It was suggested that the words at the end of section 4 of the Harter Act prevent any estoppel, by saying that the statement is to primâ facie evidence. I think not, because it is not said that it is only to be primâ facie evidence, and it is consistent with the words of the section that, upon something further happening—viz., the acting upon it—it may become conclusive, and also because what is said in the section is that the statement is to be primâ facie evidence "of the receipt of the merchandize therein described." The object of these words, or, at all events, one object of them, appears to be to preserve the doctrine of Grant v. Norway, and Mr. Newton Crane, who was called before me as an expert in American law to prove the Harter Act, said that Grant v. Norway is still recognized as law in America since the Harter Act. In order to make the statement in the bill of lading binding as an estoppel, it is, of course, necessary that it should have been acted on to the prejudice of the person so acting. The defendants here allege that they are prejudiced because, on the faith of the statement that the timber was in good condition when shipped, they accepted the bills of lading as a good tender under a contract for clean timber, and paid their vendors the full contract price; and they further say that, although they have got an award of the umpire on an arbitration under the contract between them and their vendors for £572 12s. as the difference between the value of the damaged timber delivered and that which they ought to have had, yet that this sum has not been paid them.

The vendors have not become insolvent, but they are a foreign firm, and the defendants have not as yet thought fit to sue them on the award. It was suggested on the part of the plaintiffs that the defendants were really making this counterclaim in the interest of the shippers and by arrangement with them; but this is denied, and I cannot hold it to be proved. It is, however, pretty clear that the defendants have not been as active in pressing their claim against the shippers as they probably would have been if they had not got this claim against the shipowner, and they probably have been influenced by the fact that the recovery from the shippers of the amount of the award would embarrass them in recovering, even if it did not, on the correspondence which has taken place, preclude them from recovering, the warehouse rent and the expenses included in their claim in the present action but not included in the award. When money has been paid away to a person who becomes insolvent, as has generally happened in the reported cases as to estoppel, there is, of course, no difficulty as to the person claiming the estoppel proving that his position has been altered. Where, however, there is no insolvency and there is a legal right to get the money back, the damage by the payment is not so clear. In Carr v. The London and North-Western Railway Co, 23 W. R. 747, L. R. 10 C. P. 307, 44 L. J. C. P. 109, a leading case on estoppel, Lord Esher says: "Neither the payment of the warehouse rent nor of the invoice price can be relied upon as damage resulting from the conduct relied upon to support an estoppel to deny the possession of the goods, because either damage can be rectified without the intervention of such an estoppel; there is no consideration for either payment; both were made under a mistake of facts." I am not sure that I understand the exact meaning of the words "without the intervention of such an estoppel," but the passage appears to mean that in the opinion of that learned judge a payment which can be recovered back because it was made under a mistake is not such an alteration of the position of the person making it as would establish an estoppel. If that were so there would, I think, be few estoppels, practically none except where insolvency had intervened, for where there is a misstatement of a fact such as would possibly create an estoppel, the acting on it must always be under a mistake of fact. I think, however, that the learned judge must be considered to have been referring to the facts of the case before him, where apparently there would not have been the slightest difficulty in getting the money back, and that it cannot be truly said as a general proposition that a person cannot be prejudiced by having made a payment which he has a legal right to get back from the person to whom he paid it, unless it is shown that such person is insolvent. It appears to me that the parting with the money, and consequently the being without it for a certain period of time, coupled with the trouble and possible expense of establishing the legal right to get it back, may amount to an acting to the payer's prejudice sufficiently to establish an estoppel against the person in reliance upon whose statement he has made the payment. If, however, the pecuniary amount of the prejudice has to be ascertained for the purpose of assessing the damage, there is an obvious difficulty. In the present case I am prepared to hold that the defendant did act to their prejudice on the statement so as to create an estoppel, but, if the damage recoverable by the defendants against the plaintiffs is the damage they have sustained by paying the shippers, I should have the greatest difficulty on the evidence before me in assessing the amount. The doctrine of estoppel, however, is that the person estopped is precluded from denying in the same transaction as that in which the estoppel arises the truth of the statement acted on. I think, therefore, I have to say that the plaintiffs, not being able to deny that the goods were in good condition at the time of shipment, must pay the damage which was on delivery found to be done to the goods. This is the part of the case on which I have entertained most doubt. It hardly seems just that the plaintiffs should pay this damage when the defendants have a right to get it, and may even now get it, from the shippers, who are the persons who really ought to pay it, as the goods were at their risk when the damage was done. I do not, however, find any authority for the proposition that, when a person is estopped from denying a statement of fact by reason of another having suffered damage by acting on his statement, the only damage recoverable is the damage so arising; and, on the contrary, I do find that a decision apparently to that effect by Cave, J., was reversed in the Court of Appeal in Henderson v. Williams, 43 W. R. 274, [1895] 1 Q. B. 521; see particularly the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., which appears to overrule the judgment of Denman, J., in Carr v. London and North-Western Railway Co. Assuming the doctrine of estoppel to apply, I see no logical answer to the defendants' contention that they can recover the damage to the goods, though I think it would be more satisfactory if the damages could in such a case be confined to those actually caused by acting on the erroneous statement. The assessment of the amount at £572 12s. is, of course, not binding as such between the plaintiffs and defendants, but the umpire was called as a witness before me, and I accept his assessment as correct and give the defendants the £572 12s. It may be that the plaintiffs, if they pay this sum, may be able to bring themselves within the doctrine that when two persons are each liable to a third in respect of the same matter, and the one on whom, as between the two, the burden ought not to rest has to pay, he may recover it against the other: see Moule v. Garrett, L. R. 5 Ex. 132, and in the Exchequer Chamber, 20 W. R. 416, L. R. 7 Ex. 101, and cases there quoted. I see, however, considerable difficulty about this, and no such question is before me. I refer to it only as a possible way in which an apparent injustice may be obviated. It remains to deal with the other heads of damage claimed in the counterclaims. The expenses of the award were not paid by the defendants, and therefore, of course, are not recoverable, and it was said they were ony claimed by inadvertence. The next claim, £8 8s., is a small one, but was the subject of considerable argument. The marks on the timber, though stated in the bills of lading (of course, from the information of the shipper), had in fact been obliterated by the petroleum. The captain in his evidence states that in consequence of this the lots of timber to which the separate bills of lading related were distinguished in the ship when loaded by ropes dividing them. They were, however, not delivered as separate parcels, but were delivered overboard in the Surrey Docks, leaving the dock company to separate them as best they could. This, of course, it was impossible to do accurately as the marks were gone. After a considerable delay it was agreed between the consignees that someone should apportion the cargo between them, using the specification of length and the dock company's measurement books, but, of course, allotting to one party or the other logs corresponding to the description without any certainty that they were really his logs. The expense of this was £8 8s., which is accordingly claimed as damage for not delivering to each consignee the lots of timber in his bill or bills of lading. The answer of the plaintiffs to this claim is that it is always the custom in the Surrey Docks so to deliver, and that the dock company for the consignees and at their expense always does the sorting. This sorting which the dock company so does is, however, sorting out according to marks, and the practice assumes that the timber, though delivered mixed, is in a state in which it can be identified.

It may be that consignees, by adopting the practice prevailing in the Surrey Docks do assent to their goods being delivered mixed, but they do not in my opinion assent to their being so mixed that they cannot be sorted. It seems to me, therefore, quite clear that the plaintiffs never made the delivery which they ought to the bill of lading holders of the timber in their bills. They had, according to the captain's evidence, at one time the means of doing so, but they themselves mixed the timber, knowing that there were no marks by which it could be separated again. I think, therefore, that the £8 8s. is recoverable. The next item is warehouse rent from the time of the arrival of the ship to the date when the timber was altimately divided by agreement as above mentioned, from the 1st of March to the 9th of June, over three months. This delay was, in my opinion, quite unnecessary. The defendants account for it by saying that they never had a cargo in such a condition, and really did not know what to do with it. They were during this time getting their claim against the shippers dealt with by the arbitrators. Some delay was, I think, necessarily caused by the state in which the timber was delivered, and by its being mixed, but it might have been viewed, valued, and appportioned much sooner than it was. I think it would be reasonable to allow warehouse rent for one month as damage resulting from the plaintiffs' failure to deliver the separate parcels. A point was made for the plaintiffs that the sums claimed were not really paid for rent, but that an inclusive charge was made by the dock company for various services, which included six months' warehousing free. It appeared, however, I think, that indirectly the warehousing was paid, and that the cost to the consignees must be taken to be increased by the breaches of contract to the extent of one month's warehouse rent. The defendants also claim interest for the sum paid on the money they paid for the timber, on the ground that they were prevented during this time from dealing with the timber by sale or otherwise, and so got no benefit from the money they had paid. I think this is a legitimate claim, but, of course, only for a month, which I have already said was, in my opinion, a sufficient time to have cleared up the difficulties for which I hold the plaintiffs responsible. These figures appear to give Churchill & Sim about £522 on their counterclaim and Burton & Co. about £150 on theirs. But the warehouse rent and the interest for a month must be calculated exactly by the parties. The defendants will, of course, have the costs of their counterclaim, and the plaintiffs, I suppose, will be entitled to the costs of the action to the time when the freight was formally admitted, which, I suppose, was in the defence.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, W. Crump & Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Darling, JJ.) — Nov. 8.

REX v. LLOYD.
Ex parte DAY. (a.)

County court—Judge—Power to appoint more than one deputy—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 18.

A county court judge may, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, appoint more than one deputy to act for him within his district, provided that they are appointed to act for different courts.

Rule nisi for a prohibition to the deputy judge of the Brompton County Court.

Judge Stoner, the judge of the Brompton and Marylebone County Courts, appointed Mr. Clement Lloyd and Mr. Fitzroy Cowper to act as his deputies at the Brompton and Marylebone Courts respectively. Both appointments were approved by the Lord Chancellor.

On the 9th of February, 1905, the case of Tolman v. Day was in the list for hearing before the deputy judge at the Brompton County Court, but the case was not reached and was adjourned to the 9th of March, and on that day, on the application of the defendant, was further adjourned to the 24th of March.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 24th of March it was found that the case could not be reached for want of time, and the deputy judge being pressed by the defendant's counsel to fix a day on which it could be heard, adjourned it to the 30th of March, on which day he disposed of the case, which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for a sum of £63 19s.

The 30th of March was one of the ordinary court days of the Marylebone Court, and was not one of the ordinary court days of the Brompton Court; on that day Mr. Fitzroy Cowper was sitting as deputy judge at the Marylebone Court trying cases at the same time as Mr. Clement Lloyd was trying the above case of Tolman v. Day.

The notice of motion set forth as the grounds of the application that the deputy-judge "was not a lawful judge, was no judge, and that the proceedings were ultrà vires.

A rule nisi for a certiorari was also obtained.

Both rules raised the same question.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (H. Sutton with him), showed cause.—The appointment of two deputies was not ultrà vires, for they were appointed to different courts. That is shown by section 21, which provides: "That the . . . appointment of a deputy-judge . . . shall not be vacated by the death or resignation of a judge, but the acts of the deputy done after such death or resignation shall be as valid as if the judge had not died, and he shall continue to act in all the courts to which he was appointed." That shows that a deputy may be appointed to some of the courts to the exclusion of others. If a judge may appoint a deputy to one part of his district he can lawfully appoint another deputy to act concurrently for another part of his district.

Duke, K.C., and Hodges, in support of the rule.—A county court judge can appoint only one deputy. He has but one office and cannot split up his office into sections and appoint a deputy in each. The power given in section 18 of the County Courts Act to appoint a deputy clearly does not contemplate the appointment of more than one deputy.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case the county court judge of the Brompton and Marylebone County Courts, purporting to act under section 18 of the County Courts Act, 1888, appointed upon the same day, and with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, two gentlemen to act as his deputies during the same period of two months, one at the Brompton County Court and the other at the Marylebone County Court, and we are invited upon the rule to say that those appointments were ultrà vires, and that the judge had no power to make, nor the Lord Chancellor to approve, the appointment of more than one deputy for the same judge at the same time. It seems to me that we ought not to come to that conclusion unless we are compelled to do so, because I cannot imagine a case in which it would be less right to give effect to a technical point than one in which, as here, a defendant has appeared before the court over and over again, has asked for the indulgence of the court, has agreed to the day on which the case should be heard, and then only takes the objection to the jurisdiction after judgment has been given against him. It was contended by the defendant that the appointment of the deputy judge was bad, that the county court judge had no power to sever his office and appoint different deputies for the same office. No doubt the judge may appoint a deputy for the whole county district to which he is himself appointed; but I can find nothing in the Act to prohibit him from appointing a deputy to act for one or more of the county courts within the larger area. On the contrary, section 21, to which we were referred by the Solicitor-General, expressly recognizes that he may do so. It provides that the deputy, upon the death of the judge who appointed him, shall continue in all of the courts to which he was appointed. These latter words necessarily import that he may be lawfully appointed to act for some of the courts in the district and not for others, for if he could only be lawfully appointed for the whole county court district they would be altogether superfluous.

Then, if one deputy can be appointed to act for a single court, as distinguished from the whole county court district, there is no objection to appointing another deputy at the same time to act for another court in the district.

I am of opinion that there is nothing in the defendant's objection to the appointments of these gentlemen, that they were within the powers given by the Act of Parliament, and that these rules must be discharged.

WILLS and DARLING, JJ., concurred.

Solicitor for the appellant, R. W. Beckwith.

Solicitor for the deputy judge, Solicitor to the Treasury.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) Aug. 10, 1905.

BULLEN v. WARD. (a.)

Sunday Observance Act—Exercising calling on Sunday—Exemption of cook-shop . . . for such as cannot otherwise be provided for—Sunday Observance Act, 1677 (29 Car. 2, c. 7), ss. 1, 3.

The premises of a chipped potato dealer who in the course of his business cut up and cooked potatoes, sometimes alone and sometimes with fish, and sold them to the working classes,

Held, to be a cook-shop within the meaning of section 3 of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, and that he was not, therefore, liable to the penalties in section 1 as carrying on his ordinary calling.

Case stated by the justices of Blackburn.

The appellant Bullen, who was a chipped potato dealer, was charged with having in the course of his business cut up and cooked or fried potatoes, sometimes alone and sometimes with fish, and that these articles had become a popular food with the working classes. The fried potatoes and fish, together or separately, was served on the appellant's premises as well as off, and were always sold warm. The customers when supplied off the premises often brought their own receptacles for the provision of food, but were sometimes supplied in paper bags belonging to the appellant.

On Sunday, the 22nd of January, 1905, the appellant was carrying on his usual business, there being customers both upon his premises eating the chipped potatoes, others who purchased articles of food and took them away in bags or basins, and some who ate food in the street near to the appellant's shop.

The appellant's premises were not licensed as a refreshment house under the Refreshment Houses Act, 1860.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended for the respondent that he had unlawfully carried on and exercised his business on Sunday, contrary to the provisions of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, and that such business was not a work of necessity or charity.

For the appellant it was contended that the business so carried on by him came within the exception in section 3 of the Act, and that his customers were such as could not be otherwise provided for within the meaning of the section. The justices being of opinion that the appellant's premises was not a cook-shop, and that his business did not come within the exception in section 3 of the Act, convicted the appellant, but stated this case for the opinion of the court.

By the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, s. 1, it is provided (inter alia) that no tradesman shall do or exercise any worldly labour, business, or work of their callings upon the Lord's Day, or any part thereof (works of necessity and charity only excepted).

Section 3 provided that nothing in this Act contained shall extend to the prohibition of dressing of meat in families or dressing or selling of meat in inns, cook-shops, or victualling houses for such as otherwise cannot be provided for.

S. Joyce Thomas, for the appellant.—The justices were wrong. A cook-shop is a place where food is prepared, and this definition fits the appellant's premises. In R. v. Younger, 5 Term Rep. 449, Buller, J., pointed out that the words of the Act are not to be construed strictly. Cripps v. Durden has no bearing on this case.

He also cited R. v. Cox, 2 Burr. 75.

Randolph, for the respondents.—The justices were right. The question as to whether these premises were a cook-shop is one of fact, and that cannot be interfered with in this court. Meat in section 3 must be construed as confined to flesh. The courts are bound to give full effect to this statute, whatever view may be taken of its expediency.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I quite agree with the observation of the respondent's counsel that we are bound to give full effect to the words of this statute. But the statute itself is couched in general terms, and I should require very strict words before I came to the conclusion that the present appellant was guilty of an offence within the Act having regard to the protection given by the words "cook-shops, &c.," in section 3. In my opinion there was no evidence on which the magistrates could come to any conclusion other than that the appellant's shop was a cook-shop as contemplated by section 3. I say that, because after the words "cook-shop or victualling shop" there are the words "for such as otherwise cannot be provided." In R. v. Younger it was pointed out by Buller, J., that these are loose words; they cannot possibly be said to be intended to give a definite and precise meaning beyond this, that they indicate what the class of cooking is that is permissible—namely, for people who cannot do it for themselves. While I do not think that the appellant's business can be strictly put as a work of necessity or charity, these words in section 1 of the Act cannot be overlooked in regarding the intention of the statute. The case finds that the appellant cooked for the poorest classes, who came and fetched the food in dishes, always warm. Some ate it in the place and some in the street. It cannot be said to be wrong because some ate it on their way home. It was laid down in R. v. Cox and R. v. Younger that this statute did not mean to prohibit the cooking of meat in the shop for poor people and that to do so is not an offence within the statute. We have been pressed to say that we must construe "meat" as meaning flesh. That is not so. It would be ridiculous to say that, although a man may cook mutton he must not cook an eel pie. I think that in this case the only evidence before the magistrates brought the appellant within the protection of section 3, and the conviction must therefore be quashed.

LAWRANCE and RIDLEY, JJ., agreed.

Solicitors for appellant, Thairlwall & Co., for Read & Johnston, Blackburn.

Solicitors for respondent, Rawle, Johnston, & Co., for Carter & Crellin, Blackburn.

K. B. Div. (Jelf, J.) May 29, 30.

MAYOR, &c., OF WEDNESBURY v. LODGE HOLES 1905 COLLIERY CO. (a.)

Local government — Urban sanitary authority — Subsidence of highway caused by mining operations—Measure of damages.

The proprietary right of an urban sanitary authority in a highway which is vested in them under section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is limited to what is necessary to maintain the road as a highway; and accordingly, where the highway has subsided owing to mining operations, the urban sanitary authority are only entitled to recover the cost of making it as commodious as before to the general public, and not the cost of restoring it to its original level.

Further consideration of an action tried before Jelf, J., without a jury.

This was an action brought by the Corporation of Wednesbury to recover damages for injury caused by the mining operations of the defendants to a highway which was vested in them as highway authority under section 149 of the Public Health Act. The defendants admitted liability, but only to the extent of what it would cost to make the road as commodious for the public as it was before, and they paid into court a sum of £80 as sufficient to meet the claim. The plaintiff corporation claimed a sum of £405, the expense which they had actually incurred in restoring the road to its former level.

Hugo Young, K.C., and Vachell.—The corporation are entitled to recover the sum they have spent. They are in a position analogous to that of a private owner, and are therefore entitled, as he would be, to have the road restored to its original level.

Shearman, K.C., and Disturnal.—The right of the plaintiffs is only a limited right (Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird, [1896] A. C. 434, 45 W. R. Dig. 92), and their rights are confined to what is necessary to protect the use of the road as a highway: Coverdale v. Charlton, 27 W. R. 257, 4 Q. B. D. 104; Attorney-General v. Conduit Colliery Co., 43 W. R. 366, [1895] 1 Q. B. 307.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30.—JELF, J.—This action is brought by the Corporation of Wednesbury against the defendants to recover damages for injury caused by their mining operations to a highway called Dangerfield-lane, which is vested in the plaintiffs as the highway authority under section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875. At the trial the defendants admitted that their mining operations had caused the road and the surrounding land to sink to a substantial extent, and that this gave the plaintiffs a cause of action against them; the question therefore resolved itself into one of damages. It is to be observed, though it hardly bears upon the particular issue in this case, that the Attorney-General is not a party to this action, and the plaintiffs, therefore, in my opinion, can only recover in respect of the damages they have themselves suffered without regard to any resultant disadvantage resulting to the public. The plaintiffs claimed £405 as the expenses which they had actually incurred in restoring the road in question as nearly as possible to its original level, including the consequential costs of retaining walls to raise the road above the adjoining lands which remained at their sunken level, and the cost of fences to protect the public from the danger of falling over the precipices so caused. The defendants did not deny that, if the plaintiffs were entitled on principle to claim damages on that basis, the figures were substantially correct, and I find as a fact, on that hypothesis, that £400 is a fair sum for the plaintiffs to recover. The defendants, however, deny that the measure of damages was what it would cost to restore the road nearly to its original level, and maintain that for a sum of £65 the highway could be made as commodious for the public as it was before, and they paid a sum of £80 into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim. On the hypothesis that the principle adopted by the defendants was right, the plaintiffs gave evidence that about £95 would have been required to do the work which the defendants put at £65; but on this part of the case I think that the defendants' figures are more trustworthy than the plaintiffs, and I am satisfied that the sum of £80 paid into court by the defendants is sufficient if the principle for which they contend is correct. The important question at issue, therefore, is upon which basis the damage should be calculated—in other words, What are the plaintiffs entitled to charge for?

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The contentions of the plaintiffs were two-fold—one of law and one of fact. In law they contended that their proprietary right in the highway in question entitled them to charge the defendants with the cost of restoring it to its old level was necessary in order to make the road as commodious for the public as before, especially as regards the method of dealing with the surface water. I am of opinion that the first contention is not well founded in law. The plaintiffs have, it is true, a proprietary right in the road by virtue of section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the purpose of protecting the public in their use of the road, but that right is a limited one, and from a comparison of the cases of Coverdale v. Charlton, Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird, and Attorney-General v. Conduit Colliery Co., I think it is to be gathered that that right is to be confined to what is necessary to maintain the road as a highway. Further, section 27 of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), which was passed to remove doubts created by Coverdale v. Charlton, shows that mines under highways remain the property of the mine-owners, provided that in working them no damage is done to the road. It is not necessary for me to consider the question whether an injunction could be obtained in the case of apprehended subsidence of the road from its original level, because the cause of action is admitted, and the only question is one of damages, and so long as the road is made a good road, as commodious as it was before, I think that no further damage is recoverable by the plaintiffs. No case was cited in support of the plaintiff's contention, and the case of Attorney-General v. Conduit Colliery Co. seems to point to the conclusion that in such a case the damages would only be nominal even in the case of a private road, where, of course, the proprietary right is unlimited. I do not think that a right to recover the cost of restoring it to its original level can be maintained, although no doubt in addition to the cost of making it as commodious as before to the owner, something might be charged for any loss of amenities sustained à fortiori. I do not think that such a right could be successfully claimed by a road authority which has the limited proprietary right to which I have referred.

His lordship then dealt with the questions of fact, and held that the sum paid into court was sufficient.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Thomas Jones, Town Clerk, Wednesbury.

Solicitors for the defendants, Bower, Cotton, & Bower, for Thursfield & Messiter, Wednesbury.

House of Lords.

From C.A. (England). Nov. 28.

ALIANZA CO. (LIMITED) v. BELL. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Profits—Trade carried on abroad—Mining—Exhaustion of nitrate grounds—Deduction—Income Tax Acts, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), ss. 100, 159, Schedule D, case 1, rr. 1, 3; and 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.

An English company acquired land abroad for commercial purposes, the upper surface of which was gradually exhausted in the production of nitrates and iodine, which were sold and large profits realized. The amount and value of the soil utilized could be ascertained.

Held, that in estimating the yearly profits of the company under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts, no deduction could be allowed in respect of such exhaustion of capital.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (53 W. R. 257, [1905] 1 K. B. 184) affirmed.

Appeal from order of Court of Appeal (53 W. R. 257, [1905] 1 K. B. 184), affirming judgment of Channell, J. (53 W. R. 23, [1904] 2 K. B. 666).

The appellants were an English company who owned a large tract of nitrate grounds in Chile; the upper stratum of which grounds consisted of "caliche." This was dug up and utilized for the production of nitrates and iodine, by the sale of which the company realized large profits.

The company were assessed to the income tax under Schedule D and claimed, for the purpose of arriving at the balance of their profits, to deduct a sum representing the cost price of the "caliche" worked up by them in the course of each year.

The Court of Appeal held that such deduction was in the nature of a deduction for exhausted capital which is prohibited by the Act.

The case is set out at length in the court of first instance.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Bremner, for the appellants.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Rowlatt, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I do not think it is necessary to say more than a very few words. I think your lordships are satisfied with the judgment of the Court of Appeal and the reasons by which that judgment is enforced. It appears to me that this claim comes within the third rule, and that it is money wholly and exclusively laid out and expended as capital. For these reasons I ask your lordships that this appeal should be dismissed, and that the appellants should pay the costs.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I think it is undesirable that any doubt should be thrown upon a settled course of decisions on the income tax law, and it seems to me that, although Mr. Danckwerts has argued this case with a vigour and zest which did full justice to his case, the arguments he has advanced are of a most familiar character. The propositions required to be established in order to bring him within the provisions and decisions are these (I begin by stating that of course it is under Schedule D that the case is to be judged). First of all, is this capital which he proposes to obtain a reduction for? Now, that seems to me to be entirely concluded by the findings in the case. There is no doubt whatever that the scheme of the enterprize of this company was to invest their capital in the acquisition of this property, and then to proceed to work it as a mining concern. That being so, the Master of the Rolls seems to me to be abundantly justified in saying that this is merely another case where capital has been embarked in a wasting subject-matter. The whole of the argument of counsel for the appellants is really founded upon what I suppose no one would doubt—that as the output takes places there is a consumption of a certain proportionate amount of the capital; but that is concluded, as my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has said, by rule 3. Further, I agree with Stirling, L.J., that section 159 is never to be laid out of account in these instances, because in its express prohibition of an allowance being made for capital, it on the face of it refers to all the various cases under the various schedules. Accordingly, the argument that there is something peculiar in Schedule A in the principle which has been applied in Addie's case, 2 Rettie 431, and the other cases which have been mentioned, fails before the universal conspectus which in express terms is given by section 159 to this very principle.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It appears to me it is quite impossible to get out of rule 3.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellants, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Solicitor for respondent, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } March 22.

In re VICKERSTAFF, DECEASED.
VICKERSTAFF v. CHADWICK. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Administration—Liability of real estate—Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 2, sub-section 3—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 14 (d).

Where, in a probate action instituted in 1905, the court ordered the plaintiff's costs "to come out of the estate of the deceased," there being no personal estate, it was Held, that, having regard to section 3 (2) of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, the order operated to charge the deceased's real estate with the payment of the costs.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out to determine whether the real estate of the deceased was liable for certain costs incurred in an action in the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice. The facts were as follows:

The deceased, by his will dated the 20th of January, 1905, appointed his mother, Mrs. Boydon, his sole executrix and universal legatee. The deceased died on the 21st of January, 1905.

Mrs. Boydon, by her will, dated the 21st of January, 1905, appointed the present defendants her executors. She died on the 26th of January, 1905.

In an action in the Probate Division, in which Mrr. Boydon's executors, as plaintiffs, propounded the testator's will, it was held that the deceased, at the time he made his will, was not of sound mind, and it was ordered that plaintiff's costs be paid "out of the estate."

Letters of administration were granted to the deceased's wife, the present plaintiff.

There was practically no personal estate, but there was considerable realty.

The summons asked whether, in the course of the administration of the real and personal estate of the deceased, the real estate of the said deceased was liable to be charged with the costs of the defendants incurred as plaintiffs in the action in the Probate Division of this court, which costs, by the judgment delivered in the said action on the 23rd of November, 1905, were ordered to come out of the estate of the said deceased.

Stewart Smith, K C, and Whinney, for the plaintiff.—The realty is not charged. The Land Transfer Act, 1897, does not make the realty liable, and before the Act there is no question but that the words of the order would have charged personalty only: In re Jones, 50 W. R. 215, [1902] 1 Ch. 92; Charter v. Charter, 24 W. R. 874, 3 Ch. D. 218; In re Prince, 47 W. R. 25, [1898] 2 Ch. 225.

Lawrence, K.C., and Cartmell, for the defendants.—The realty is now charged. The old words were given a limited meaning because the Probate Court had no jurisdiction over realty, but the Land Transfer Act, 1897, gives such jurisdiction: In re Pawley and the London and Provincial Bank, 48 W. R. 107, [1900] 1 Ch. 58.

Stewart Smith, K.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, said: What I have to do is to construe an order of the Probate Division. In an action in that division the court ordered that the costs of the plaintiffs come out of the estate of the deceased. Does it mean out of the estate generally or out of personal estate only? If this question had arisen before the passing of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, it would have been unarguable that "estate" meant anything but personal estate, for the very plain reason that the court had no jurisdiction to deal with real estate, and it is necessary to give credit to the court of the intention to only do that which it could. Then the question arises if the words have the same meaning now, after the passing of the Act. That Act constitutes a real representative who is not a different person from the personal representative, but must necessarily be the same. He also has the realty vested in him, and it remains so vested until he conveys it away or until order of the court. Further, the Probate Division, by a grant of probate or of letters of administration, includes realty as well as personalty. There might even be under the Act a grant of probate of realty only, in cases where there was no personalty.

Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That carries us a long way, because it gets rid of the obstacle on which the limitation of the jurisdiction of the court was founded. It seems to me that section 3, sub-section 2, of the Act sets the matter at rest. It provides that in the administration of the assets of a person dying after the commencement of the Act his real estate shall be administered in the same manner, subject to the same liabilities for debt, costs, and expenses, and with the same incidents as if it were personal estate. By this enactment the Legislature has expressly provided that "estate" shall mean realty as well as personalty. Then I have been referred to ord. 65, r. 14 (d), which says: "In any probate action in which it is ordered that any costs shall be paid out of the estate, the judge making such order may direct out of what portion or portions of the estate such costs shall be paid, and such costs shall be paid accordingly." It has been argued that the court would have to specify realty if it meant to include it. I think that argument is unsound. "The estate" means the whole estate, realty as well as personalty. The true view I take to be that the court need no longer say "out of the estate," but may say out of a particular part of the estate. No doubt the court could direct that costs should be paid out of that portion of the estate which is realty, but I do not think that order 65, r. 14 (d), which is one of procedure, affects the question before me. In my opinion, since the passing of the Act the word "estate" includes realty as well as personalty, and the deceased's real estate is accordingly charged with the payment of the costs.

Solicitors, Swann, Bradley, & Co., for Challinors & Shaw, Leek; Robbins, Billing, & Co., for Hacker & Allen, Leek.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } March 7.

WHITBY v. LUEDECKE. (a.)

Settlement—Perpetuity—Appointment—Construction—Cross remainders—Vested or contingent—Contingent remainders for life.

A lady having power under her marriage settlement to appoint the legal estates in certain real property to her children after her death, appointed by her will that the income and rents "shall be equally divided during their respective lives between my daughters A. and L. after my decease, and in the event of the death of either the survivor shall receive the whole income or rents," and after the death of the survivor she directed the property to be sold.

Held, that upon the construction of the instrument the remainders given on the death of either of the daughters to the survivor were contingent and not vested remainders, for that they could not be vested remainders because one of them must necessarily fail to fall into possession; and that consequently the gift of the entirety of the rents and profits upon the death of either daughter to the survivor was void for remoteness.

Action.

This was an action by the owner of a life estate in an undivided moiety of certain land claiming a life interest in the entirety of the land under an appointment made under a power in a marriage settlement, and it raised a question whether certain cross remainders were vested or contingent, and whether or not they were void for remoteness.

By the settlement, made in 1844, previous to the marriage of Ann Whitby and Alfred Whitby, a certain farm in the occupation of one W. Tyers was conveyed to the use during their joint lives of trustees upon certain trusts, and after the death of Ann Whitby to the use of the child or children of the marriage or their issue, for such estates and in such shares and in such manner as Ann Whitby (whether covert or sole) by her will should give or devise; and as to so much of the premises, or of the estate or interest therein, as should not be disposed of, if there should be more than one child, to the use of such children as tenants in common, and the respective heirs of their bodies.

The only children of the marriage were two daughters—Ann Jane Whitby, born in 1846; and the plaintiff Lucie Whitby, born in 1852.

Ann Whitby, the mother, died in 1877, having made her will in 1875, which, except for the appointment of her husband as trustee in a certain event, was as follows:

"I, Ann Whitby, being by the blessing of God in health of body and mind, having by my marriage settlement possession of the estate or farm called Tyers's Farm, in the parish of Thirlaston, in the county of Leicester, do will and devise that the yearly income or rent of the said Tyers's Farm shall be equally divided during their respective lives between my daughters Ann Jane and Lucie or Lucy Whitby after my decease, and in the event of the death of either the survivor shall receive the whole income or rents arising from the same, and at the death of my last daughter the above farm may be sold and the proceeds divided amongst the children of the above-named Ann Jane and Lucy or Lucie Whitby, supposing they or either of them shall have married."

Ann Jane Whitby and the plaintiff Lucie Whitby were in possession or in receipt of the rents and profits of the property in equal moieties from the death of Ann Whitby until that of Ann Jane Whitby.

In 1891 Ann Jane Whitby and the plaintiff Lucie Whitby executed a disentailing deed by which they conveyed the hereditaments in the settlement of 1844 to themselves in fee simple as tenants in common.

Ann Jane Whitby died in 1903, a spinster, having by her will given all her real and personal estate to the defendant and appointed him her executor.

In 1904 the plaintiff joined the defendant in letting the property on a yearly tenancy.

The plaintiff alleged that she had acted in ignorance of her rights, and in the belief that the will of Ann Whitby did not operate because the formalities required for an appointment had not been complied with, and that the defendant was consequently entitled to an undivided moiety of the property in fee simple in possession; and she accordingly brought this action claiming a declaration that she was entitled under the settlement and the will of her mother to an estate for life in the entirety of the property, and for an account of the rents and profits received by the defendant since the death of her sister.

The defendant pleaded that Ann Jane Whitby had been advised that the will of their mother was of no effect by reason of the law as to remoteness, and that the plaintiff and her sister agreed to settle their rights by the deed of 1891 on the basis of a mutual admission that there had been no appointment, and that they had since acted on the faith of that arrangement.

At the trial the question of the application of the law against perpetuities to the appointment contained in the will of Ann Whitby was first argued and decided, and the decision rendered the other questions raised in the action unnecessary.

Buckmaster, K.C., and E. P. Hewitt, for the plaintiff.—The will of Ann Whitby in effect appoints to each daughter a moiety of the property for her life, and gives her a vested remainder for life in the moiety of her sister. It is true that if she dies before her sister then the remainder never comes into possession. It is, however, not the less a vested remainder, as it is from its creation always ready to come into possession whenever the prior estate, namely, the life interest of the other sister comes to an end: Williams on Real Property (19th ed.), p. 335. In Ashley v. Ashley, 6 Sim. 358, a gift to the children of a living person for their lives with cross-remainders between them was treated as valid.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also referred to In re Hargreaves, 38 W. R. 470, 43 Ch. D. 401; and as regards the force of the word "respective" to Sutcliffe v. Howard, 17 W. R. 819, 38 L. J. Ch. 472.

F. Vaughan Hawkins and Martelli, for the defendant.—The appointment is of a contingent remainder after the life of each of the daughters to the other of them. The event upon which the gift takes effect—namely the death of either daughter—might not happen within twenty-one years of the termination of the life in being—that is, the life of Ann Whitby. The gift was consequently void for remoteness. It is one of the fourth class mentioned by Fearne on Conting nt Remainders, chap. 1, s. 2 (10th ed.), p. 9 He says of this class: "So if an estate be limited to two for life, remainder to the survivor of them in fee, the re nainder is contingent, for it is uncertain who will be the survivor." The rule against perpetuities applies to legal as well as to equitable limitations (In re Ashforth, 53 W. R. 328, [1905] 1 Ch. 540); and to life estates as well as to limitations in fee: In re Hargreaves, and see the judgment of Knight-Bruce, L.J., in Broughton v. James, 1 Coll., p. 46. Even if vested remainders could have been given in the way suggested on behalf of the plaintiff, the will does not appoint them as such, but as contingent remainders. And the court must construe the will naturally and not so as to avoid the operation of the rule against perpetuities: Pearks v. Moseley, 29 W. R., p. 2, L. R. 5 App. Cas, p. 719.

They al o referred to Dungannon v. Smith, 12 Cl. & Fin. 526 574, and In re Bence, [1891] 3 Ch. 242.

WARRINGTON, J.—The question I have to decide is whether the words "in the event of the death of either, the survivor shall receive the whole income," create a vested interest or a contingent interest. If it is a vested interest it is good; if it is a contingent interest it is bad, because it would not, or might not, vest within the life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards. Of course nothing turns on the use of the words "in the event of"; that means, of course, "when" The con ingency, if there be a contingency, arises on the word "survivor." You cannot tell u til the event has happened which of the two ladies will survive. Now, in the first place it is plain that if the gift had been (reading the words "in the event" as "when") "when either of them dies the survivor shall be entitled to the fee simple," that would be plainly contingent, because the person to take could not be ascertained until the death of one of the two. But it is said that there is a difference here because the gift is not of the fee simple, but of the life estate. It is an estate which bears within itself the possibility of coming to an end by reason of the death of the life tenant. It is said that I ought to read those w rds as if they were "and when Ann Jane dies Lucy shall take a life interest in the entirety; and when Lucy dies Ann Jane shall take a life interest in the entirety," and that those would be two good vested int-rests, vested at the death of Ann Whitby, each of which might fail, of course, of being enjoyed in possession because the person to enjoy it would have died, and therefore the life interest would be over; but is said that there was a good vested interest given, although that estate might never ripen into enjoyment. Now, it seems to me—and of course the case must be dealt with strictly on the principles which are applicable to this branch of the law—that this is impossible. I think that it is a sound principle that every vested interest must be one which may—though not necessarily must—vest in possession. If that is true, it is obvious that the two estates of which I have spoken are of such a kind that one of them—though you cannot say which—certainly cannot vest in possession, and this instrument will be creating two vested estates, one of which never can vest in possession, although which of the two that one is, you cannot say. There is, as it seems to me, a difference between these two things, between a vested estate for life which may fail to fall into possession by reason of the life tenant dying before the event happens which gives possession, and the gift of a contingent estate for life. What I have here is a gift under which, as I understand the language of the will, only the survivor of the two ladies will be entitled to some estate under these words "in the event of the death of either the survivor shall receive the whole," and I cannot say now which of the two that survivor is, nor could I have said at the date of the death of Ann Whitby which the survivor was. It seems to me that that was a contingency, and the estate given was a contingent estate. I cannot read the gift as creating two vested estates, one of which must fail, and the other of which must take effect. I think they are contingent estates. That conclusion is upon the construction of the instrument; and for the purpose of arriving at it I shut my eyes to the consequences resulting from it, as by the decision in Pearks v. Moseley I think that I am bound to do. Having so construed the instrument, I find that these are contingent estates. And they are contingent estates which will not or may not become vested estates within any life which was in being in 1844 and twenty-one years afterwards. The consequence is that unfortunately the gift is void. In arriving at this conclusion I do not say that I am guaging what this lady would have wished to have done had she been aware of the rules of law. In this branch of law I cannot consider that, in construing the instrument. I must hold this to be a gift of contingent estates, and therefore to fail for infringing the rule against perpetuities.

Judgment for defendant.

Solicitors, Stow, Preston, & Lyttelton, for R. B. Berridge & Sons, Leicester; Capron & Co.

Chan. Div. }
Joyce, J. } Feb. 13, 14, 20.

PEAT v. CLAYTON. (a.)

Company—Shares—Equitable title—Notice—Right to registration—Negligence—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 46, r. 3.

A debtor, after assigning all his property by deed to trustees for his creditors, fraudulently sold certain shares through a broker and received the purchase-money from him. The companies concerned, having previously received notice of the assignment, refused to issue certificates to the purchasers, and the selling broker, under the rules of the

(a.) Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

London Stock Exchange, provided other shares in substitution.

Held, that the failure of the trustees to serve, under order 46, r. 3, notice in lieu of distringas on the companies did not amount to negligence so as to postpone their equitable title, having regard to the fact that the trustees had given the companies notice of the execution of the deed of assignment; and that the selling broker had no lien on the shares for the purchase-money, except possibly on the debtor's interest in them, which was subject to the deed of assignment.

Action.

This was an action by the trustees of a deed of assignment made in favour of creditors for a declaration that they were entitled to be registered as owners in respect of forty shares in the Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Co., Witwatersrand (Limited). and forty shares in the Oceana Minerals Co. (Limited). The facts were as follows:

On the 24th of October, 1904, the defendant Clayton executed a deed of assignment of all his property in favour of his creditors. The plaintiffs Peat and Moss were the trustees of the deed which was duly registered under the Deeds of Assignment Act, 1887, on the 7th of November, 1904.

After looking into his affairs the plaintiffs asked the debtor Clayton to hand over to them the certificates for the shares the subject of this action. The debtor refused to comply, giving as an excuse that the certificates were not in his possession.

On the following day, the 8th of November, 1904, the plaintiffs gave notice to both companies of the deed of assignment and asked them to note it on their respective registers.

On the 10th of November Clayton instructed Messrs. Cohen & Co., a firm of brokers, and members of the London Stock Exchange, to sell the said shares, which they did, and on the 16th of November Clayton handed Messrs. Cohen the certificates and executed blank transfers of the shares, Messrs. Cohen paying him £25 on account.

On the 30th of November Messrs. Cohen lodged the certificates with the respective companies and the transfers were certified—that is, it was noted on the transfers that a certificate for the shares purporting to be transferred had been lodged with the company.

On the 1st of December the purchasing brokers received the transfers from Messrs. Cohen and paid them the purchase-money. On the same day Messrs. Cohen paid Clayton the balance due to him.

In the case of the Randfontein shares the company refused to register the purchaser in consequence of the notice they had received from the trustees of the deed of assignment, the present plaintiffs. But the Oceana Co., in spite of the notice, registered the purchaser, a Mrs. Russell. They, however, refused to issue a certificate, and subsequently struck Mrs. Russell's name off the register, leaving the shares standing in the name of Clayton.

Messrs. Cohen, in accordance with the rules of the London Stock Exchange, provided other shares in substitution for Clayton's shares, and applied to Clayton for repayment, which was refused.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action against Clayton, Messrs. Cohen, and the two companies. Clayton died before the action came to trial, and the Oceana Co. did not appear.

Younger, K.C., and Johnston, for the plaintiffs.—The purchasers' title is only equitable. The plaintiffs' title must prevail unless it can be shown that at any moment of time the purchasers had an immediate and unconditional right to registration: Ireland v. Hart, 50 W. R. 315, [1902] 1 Ch. 522; Moore v. The North-Western Bank, 40 W. R. 93, [1891] 2 Ch. 599. The purchasers have never had such right, because of the notice given to the companies. There would be a good defence against a purchaser, and it is even stronger as against Messrs. Cohen, who are not purchasers, and never had any right to registration. Messrs. Cohen's remedy is against Clayton, who was bound to indemnify them against any liability incurred. The position regarding the Oceana shares is virtually the same. Mrs. Russell ought never to have been registered. She was never informed that she was registered, and no certificate was issued. She never had any better title than if she had not been registered.

Hughes, K.C., and Clayton, for Messrs. Cohen.—The equitable title of the plaintiffs must be postponed to that of the defendants, because they did not take the proper steps to secure their title. Notice in lieu of a distringas should have been given: R. S. C., ord. 46, r. 3: National Provincial Bank of England v. Jackson, 34 W. R. 597, 33 Ch. D. 1; In re Castell & Brown, 46 W. R. 248, [1893] 1 Ch. 315; Farrand v. Yorkshire Banking Co., 37 W. R. 318, 40 Ch D. 182. The certification of the transfers does not in any way improve Messrs. Cohen's position: Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Co., 38 W. R. 750, 25 Q. B. D. 519. Messrs. Cohen were bound by the rules of the Stock Exchange to supply other shares in substitution for those sold by Clayton, they are therefore entitled to stand in the shoes of the purchaser in respect of Clayton's shares. As regards the Oceana shares, Mrs. Russell became the legal owner on registration.

Younger, K.C., in reply.—Mrs. Russell never was legal owner within the meaning of the cases, but even if she were, Messrs. Cohen are not entitled to stand in her position. The company had no right to strike her name off the register: In re Poole Firebrick and Blue Clay Co., 23 W. R. 203, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 157. There has been no such negligence on the part of the plaintiffs as would in equity postpone their title.

Clauson appeared for the Randfontein Co.

Cur. adv. vult.

JOYCE, J., in giving judgment, said: This is an action to determine who is entitled to forty shares in the Randfontein Estates Co. and forty shares in the Oceana Minerals Co., all fully paid up. As I understand the law, where there are several claimants to shares registered in the name of a third person, the equitable title which is prior in time prevails, unless the claimant under a subsequent equitable title proves that, as between him and the company, he had acquired an absolute and unconditional right to be registered as the owner of the shares before the company received notice of the other claim. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiffs are entitled to the forty shares in the Randfontein Co. Messrs Cohen, however, claim a lien upon them. If there is any lien it is clearly only equitable, and on Clayton's interest in the shares, which is subject to the rights of the plaintiffs under the deed of assignment.

In the next place it was argued that the plaintiffs had disentitled themselves by negligence. On the evidence before me I do not see any negligence on the part of the plaintiffs unless it were, as contended by Messrs. Cohen, in not adopting the procedure now substituted by ord. 46, r. 3, for the old procedure by distringas. I do not think that owing to the failure to adopt this course the plaintiffs must be postponed; if they had done so, the result would have been the same. It would only have prevented the company from registering the transfer to the purchaser, and in fact they were prevented from so doing by the notice they received. It was suggested, but not seriously contended, that a distringas would have prevented certification of the transfers. As I understand, that only amounts to a representation that a document has been lodged with the company apparently in order, and showing primâ facie that the transferor is entitled to the shares. It is no warranty of the transferor's title to the shares or as to the validity of any of the documents. Messrs. Cohen never inquired of the company whether there was any distringas or other stop against the transference of the shares.

So much for the Randfontein shares. The case as to the Oceana shares is virtually the same. The only difference is that, on referring to the register of members of that company—and there is no further evidence on the subject—it appears that the transfer from Clayton, which was to a Mrs. Russell, was in fact, entered on the register, though under what circumstances, and whether by express authority of the board or not, does not appear. At all events, no such registration ought to have been made, having regard to the notice the company received on the 3rd of November, without previous communication with the giver of that notice. No certificate, however, was issued to Mrs. Russell, and her brokers applied to Messrs. Cohen for shares in substitution, which were at once provided. The transfer of Clayton's shares to Mrs. Russell was cancelled, so that in the result the shares are still in the name of Clayton. They were never in the name of Messrs. Cohen, who did not take a transfer from Mrs. Russell.

It was contended that the true view is that Mrs. Russell still remains on the register as owner of the forty shares sold to her brokers by Messrs. Cohen on behalf of Clayton, and that Messrs. Cohen have a lien on those shares. Mrs. Russell does not claim the shares and is not a party to this action. I do not think she had any such legal interest as was contended; at all events Messrs. Cohen's interest, if any, is equitable only. In my opinion Messrs. Cohen had no immediate and unconditional right to be registered as owners of those shares before the company had notice of the claim of the plaintiffs, or, indeed, at any time. In my opinion, in the case of the Oceana shares, as in the case of the Randfontein shares, Messrs. Cohen's interest, if any, was only on Clayton's interest in the shares.

In the case of the Oceana shares, as well as in the case of the Randfontein shares, a distringas would not have saved Messrs. Cohen from the loss they sustained in trusting Clayton, and, upon his instructions, proceeding to sell without first ascertaining that there was no stop or impediment to the registration of the transfer of the shares, although I must not be understood to say that it is usual to do that.

What I have already said with reference to the absence of negligence on the part of the plaintiffs applies to the case of the Oceana shares just as much as to that of the Randfontein shares. The result is that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in their action.

Solicitors, Andrew Wood, Purves, & Sutton, for J. Hewitt, Barnsley; Cohen & Cohen; Addison, Brown, & Jones.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } March 2.

In re MISS DRAX'S WILL.

BARONESS DUNSANY v. SAWBRIDGE. (a.)

Will—Name and arms clause—Forfeiture clause—Construction.

E. D, the widow of a peer, on becoming entitled under the terms of a will to settled estate, was required by a clause in the will, within a year of becoming so entitled, to take certain surnames and arms, and to use such surnames in all deeds and writings to which she should be a party or which she should sign, and upon all other occasions. In the event of her refusing or neglecting to take or use such surnames or arms as aforesaid she was to forfeit her interest. E. D. took the surnames and arms in accordance with the will, but neglected to use the assumed surnames in social and ordinary correspondence.

Held, that the period of a year applied only to the taking of the names and arms, and that neglect to use the same after the expiration of that period would involve a forfeiture; but that the clause in the will only required the use of the assumed surnames on formal occasions on which the use of a surname was customary, and that forfeiture was not incurred by neglecting to use them in social and ordinary correspondence.

Originating summons.

The plaintiff in this action was Ernle Elizabeth Louisa Maria Grosvenor Plunkett Ernle Erle Drax, the widow of Baron Dunsany, and under the terms of the will of the testatrix, Miss Drax, she became, in the year 1905, tenant in tail in possession of certain real estate devised thereby. The defendant was entitled in remainder after the estate tail of the plaintiff. The testatrix had inserted in her will a clause which provided that every person becoming entitled to possession of the settled estate under the terms of the will should, within one year from the time when he or she should so become entitled, take upon himself or herself, and use in all deeds and writings to which he or she should be a party, or which he or she should sign, and upon all other occasions the surnames of Erle and Drax, either alone or in addition to and after his or her original surname, and also take, use, and bear the arms of Erle and Drax, either alone or quartered with his or her original arms, and should, within the said time, apply for a licence from the Crown to take, use, and bear the said surnames and arms. There was a further clause in the will providing that, in the event of such person refusing or neglecting to take or use such surnames and arms as aforesaid, the limitations in his or her favour should thenceforth absolutely cease and determine.

The plaintiff obtained the necessary licence within the prescribed time, and assumed the surnames and arms of Erle and Drax. In social and ordinary business correspondence, however, she continued to sign herself Ernle Dunsany, and her visiting cards still bore merely her Christian name and title—Ernle, Lady Dunsany.

The object of the present summons was to decide two questions—firstly, whether non-compliance with the provisions of the name and arms clause after the expiration of a year from the date on which she became entitled would work a forfeiture as against the plaintiff at all; and secondly, whether the fact that she was still in the habit of signing ordinary correspondence with the name and title Ernle Dunsany, and using visiting cards bearing the description Ernle, Lady Dunsany, without in either case making use of the assumed surnames, was a non-compliance sufficient to work a forfeiture.

J. F. Popham for the plaintiff.—The forfeiture clause appears to be a defective one. It can only operate in the event of non-compliance taking place within the year. The usual way in which a peeress signs an ordinary letter is by her first Christian name and her title. The plaintiff may still sign ordinary letters in that style without incurring a forfeiture under the terms of the will. There is no necessity for using a surname on all occasions. The assumed names need only be used in the case of deeds and formal documents: In re Eversley, Mildmay v. Mildmay, 48 W. R. 249, [1900] 1 Ch. 96.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

C. E. Bovill, for the defendant.—The forfeiture clause is a good one and the plaintiff has incurred forfeiture. The time-limit is only imposed for the purpose of actually taking the names and arms. The names must, however, be used after the expiration of the year. The forfeiture clause is perfectly clear in intention and must be upheld. The plaintiff has not complied with the provisions of the name and arms clause.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—As regards the first question to be decided, this directory clause must bear the ordinary construction. The words "shall within one year take upon herself and use" must mean "shall within one year take upon herself and thereafter use." I cannot agree with the suggestion that the neglect or refusal must occur within the year in order to bring about forfeiture. The true intention of the directory clause would not be fulfilled by taking the surnames and arms on the last day of the period of one year and never using them again. The period of a year applies to the taking, but not to the using, and the clause indicates that continuous use is required. The first question must be answered in the affirmative.

The second question is whether the fact that the plaintiff, who is the widow of a peer, signs herself Ernle Dunsany in her ordinary correspondence and uses visiting cards with Ernle, Lady Dunsany, and no more, inscribed thereon, is a non-compliance with the clause and works a forfeiture. By the will of the testatrix the plaintiff is required, within one year after becoming entitled, to take upon herself and use in all deeds and writings to which she shall be a party or which she shall sign, and upon all other occasions, the surnames of Erle and Drax, either alone or in addition to and after her original surname, and also take, use, and bear the arms of Erle and Drax, either alone or quartered with her original arms, and within the time aforesaid apply for and endeavour to obtain a licence from the Crown or take such other means as may be requisite to enable her to do so. In this case the form used does not contain any exception in favour of peers or the wives of peers, such as is to be found in many of the common forms. Now the ordinary way in which a peer is formally described is by his Christian name, with a prefix suitable to his rank, such as "Most noble" or "Most honourable," followed by his title, but without using a surname Now, although the plaintiff has procured the necessary licence, and has also in fact assumed the surnames of Erle and Drax, she continues in social and ordinary correspondence to sign herself Ernle Dunsany, as before, and her visiting cards still bear the inscription Ernle, Lady Dunsany. In my opinion, although she is required to make use of the assumed surnames "in all deeds and writings to which she shall be a party or which she shall sign," this cannot be taken to extend to the case of all her letters and her visiting cards. I consider that the expression "writings" is intended to include all writings of a formal character, not being deeds, which she shall sign. The clause continues: "and upon all other occasions," and I consider this to refer only to occasions upon which a surname would properly and commonly be used; such an occasion would be the making of an affidavit in these proceedings. The plaintiff would not be required to use the assumed names in family, private, or ordinary business correspondence, and I therefore answer the second question in the negative.

Solicitors, Woodcock, Rylands, & Parker, for Preston & Francis, Bournemouth; Routh, Stacey, & Castle.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Feb. 27.

HOPKINS v. GUDGEON AND ANOTHER.
GUDGEON, Claimant. (a.)

Bill of sale—Registration—Execution creditor—Interpleader—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 8.

Where a person sets up as against a judgment creditor a title for goods which have been throughout in the possession of the judgment debtor, the claimant must show either a registered title or something done with the goods which renders registration unnecessary.

A. sold his furniture to B., a company, retaining the possession of it for a weekly monetary consideration; the transaction was not registered under the Bills of Sale Acts. Subsequently B. sold this furniture to C., the mother of A., for £200, the furniture still remaining in the possession of A. A. then removed to another town, taking the said furniture with him. Upon seizure in execution of a judgment debt, C. claimed the furniture;

Held, that the furniture having remained throughout in the possession of A., C.'s claim was not protected, as she could not show a title by any registered bill of sale, or anything that rendered registration unnecessary.

Appeal from the county court of Hampshire holden at Portsmouth.

By an agreement dated the 31st of December, 1903, the defendant, Mr. T. W. Gudgeon, transferred his business and all his effects at Ryde, including his household furniture, to a limited company, one of the terms of the agreement being that he should retain the use of the furniture in consideration of a weekly monetary payment. The agreement referred to was not registered as a bill of sale.

In July, 1904, the company was in financial difficulties, and to assist it Mrs. Gudgeon, the mother of T. W. Gudgeon, purchased the furniture for £200, the furniture still remaining in the possession of T. W. Gudgeon.

In December, 1904, it was finally removed by him from Ryde to Southsea.

In April, 1905, judgment was recovered against T W Gudgeon for £53 10s., and execution was levied on the furniture. Mrs. Gudgeon having claimed the property as her's, the judgment creditor interpleaded, and the learned county court judge gave judgment against the claimant.

She now appealed.

Grimwood Mears, for the appellant.—These goods were not in the apparent possession of the grantor, and therefore, as they are admittedly the property of Mrs. Gudgeon, could not be seized in execution. T. W. Gudgeon, the judgment debtor, was not the grantor to Mrs. Gudgeon. He transferred the goods to the company by an agreement which, by section 8 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, would have been void as against a judgment creditor. But he was not the grantor to Mrs. Gudgeon; the company was the grantor, and she perfected her title by removing the goods from Ryde to Southsea; in other words, the goods must have been in the possession of the company to have enabled the judgment creditor to make out his claim. In Morewood v. South Yorkshire Railway, 28 L. J. Exch. 114, A. executed a fraudulent bill of sale to B., who assigned it to C., an innocent party, the goods remaining all the time in the possession of A. Held, that C.'s title was protected as against

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

B.'s creditors. The cases show that you need not prove title throughout. Again, in Antoniadi v. Smith, 49 W. R. 693, [1901] 2 K. B. 589, the goods remained all the time in the possession of the original grantor of the bill of sale. The claimant in that case held under a duly registered bill of sale although her grantor did not. In the present case the title of the claimant, instead of being by registration, is by removal of the goods from the possession of the grantor, the company.

English Harrison, K.C. (Cababé with him), for the respondent.—The distinction between the Antoniadi case and the present is that there there was registration, and here there is not. That is clearly pointed out by Stirling, L.J., at p. 595, in his comment upon Lord Selborne's judgment in Cookson v. Swire, 33 W. R. 181, 9 App. Cas. 653, at p 663 (and see Karet v. Kisher, 2 Q. B. D. 361. Where the goods remain all the time in the possession of the original grantor, then whether there be one or more transfers of the property, you must show upon the register that the goods in the apparent possession of the original grantor are not really his.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Speaking for myself, these cases always present difficulties, and I am not very familiar with this branch of the law. It seems to me, on the broad principles which I have put to both counsel, that the decision of the learned county court judge is right. [His lordship stated the facts as set out above.] The goods have been throughout either in the actual or apparent possession of Mr. Gudgeon, the transferor to the company. In 1903 he sells the goods to the company by an absolute bill of sale, a document which, had the question then arisen between the claimant and the execution creditor, would require to have been registered. In July, 1904, the claimant pays £200 for the goods, in order that the debts of the company and her son may be paid, and that transaction is perfectly bonâ fide. Some time after that, in December, 1904, the goods are removed to Southsea, still remaining in the possession of the judgment debtor. The simple question is, when they are claimed by a bonâ fide purchaser from the company can she defeat the title of the judgment creditor if there be no registration of any part of the title. I say "any part" because from Lord Selborne's judgment in Cookson v. Swire it may possibly be that registration of the bill of sale by the company to her would have done. I do not say it would have done; the case may yet arise.

Section 8 provides that an unregistered title shall be void as against a person who claims to defeat an execution creditor. The point upon which I decide this case is this: It seems to me, where no part of the title has been registered at all and the goods have remained throughout in the possession of the judgment debtor, the title of the claimant cannot prevail. If the transaction is perfected by registration, or if possession is taken, so that you do not require to rely upon registration or any other reason that appears upon the face of the transaction, so that the transaction has become completed, the judgment creditor cannot impugn it, and Cookson v. Swire shows that where you have a title independent of registration, after the transaction has been perfected by seizure of the goods there is no necessity to register. The earlier case of Karet v. Kosher seems to me to be a case where the principle which I am considering was applied. It was there held by Field, J., to be necessary to an assignee claiming to prove a registered bill of sale. I do not refer to it as an authority, but as an instance where you cannot read the whole transaction as being independent of a bill of sale, and it may be necessary to set up a registered bill of sale. What would be the consequence of Mr. Mears' argument? The goods are in possession of the judgment debtor all the time; there is an unregistered bill of sale; there have been many transactions, some by document, some by payment of money, although there is no indication that the judgment debtor has ever parted with the goods—nothing has been done to get rid of the want of registration, and the mischief which the statute aims at is not met. The argument on the other side is, where you set up title in the goods of the debtor you must show either a registered bill of sale or that you do not rely upon a bill of sale from the original assignor. Antoniadi v. Smith rested solely upon the fact that the mother-in-law was in possession and it would not be necessary for her to re-register the bill of sale. Cookson v. Swire was a case in which the transaction had been perfected by possession and the old bill of sale was not necessary to establish the title of the claimant against the execution creditor.

Morewood v. South Yorkshire Railway is the nearest case in one sense to Mr. Mears' argument, but that was not a question of title at all, but an attempt to impeach an honest transaction by an antecedent transaction, and Bramwell, B., says in effect that fraud under the statute of Elizabeth could not be used against the claimant, she being no party to the fraud. I think, therefore, that, notwithstanding the argument of Mr. Mears, where a person sets up within five years as against a judgment creditor a title for goods which have been throughout in the possession of the judgment debtor the claimant must show either a registered title or something done with these goods which renders registration unnecessary. In my opinion the county court judge came to the right conclusion.

RIDLEY and DARLING, JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, Geare & Miller, for Bowker & Sons, Winchester.

Solicitor for respondent, Beal, for J. Robinson, Southsea.

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) — Feb. 16.

SOUTH BRITISH FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE CO. OF NEW ZEALAND v. DE COSTA AND OTHERS. (a.)

Insurance (Marine)—Reinsurance—"£1,000 excess of £500"—Loss of barge-load—£298 paid by insurers—F.P.A. clause—"Each craft to be deemed a separate insurance."

A policy of reinsurance was effected by the plaintiffs (insurers) with the defendants for "£1,000 excess of £500." The policy contained these clauses: "including all risk of craft and/or raft and/or of any special lighterage, each craft, raft, or lighter to be deemed a separate insurance"; "warranted free from particular average unless the ship or craft or cargo be stranded, sunk . . ." The plaintiffs paid the assured £298, their proportion, in respect of the loss of a barge-load of wheat, which was being carried to the vessel, the barge sinking; the total amount of the plaintiffs' risk in that craft load was £400. The defendants refused to pay their proportion of the reinsured amount of £1,000 excess of £500.

Held, "£1,000 excess of £500" meant that if the plaintiffs were interested to an amount over £500, then for that excess up to £1,000 the defendants relieve the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs had rightfully paid £298 to the assured, and the defendants were liable to pay their proportion—viz., £70 4s. 4d.—to the plaintiffs. The clause "each craft to be deemed a separate insurance" was put in solely with reference to a particular average claim, and meant that if a craft was lost with part of the whole insured interest, it was to be treated as if it were a separate insurance.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Action in the Commercial Court, before Bigham, J., sitting without a jury.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover the sum of £70 4s. 4d., being the defendants' proportion of the amount subscribed by them on a policy of reinsurance.

On the 5th of June, 1905, the plaintiffs by a provisional slip insured for £2,000 a cargo of wheat to be carried in the steamship Whinfield from Ghenitscheck in the Black Sea to the United Kingdom. As the value of the wheat had not then been ascertained the provisional slip was effected.

The plaintiffs reinsured with other underwriters a part of their risk to the extent of £500.

The plaintiffs reinsured with the defendants a part of their risk by an open slip which was for "£1,000 excess of £500: F.P.A. . . . Quay and craft risks."

When the value of the wheat was subsequently ascertained to be £1,914, the following policy for £1,914 was issued by the plaintiffs: "Lost or not lost, at and from Ghenitscheck to Barrow-in-Furness, including risk of craft to and from the ship. Upon any kind of goods . . . of and in the good ship . . . called The Whinfield S. . . . The said ship, &c. . . . goods and merchandizes . . . are and shall be rated and valued at £1,914 on . . . wheat, including £200 freight advances subject to clauses as attached."

". . . And it is . . . agreed that corn . . . and seed shall be and are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship or craft be stranded, sunk, or burnt . . . and that all other goods, also the ship and freight, shall be and are warranted free from average under three pounds per centum, unless general, or the ship or craft be stranded, sunk, or burnt."

The following clauses were attached: "Including all risks of craft and/or raft and/or of any special lighterage (each craft, raft, package, or lighter to be deemed a separate insurance) . . ."; "warranted free from particular average under 3 per cent., unless the ship or craft or cargo be stranded, sunk . . ."

The policy was dated the 3rd of July, 1905, and was effected by Messrs. Capel Cure & Co., for the assured with the plaintiffs.

On the 10th of July, 1905, or thereabouts, shortly after this policy was issued, it was discovered that a barge going to the ship with about £3,000 worth of wheat on board of it had sunk, and in respect of that loss sustained by the cargo owners, the plaintiffs, under their policy for £1,914, paid their proportion, amounting to £298, the amount of their interest in that craft-load being about £400.

On the 25th of July, 1905, the policy of reinsurance was issued by the defendants, which was as follows: "£1,000 excess of £500 . . . lost or not lost, at and from Ghenitscheck to any port and/or ports, place, and/or places in the United Kingdom and on the Continent of Europe, as per original policy or policies. Warehouse to warehouse. Being a reinsurance of the South British Insurance Co. Upon any kind of goods . . . of and in the good ship . . . The Whinfield. . . . The said ship, &c., goods and merchandize, &c. . . . are and shall be valued at £1,000 on grain and/or cargo and/or advances valued as per original policy or policies. Warranted F.P.A., &c., as per clause attached . . . N.B.—Corn . . . and seed are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded; sugar . . . and all other goods, also the ship and freight are warranted free from average under three pounds per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt."

The following clauses were attached to the policy: "Including all risks of craft and/or raft and/or of any special lighterage (each craft, raft, or lighter to be deemed a separate insurance). . . ." "Warranted free from particular average unless the ship or craft or cargo be stranded, sunk, . . ."

The plaintiffs on paying the £298 called upon the defendants to pay £70 4s. 4d., being the latter's proportion of the reinsured amount of £1,000 excess of £500; this the defendants refused to do, denying liability.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Mackinnon, for the plaintiffs.—The clause in the policy that each craft was to be deemed a separate insurance was inserted in view of the p.a. warranty for the purpose of enabling the assured to recover for a total loss of one barge-load as a total loss of a thing separately insured. The insurers were interested to a greater extent than £500—viz., £1,914 in the whole cargo, and the defendants are liable for their proportion in excess of £500 up to £1,000. "£1,000 excess of £500" defines the interest.

Scrutton, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the defendants.—The amount of the plaintiffs' risk on the barge was not £500. No risk was to attach under the defendants' policy unless the plaintiffs were interested to an amount in excess of £500, and as each craft was to be deemed a separate insurance the defendants are not liable because the plaintiffs were not interested in that craft-load to an amount exceeding £500.

BIGHAM, J.—It is a little difficult for me to state the facts in this case, but I have very little doubt as to the conclusion which I ought to arrive at. It appears that on the 5th of June, 1905, Mr. Capel Cure proposed to the plaintiffs an insurance of £2,000 on wheat to be carried from some place in the Black Sea to England in a steamer called The Whinfield, and the risk, as I understand, was from warehouse to warehouse, the cargo coming to the United Kingdom. It was not known at that time what the value of the cargo would be, but the proportion that the plaintiffs were to underwrite was estimated at £2,000. The actual sum that they were to be at risk for, was to be ascertained later on. On the 13th of June the plaintiffs desired to reinsure part of their risk, and they went to some brokers named Matthews, Wrightson, & Co., and they reinsured what is called "£1,000 excess of £500." Now, the question that I have had some trouble about was as to what that exactly meant, but I think I now understand what it does mean. It means this, that if on the original policy it should turn out that the plaintiffs were interested to an amount over £500 then for that excess up to £1,000 the reinsurers, the clients of Messrs. Matthews, Wrightson, & Co., should relieve the plaintiffs. That risk the plaintiffs took. The next thing that happened was that the owners of the cargo ascertained the value of the whole cargo and knew what each original underwriter was to make himself responsible for, and the proportion in respect of which the plaintiffs were to make themselves responsible was ascertained at £1,914, being less by £86 than the provisional amount which had been inserted in the original policy. That policy was issued on the 3rd of July, and the policy was then drawn up with those words inserted in it. On the 10th of July, or thereabouts, shortly after this policy was issued, it was discovered that a barge going to the ship with about £3,000 worth of wheat on board it had sunk, and it seems to be agreed—I think rightly—that the loss sustained by the cargo owners by the loss of that barge was a loss falling upon the plaintiffs amongst others, and the plaintiffs have in fact paid their share of that loss, amounting, as I understand, to £298. As soon as this loss was ascertained the plaintiffs came upon the defendants, the reinsurers, and asked them to pay the proportion which they had undertaken to be responsible for—namely, the excess up to £1,000 beyond £500. The defendants refused to pay, and as I understand, they refused to pay because of a clause in their policy. I ought to have mentioned that their policy was issued and was dated the 25th of July, 1905. They refused to pay because of a clause attached to their policy which is headed "Special F.P.A. Clause," and which is in these words: "Including all risks of craft and/or raft and/or of any special lighterage (each craft, raft, or lighter to be deemed a separate insurance)." It is said by the defendants that the amount which the plaintiffs had at risk on this particular barge did not amount to £500; that is to say, their proportion which they would have to pay having regard to the other policies which were in existence on the whole of the cargo did not amount to £500 in this barge; and therefore, say the defendants, inasmuch as each craft, raft, or lighter is to be deemed a separate insurance, the defendants are not liable; there is no excess beyond £500. Now of course that depends upon whether these words which I have just read, being the first words upon this so-called F.P.A. clause, applied at all to the circumstances of this case. It is well known that insurance policies, like charter-parties and other documents of the kind, and bills of lading too—it is well known that documents used in shipping business are made to include all sorts of provisions which may or may not be applicable to the particular contract which is being made, and it is to be remembered that this was a contract of reinsurance—a contract primarily meant to indemnify the man who is already at risk against that risk. That is the primary object of this contract. And one must look to see whether these words which are relied upon by the defendants to excuse them from paying under their policy really do relieve them from their liability. Now I have always had a view about the meaning of these words, gathered from a very long experience—a view which I find is confirmed by the plaintiffs' evidence and by the evidence given to me by Mr. Capel Cure. These words, in my opinion, are put in with reference to, and solely with reference to, a particular average claim, and they have this and only this meaning, that if a craft is lost containing part of the whole insured interest that craft shall, although it only contains part of the whole, be treated as if it were a separate insurance, so that although it is only part yet it shall be paid for as if it were the whole. That is the object of this clause. There is very often another object—that is to say, where the clause is that only a particular loss exceeding 3 per cent. is to be paid. There may be a loss in a barge or craft which is not anything like 3 per cent. of the whole, but which is considerably in excess of 3 per cent. of what is in the barge The clause applies in those cases, and gives to the assured a right to ask the underwriter, notwithstanding the clause as to paying nothing under 3 per cent., to pay, and, in my opinion, this clause is inserted with reference to those considerations, and to those considerations alone, and ought not to be read, and would not be read in ordinary business by underwriters or by merchants as in any way affecting this contract of reinsurance—this promise by the defendants to stand in with the plaintiffs and to indemify them in respect of the risks which the plaintiffs have undertaken. I am satisfied that the defendants are liable. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for the defendants, Thomas Cooper & Co.

K. B. Div. } Feb. 8.
Farwell, J. }

GUARDIANS OF WANDSWORTH UNION v. WORTHINGTON. (a.)

Poor law—Lunatic pauper—Maintenance—Recovery of arrears—Payments on account—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16).

A lunatic pauper was for many years before her death maintained at the expense of the Wandsworth Union. During this time the receiver in lunacy of her estate paid the whole of her income to the guardians in part payment of arrears of maintenance.

Held, that this was sufficient payment on account to enable the guardians to recover all such arrears from the lunatic's estate after her death.

In re Newbegin's Estate, 36 W. R. 69, 36 Ch. D. 477, and In re Watson, 47 W. R. 359, [1899] 1 Ch. 72, applied.

Mary Jane Worthington, a lunatic not so found by inquisition was maintained at the expense of the guardians of Wandsworth Union from 1876 until the date of her death in July, 1904, at an annual cost of £21. The lunatic was, together with her two sisters, also lunatics, entitled to a small amount of real and personal property.

In July, 1886, an order in lunacy was made "in the matter of Mary Jane Worthington, Caroline Amelia Worthington, and Agnes Louisa Worthington, persons of unsound mind not so found by inquisition," by which Thomas Worthington, their brother, was appointed receiver of their estates and was authorized to receive the income of the lunatics' estates and to apply such income for their maintenance and benefit.

T. Worthington died in 1897, and the defendant, a sister of the lunatic, was appointed receiver of the income in his place.

Under these orders the receiver for the time being had paid the whole income of the lunatic, some £10 per annum, to the guardians of Wandsworth Union down to 1903, and it had been applied in part discharge of arrears of maintenance.

On the death of the lunatic in July, 1904, there was a sum of £337 owing to the guardians.

The defendant took out letters of administration to the estate of the lunatic, which was sworn at £426, and the guardians now claimed to recover from the administratrix the whole sum due to them on account of part maintenance.

S. Mayer, for the plaintiffs.—The payments made by the receiver in lunacy were payments on account. The estate could not then be wholly administered, and the income available was obviously insufficient for the total expense of maintaining the lunatic. There was sufficient payment on account to prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations, since the estate of a deceased lunatic was, so far as regarded its rights and liabilities, in the same position as any other estate.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

R. C. Glen, for the defendant.—Only six years of maintenance can now be recovered. It was decided in In re Newbegin's Estate, 36 W. R. 69, 36 Ch. D. 477, that in the case of a pauper lunatic obtaining a bequest of money the Statute of Limitations applied, and only six years up to the date of the writ could be recovered. In this case the payments relied upon were made by the receiver in lunacy, who was an officer of the court, and not in a position to bind the lunatic's estate by his acts.

FARWELL, J.—The cases of In re Newbegin's Estate, and In re Watson, 47 W. R. 359, [1899] 1 Ch. 72, settle clearly that a lunatic pauper may plead the Statute of Limitations. But he is subject to the same rights and liabilities as the ordinary person who pleads the statute. The plaintiffs, therefore, may prove payments on account if they can. Then is there anything in the payments here to take the case out of the statute? It is said for the defence that the payments, being made by the receiver in lunacy, could not be held to be admissions binding the estate of the lunatic. The payments were made for the maintenance and benefit of the lunatic by the direction of the court. Now it is plain that the actual income was too small for the payments to be other than on account of maintenance, and to my mind it is also plain that the court must have known that the income was insufficient and that the payments were only payments on account. In my opinion the court must have authorized these payments of income with a view to preventing litigation being begun by the guardians to enforce their claims, which otherwise they would assuredly have done. I think that this is sufficient answer to the plea of the statute and there will accordingly be judgment for the amount claimed.

Solicitors, W. W. Young, Son, & Ward; S. W. Johnson & Son, for Fisher, Jesson, & Co., Ashby-de-la-Zouch.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Jan. 11.

COWLING v. TOPPING. (a.)

Insurance—Life—Industrial assurance company—Dispute—Claim for over £20 against a society which issues policies also for less amounts—Jurisdiction of justices as regards policy exceeding £20—Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 26), ss. 1, 7.

Section 7 of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, only gives jurisdiction to a court of summary jurisdiction in cases where the dispute arises with reference to a life policy granted for a less sum than £20.

Case stated by two justices of the Borough of St. Helen's, before whom a complaint, under the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, and the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, was brought by one Eliza Topping against the London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Assurance Co. (for and on behalf of whom Cowling acted), whereby she claimed, as the executrix under the will of one John Topping, £22 19*s.* under a policy granted for that amount on the life of the testator.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was inter alia contended on behalf of the company that, the claim being for over £20, the justices had no jurisdiction by virtue of section 1, read with section 7, of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896.

Section 1 is as follows: "This Act shall apply to every such (a) friendly society or branch, whether registered or unregistered (in this Act referred to as a collecting society); and (b) person or body of persons, whether corporate or unincorporate, granting assurances on any one life for a less sum than £20 (in this Act referred to an industrial assurance company)."

Section 7 is as follows: "In all disputes between a collecting society or industrial insurance company and any member or person insured, or any person claiming through a member or person insured, or under the rules, that member or person may, notwithstanding any provisions of the rules of the society or company to the contrary, apply to the county court, or to the court of summary jurisdiction for the place where that member or other person reside, and the court may settle that dispute according to the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896."

The justices were of opinion that the words of section 1 (b) of the Collecting Societies Act, 1896, "granting assurances on any one life for less than £20," had the effect of bringing the company (a society which granted such assurances) within the denotation of the term "industrial assurance companies" and so made the procedure in dispute between members and the company subject to section 7 of the same Act, and, therefore, that their jurisdiction was not limited to amounts under £20. They accordingly entertained the complaint and made an order in favour of Eliza Topping, but they stated this case for the opinion of the court as to whether they were right in so doing.

Cowling appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Frank Dodd, for the appellant.—It is submitted that in this case the justices had no jurisdiction because sub-section 6 of section 1 of the Act of 1896 is made to apply only to those persons or companies granting assurance on any one life for a sum less than £20. This company issues policies above that sum. To hold that the justices could entertain this claim would be at variance with the whole of the legislation on such subjects in which the jurisdiction of the justices is strictly limited. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Do you say that the Act only applies to companies which confine themselves to issuing policies for sums under £20?] Yes, otherwise the jurisdiction of the justices would have no limit if the company issued some policies for £10 say and upwards. In Baden Fuller's Law of Friendly Societies (2nd ed.) p. 148, the opinion is expressed that the Act applies only to that class of industrial assurance companies assuring the payment of sums less than £20, the premiums on which are collected at less periodical intervals than two months. In Stone's Justices' Manual (37th ed.), p. 361, there is a footnote (c) which runs thus: "We consider justices have jurisdiction though the policy is for a sum greater than £20." That appears to have been followed in practice, and therefore this decision becomes the more important. [He was stopped.]

Ross Brown, for the respondent.—The note in Stone's Justices' Manual to shows that the practice has been that in cases where a company issues policies for less than £20 the justices have jurisdiction. The appellant's contention involves the reading into the statute words of limitation that are not there. It is submitted that the words of section 7 ought not to be read in the way contended for by the appellant. It does not matter what sort of insurance company it is, once its business is for small sums under £20 disputes can be decided by justices. There is no direct decision on the question. The object of this legislation was to give special jurisdiction in respect of policies issued by a company doing business in small policies under £20. Such societies become for the purpose of the statute "collecting societies," and they must submit to the jurisdiction of a court of summary jurisdiction.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am clearly of opinion that this objection to the jurisdiction must prevail. I wish it to be understood that I express no opinion at all upon the other point—namely, as to the right of the executrix to recover in a proper proceeding. But this Act has conferred a special jurisdiction upon courts of summary jurisdiction, and I think it is quite plain from the long course of legislation of a similar kind, that it was intended to confer jurisdiction in regard to some policies only. The analogy of the other Acts show that there had been limits of amounts and limits of a different kinds imposed in cases of such disputes. Now, the language of this statute is this: "This Act shall apply to every such person or body of persons whether corporate or in orporate granting assurances on any one life for a less sum than £20." It is contended by Mr. Ross Brown, and I quite agree it is the only contention open to him, that the section means if the society or body of persons chooses to grant assurances on lives for less sums than £20, the justices have jurisdiction over all their policies for whatever amount. That it is possible to read the language in that way I do not deny; but it seems to me to be contrary to the spirit of the whole of this class of legislation and would be a strange way of depriving persons of a right which they certainly have according to the ordinary law of the land. I think the only construction that can be properly put upon this section is that it is to give the special jurisdiction in respect of the contracts which are granted by the insurance companies for a less sum than £20. A question may arise some day as to whether or not the society would be outside the Act because it granted insurances for a larger amount, but at any rate the limit must be put upon it that the amount which can be made the subject of the special jurisdiction under section 7 is a policy for an amount not exceeding £20.

I therefore think the magistrates had no jurisdiction to entertain this claim and that the appeal must succeed.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

DARLING, J.—I agree.

Solicitors for the appellant, Wynne-Baxter & Keeble.

Solicitors for the respondent, H. V. Baines, for Swift & Garner, St. Helen's.

K. B. Div. (Channell, J.) Nov. 18; Dec. 2.

CARRINGTONS (LIMITED) v. SMITH. (a.)

Money-lender—Transaction harsh and unconsionable—Right to relief—Money-lenders Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c 51), s. 1.

The defendant borrowed from the plaintiffs, who were registered money-lenders, £150, giving promissory notes, one of £150 payable in twelve monthly instalments of £12 10s., and another for £72 payable in six monthly instalments of £12. The defendant at the date of the transaction owed £150 to other creditors. He had an income of £1,000 a year and property valued at £9,000. The defendant was a man of business and thoroughly understood the transaction, and there had been no misrepresentation by the money-lenders.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to relief under the Money-lenders Act, 1900.

Action tried before Channell, J., without a jury.

The facts of the case and the arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Wallace Atkins, for the plaintiffs.

T. B. Napier, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 2.—CHANNELL, J., read the following judgment: This action was brought to recover a balance of £62 10s. due on a promissory note. The note was admitted, and the defendant claimed relief under the Money-lenders Act. The facts are as follows: The defendant T. Johnston Smith is a director of a publishing company. He has as such director an income which he estimates at £1,000 per annum, derived, however, partly, at any rate, from commissions. He lives at Beckenham, and he estimates that the furniture in his house there, which, with the exception of a grand piano, is his own, is worth £3,000, and he has pictures which he estimates to be worth £6,000. He was called as a witness, and he appeared to be a quite reliable one. I accept his statements, except his opinion as to the exact value of his pictures and furniture, which he probably overestimates, as most owners of such property do. In December, 1904, he owed about £150, his creditors were said to be pressing for payment, but had not taken any steps to enforce it, and no execution was imminent or anything of that kind. Having no ready money to pay, and having seen an advertisement or received a circular from the plaintiffs, who are registered as money-lenders, he called at their office. The circular or advertisement which took him to the plaintiffs was not put in, and no complaint was made of its terms. He saw a manager and told him that he wanted a loan of £150, and stated the facts as to his position which I have mentioned above. The manager arranged to call at his house at Beckenham in order to judge of the correctness of those statements, and accordingly came on Saturday afternoon, the 31st of December. He was shown into the dining-room and into the drawing-room, and said that he was satisfied. The defendant says that pictures worth about £3,000 were in these two rooms. The plaintiffs' manager then said that he had £100 with him, which he could lend the defendant then, that he had no more with him, but would lend another £50 if the defendant would call at their office in the next week. A conversation then took place as to the terms. The defendant had previously refused to give a bill of sale, and no other security was suggested. The manager said that he should expect £50 for the loan of £100, taking a promissory note for £150, payable by twelve monthly instalments of £12 10s. each. The form of the note was produced, and it contained a clause that on default in payment of any instalment the whole was to become due. The defendant made no objection to the terms, or to the default clause, but asked whether if he was able to pay off the whole before the time a reduction would be made, and he was told that in that event a substantial reduction should be made. The defendant signed the note now sued on, and a few days afterwards went to the plaintiffs' office, got the other £50, and signed another similar promissory note for the repayment of £72 by six monthly instalments. On the occasion of his signing the second promissory note he made a statutory declaration as to his property, and when he signed the first note he had given a receipt for the £100, in which he made similar statements. The defendant quite clearly understood all this. He is intelligent and a man of business, not one of those company directors who are sometimes seen in courts of justice, and who appear to have been selected for the office, not because of their knowledge of business, but because of their want of it. He was not in any great necessity: he merely wanted to pay off the few creditors he had to the amount of £150, and believed, and, as the event I think proved, was right in believing, that he could pay the monthly instalments, and he no doubt preferred to pay the £50 asked by the plaintiffs for the accommodation rather than disclose his temporary embarrassment to any friends who knew him by trying to borrow from them or through them on better terms. He paid the monthly instalments until the month of August, not exactly on the due dates, but never more than a day or two late, and he thus had paid off the whole of the £72 note, and had paid seven out of the twelve instalments on the £150 note. He did not, however, pay the instalment due on the 1st of September, and on the 7th of September he wrote excusing his non-payment on the ground of the holidays, and added: "As I have already paid more than the amount of the loans I shall be glad to know the net amount you would accept to settle the balance." The plaintiffs, or rather the liquidator of the plaintiffs' company, which appears then to have gone into liquidation, wrote back, asking for the cheque to be sent as soon as possible, and stated that they "were unable to make any reduction." The defendant took no notice of this letter, but upon getting another letter again asking for the cheque for £12 10s. he consulted a solicitor, who wrote on the 18th of September the following letter:

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"355, Birkbeck Bank-chambers, Holborn, London, W.C., Sept. 18, 1905.

"Dear Sir,—My client, Mr. T. Johnson-Smith, has seen me in reference to your letter to him of the 8th inst., and has instructed me to offer you a sum of £10 10s. in full satisfaction of your claim against him for principal, interest and, costs.

"This, added to the £159 10s. he has repaid you, works out at more than 20 per cent. interest per annum for the period he has had the money.

"Having regard to the value of the security which you hold the interest you are charging is excessive.

"I shall be pleased to hear from you.

"Yours faithfully,

"(Signed) WALTER S. CROOKES.

"The Liquidator, C. & C. Carringtons (Limited), 9, Old Cavendish-street, W."

There was, of course, no security, and the solicitor seems to have been misinstructed or to have made a mistake about this, and it will be observed that the offer only gave the money-lender £20 for his loan of £150 cash, and that by reopening the transaction on the note which had been paid in full without demur, on the advance in respect of which the plaintiffs are now suing, they were to have no interest at all. This letter led to further correspondence, which, however, was without prejudice, and shortly afterwards the writ in this action was issued.

These facts appear to be consistent with the defendant's having agreed to the plaintiffs' terms without ever intending to comply with them, but intending all along to set up, as he is now doing, the Money-lenders Act, and to try and get off on paying some small rate of interest, knowing very well that the plaintiffs never would have made him the advance on such terms. Such conduct, however, would in my opinion be grossly dishonest, and the defendant being apparently quite a respectable man, I hesitate to come to the conclusion that his conduct is to be accounted for in that way, and prefer to assume that he had intended to pay, but that some time about September he changed his mind on what appears to me to be bad advice. It is, I think, necessary to consider very carefully whether the Money-lenders Act applies to such a case as this. There seems to me to be from first to last no misrepresentation by the money-lenders, and no taking advantage of the ignorance or of the necessity of the borrower. There is nothing but the taking of £50 for a loan of £100, repayable by instalments over twelve months. The rate of interest calculated at a rate per annum on the amount of principal remaining due from time to time works out, I believe, at about 75 per cent. per annum. I do not know whether the defendant by his letter of the 7th of September meant to call on the plaintiffs to fulfil their promise to make a reduction if he was able to pay before the money was due, but he does not remind them of it, and it will be observed that he was then in arrear. I cannot think that there is anything to complain of in the formal reply asking him to pay up his arrears, and except the solicitor's letter, which hardly assists the defendant's case, all the remaining correspondence is without prejudice. We are therefore unable to say what offers may subsequently have been made, nor can any subsequent refusal of the money-lender to make a reduction for present payment bring the case within the Act if it was not so before. It is said that the Money-lenders Act applies because there was no risk. On the facts, as I have found them, of course the plaintiffs did not really run any substantial risk of losing their money, because the defendant had ample goods on which to levy when judgment is obtained against him; but it by no means follows that the plaintiffs knew or ought to have known how safe the matter really was. They had no security, and were accepting the defendants' personal promise to repay and his own assertions of his ability to do so, uncorroborated otherwise than by his being in apparent possession of a good house of furniture and pictures; and any money-lender must know that there are always risks of the statements of borrowers proving incorrect. Under these circumstances I should suppose a high rate of interest would certainly be suggested, and the borrower's willingness to pay that high rate would tend to make the lender think the risk likely to prove greater than he had thought rather than less. So far as the risk is material, it seems to me that it is not what was the real risk as ascertained after the event which has to be looked at, but how the matter would present itself to the lender at the time, with the experience he certainly would have of borrowers. I do not, however, think that the risk is the only matter to be considered. The words of the Act, leaving out those which are immaterial, are "where proceedings are taken and there is evidence which satisfies the court that the interest charged in respect of the sum actually lent is excessive, or that the amounts charged for expenses, &c., are excessive, and that in either case the transaction is harsh and unconscionable or is otherwise such that a court of equity would give relief, the court may reopen the transaction, &c." Now it is not, of course, permissible to construe the words of the Act by any knowledge we may have of the circumstances under which the Bill was brought in, or of the intentions of those who promoted it, or as to what was introduced into the Bill by way of amendment. I think, however, that the words of the Act do of themselves show quite clearly that an effort has been made (possibly without much success) to define the transactions which the court may reopen. There seem to me to be clear indications that it was not intended to give jurisdiction to a judge to reopen transactions merely if in his individual opinion too much interest had been charged. Further, I think any court ought to lean against any such construction of an Act of Parliament. The function of a judge in this country, and I should think in all civilized countries, is to ascertain and deduce the rules of law (or of equity when there is a distinct system of equity as distinguished from law), and to decide the rights of the parties before him according to those rules, and not according to his own idea of abstract right or justice. When, before the Judicature Act, a bill was dismissed for want of equity, what was meant was that the suitor had not brought the case within the rules according to which the court of equity gave relief, and not that there was no abstract equity or justice in his case. It would, in my opinion, be mischievous in the extreme if the Legislature were, even in a limited class of cases, such as those between money-lenders and borrowers, to give the judges jurisdiction to decide cases without some definite rule to go by, and I do not think they have done it, although in the Act now under consideration there is considerable difficulty to find the rule. No great while after the Act was passed Ridley, J., in Wilton v. Osborne, [1901] 2 K. B. 110, 49 W. R. Dig. 124, in a judgment in which he reviewed the equity cases, held that "harsh and unconscionable or otherwise such that a court of equity would give relief" meant so harsh and unconscionable as that a court of equity would give relief, or in some other way besides that recognized way such that a court of equity would give relief. I also held the same, but I think that my opinion may have been unduly influenced by the personal knowledge I had as to how the words in question got into the Act of Parliament. The Court of Appeal, however, in In re A Debtor 51 W. R. 370, [1903] 1 K. B. 705, held that this view was wrong, and that a transaction may be "harsh and unconscionable" within the meaning of the Money-lenders Act, though not so harsh and unconscionable as that a court of equity could have given relief before the Act. That decision is, of course, binding on me, and the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Ridley is therefore gone, and we must look somewhere else for the rule as to what transaction may be reopened. The difficulty is that the words remaining are so vague. Harsh and unconscionable are not easy words to construe when the rules of the court of equity have been put out of consideration, but they are at any rate used to describe some conduct of the money-lender, and it may be easy enough in many cases to say whether or not his conduct can be fairly described by those epithets. There is a much greater difficulty as it seems to me in the word "excessive." It is a relative word—exceeding what? Interest is nothing but the sum to be paid for the use of money for a certain time, and the value of a loan of money, as of everything else, is what it will fetch. The usury laws have been done away with, and the Legislature seems to have intentionally avoided re-enacting them and telling us what is to be the maximum of lawful interest. There are, however, some words further on in the section which I think are a guide to the meaning of the Legislature in the use of the word "excessive." If the transaction is re-opened the court may "relieve the person sued from payment of any sum in excess of the sum adjudged by the court to be fairly due in respect of such interest as the court, having regard to the risk and all the circumstances, may adjudge to be reasonable." It seems therefore that the court is to make an adjudication as to what interest, "having regard to the risk and all the circumstances," is reasonable, and then if the interest charged is in excess of that amount it seems that it is excessive within the meaning of that word as used earlier in the section. This task would often be a difficult one, but amongst "all the circumstances" which the court is to take into consideration, surely the fact the borrower has thoroughly understood the transaction and, knowing all the facts much better than the court can possibly do, has been quite willing to pay the interest asked, is one of the circumstances which the court must consider. Often the court will not have that circumstance to guide them. The borrower is frequently ignorant, sometimes imposed upon; frequently in such straits that he has no alternative, but must take the money on the only terms he can get it. In those cases the man's agreement to pay the interest asked can be of no real guide to the court. But in the case before me there is nothing, unless the Act of Parliament forbids it, to prevent my saying that the defendant knew much better than I do what it was reasonable for him to pay for the accommodation he wanted. I see nothing unreasonable in a man who has an income of £1 000 a year, and who may know that he can if he likes live on £750, preferring to pay £72 to a money-lender for the money which is to relieve him from a temporary embarrassment rather than tell his banker or his solicitor or any friend that he is in temporary embarrassment; a man cannot borrow otherwise than from a money-lender except from or with the assistance of people who know him. I do not, of course, know the exact nature of the debts which this defendant desired to pay off. He was not asked, and did not tell me. Even if the debts were only incurred by household expenses beyond his income, or by buying to an extent beyond his income pictures or bronzes, which he seems to collect, he might not desire to disclose that extravagance to his friends; but of course, if it happened that the liabilities were incurred in some other way, such, for instance, as in any form of gambling, of which he might be heartily ashamed, he would be even less likely to wish to disclose it, and be more willing to pay high interest to a money-lender. Why should I say that he was unreasonable in what he did, when he, an intelligent man, must know his affairs better than I do?

I now proceed to deal with the cases on this Act. In In re A Debtor the actual decision, as I have already pointed out, was merely that "harsh and unconscionable" was not limited to such cases as a court of equity before the Act would have held to be harsh and unconscionable. The Master of the Rolls, however, and Cozens-Hardy, L.J., each say that under this section the interest charged might be so excessive as of itself to render the bargain harsh and unconscionable. This is repeated and emphasised by Cozens-Hardy, L.J. in Wells v. Allott, 53 W. R. 176, [1904] 2 K. B. 842, a case in which the actual decision merely was that the fact of interest being high, and therefore primâ facie excessive, was sufficient ground for giving a defendant leave to defend under order 14. I hardly think the head-note of the last-mentioned case in the Law Reports is correct, as I do not find in the report that the Lords Justices committed themselves to the view that the question at the trial would be as stated in the head-note, "whether the interest was so excessive as to render the transaction harsh and unconscionable." It may be observed that these expressions of opinion as to the possible consequences of "so excessive" interest are at present dicta only. Further, they are dicta in cases where the question was whether there should be further investigation, and not where the facts were ascertained and the question was what decision should be given on them. No judge, at any rate, in the High Court has yet held in any reported case that any particular rate of interest proved before him, say, even 500 per cent. or anything of the kind, is "so excessive" as to be in itself harsh and unconscionable. When, if ever, any judge does so, we shall have to read into the Act that which, as it seems to me, the Legislature intentionally avoided putting there—viz., a maximum rate of interest such as was enacted by the old usury laws. I cannot help thinking that it is owing to a complete misunderstanding of these dicta that an idea seems to prevail in some quarters that if only it is shown that a high rate of interest has been charged by a money-lender a judge has complete power at his discretion to make a new contract for the parties. I am sure that those two learned Lords Justices meant nothing of that kind. They may have meant that a very high rate of interest might raise a presumption that that rate had been extorted by conduct harsh and unconscionable, or they may have meant that the same circumstances which showed that the rate was excessive might and would show that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable. At the end of Cozens-Hardy, L.J.'s, judgment in In re A Debtor, at p. 711, [1903] 1 K. B., he expressly says that in considering whether the interest is excessive the court must have regard to all the circumstances of the case, which is the proposition upon which I think the whole matter turns. In Saunders v. Newbolt, 53 W. R. 162, [1905] 1 Ch. 260, the borrower was found by Kekewich, J., to have had his business capacity in fact impaired by habits of intemperance, although the judge thought that this had not gone to such an extent as to be apparent, so that the money-lenders were justified in dealing with him as a person of capacity. Under those circumstances the judge naturally did not consider that the fact that a man so incapacitated had agreed to pay the interest was a material circumstance to be considered on the question whether the interest was excessive under the circumstances. Nor should I consider it material in such a case; but here I am satisfied that the defendant is a man of good business ability. The grounds on which Kekewich, J., in that case held, and the Court of Appeal affirmed, that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable do not appear to apply to the present case, though no doubt the judgments support the argument of the learned counsel for the defendant in this case that the risk is very material to be considered. Then there is a case of Ponclone v. Higgins, 21 Times L. R. 11, also before the Court of Appeal. There Vaughan Williams, L.J., says as to the Money-lenders Act: "The intention of the Legislature was to deal with cases of persons in financial distress coming to money-lenders in order to get out of their financial distress, which was often urgent and pressing, and not to deal with the case of persons who were in a position to make their own bargain on terms of equality with the money-lender." That seems to me a very important expression of opinion. The facts of that case were so different to those before me that it is unnecessary to go into them. Romer, L.J., says that in every case the judge should go into the circumstances under which the loan was made, and points out that in that case the position of the plaintiff (the money-lender) cast on him duties towards the defendant (the lady borrower), that the plaintiff knew the defendant was relying on him, and that the defendant was a "foolish" woman. Under those circumstances the case was, of course, a plain one. Cozens-Hardy, L.J., repeats his proposition that the interest might be deemed so extravagantly excessive as alone to satisfy the court that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, on which I have already commented. He says also that all the circumstances must be considered, and he enumerates various circumstances which he thinks have to be considered, and he does not amongst them mention that one which seems to me so very material when it is present—viz., the free and voluntary agreement of a competent and intelligent borrower to pay the interest asked; but then that point did not arise on the facts before him, nor, indeed, does it very often arise. Then there is a recent case before Joyce, J.: Part v. Bond, reported 93 L. T. 49. In that case an advance at a high rate had been made, secured by a second mortgage on some property of the borrower, Joyce, J., says: "The Act gives no indication what rate of interest is to be deemed excessive under it, nor what transactions are to be deemed harsh and unconscionable," and after commenting on the word harsh, says: "With regard to the rate of interest, I think that the rate of interest is excessive if it be extraordinary, such as much higher than 10 per cent., or even less on a reasonably safe security, and if an excessive rate of interest be obtained merely through the folly or weakness of the borrower or his urgent necessity, real or imaginary, with knowledge on the part of the lender such as he must possess, then in my opinion the transaction is harsh and unconscionable." Now with this statement as to what is harsh and unconscionable I entirely agree; but there is a doubt as to what the learned judge meant to say as to the interest. I think he meant the words "on a reasonably safe security" to apply to the words "much higher than 10 per cent.," as well as to the words, "or even less." That is to say, that he meant if there was a reasonably safe security 10 per cent. or even less would be excessive. In the case before him there was security. There is, perhaps, something like a market rate for loans on security, but I do not see how there can be any rate, ordinary or extraordinary, for loans on a promissory note without security, and I hardly think the judge would have referred to 10 per cent. in reference to such loans. One of the difficulties of dealing with the question of interest on the footing of what is ordinary or extraordinary is that the efforts of the Legislature to assist borrowers undoubtedly have the effect of raising the normal rate of interest. It is a notorious fact that the Bill of Sale Act, 1882, making void bills of sale not according to a form had the effect as soon as a few decisions had been given on it of raising the normal rate of interest on money-lenders' bills of sale from 25 per cent. or 30 per cent. which had been about the highest before, to 60 per cent., which became the regular rate. This was pointed out by Cave, J., and may easily be verified by a reference to the reported cases on bills of sale. Practically, I think any test as to interest being ordinary or extraordinary is, for the purpose of the Money-lenders Act, out of the question, except perhaps in cases of loans on security. There can be no standard rate on personal loans, and where the parties are reasonably on terms of equality a judge cannot, I think, do better than adopt what they themselves have agreed on, although, of course, when that is not the case he has to adjudge what is reasonable as best he can under all the circumstances. I next come to a decision of my own, Levene v. Greenwood, reported in 20 Times L. R. 389, which has been followed in Ireland by the Lord Chief Justice in a case of Wells v. Joyce, [1905] 2 Ir. Rep. 134. I there held that a default clause understood by the lender but not understood by the borrower made the transaction harsh and unconscionable. To that I quite adhere. There may be some difficulty about the word harsh, but unconscionable seems to me to quite hit that case. Amongst the very things that the Act does mean to hit, and I think does effectually hit, are the money-lending traps for the unwary. I should not hold 60 per cent. per annum to be of itself necessarily excessive or harsh and unconscionable, though of course the circumstances might easily make it so, nor should I hold interest of 1s. in the pound per month (which of course is 60 per cent. per annum) to be necessarily so either; but if I found, as would most likely be the case, that the interest was put into the shape of 1s. in the pound per month in order to disguise it, and that in fact the borrower had not appreciated it, I should then hold that the interest was both excessive and harsh and unconscionable. In the present case there was a default clause, but I think the defendant quite understood and appreciated it. He was clearly confident in his ability to pay and that he would not make default, and when this clause was under discussion what he said was in substance that he was more likely to want to pay before it was due than to get into arrear, and wanted to know what reduction would be made in that case. This case does not seem to me to be at all the same as Levene v. Greenwood. I would also point out that the Money-lenders Act does not, as the Bill of Sale Act, 1882, did, require that the interest should be rateable interest. When a loan is to be for an indefinite time, of course the rate of interest is all-important, but where the loan is for a definite period, repayable by instalments or otherwise, I do not think the borrower generally cares very much what the rate of interest on the amount from time to time outstanding, as his instalments are paid, works out at. What he does want to know is how much he is to pay for getting the accommodation which he asks, and when a person of intelligence and business habits ascertains and understands that, I am not sure that it is very material whether he understands the real rate per annum of the interest or not. Assuming, however, that he is willing to pay the sum asked of him for the loan for a year, he probably will not be willing to pay that sum for the loan for a month only, and consequently a default clause not understood is in my opinion a trap.

I have now gone through all the cases, and the conclusion at which I arrive is that the judge is entitled to consider amongst "all the circumstances of the case" the fact that the borrower thoroughly understood the transaction, and, without any misrepresentation or any pressure other than the mere request to pay so much interest, voluntarily agreed to pay it, and I myself think that when the judge finds those to be the facts he ought to find that the interest which the man so agrees to pay is reasonable, and therefore not excessive within the meaning of the Act, and I do so find. I think I ought to add that this view of the Act in no way interferes with its operation in all the cases to which it was, as Vaughan Williams, L.J., pointed out, really meant to apply. Whenever the borrower is in such a state that his agreement cannot be taken as a test of what is reasonable—when he is ignorant, when advantage is taken of him, or when his necessities are such that he practically has no free will—there is no difficulty in applying the Act, and judges are not likely to hesitate to apply it. I ought further to say that if in this case I found that the defendant had from the first intended not to pay the interest contracted for, but meant to lay a trap for the money-lender and take his money, and then, when he had repaid by instalments the amount of actual money received, to set up the Money-lenders Act and claim to be relieved from payment of the interest contracted for, I should hold that that conduct also would be a circumstance which I ought to take into consideration, and that I ought to hold in that case that it was most reasonable that he should pay what he contracted to pay. He was, to use Vaughan Williams, L.J.'s, expression, in a position to bargain on terms of equality with the money-lender. The very able argument of the defendant's counsel, Mr. Napier, was based mainly on the absence of risk by reason of the defendant's ability to pay. If it were the case, which I am afraid often happens, of a borrower yielding to pressure put upon him by a money-lender taking advantage of his necessities, I should not say that the mere fact of his knowing of the Money-lenders Act and intending to try and get the benefit of it to relieve him of some part of what he had under pressure agreed to would disentitle him to that relief; but for a man in the position this defendant was to take the loan on the plaintiff's terms, apply the money for the purpose for which he wanted it, and then turn round and say that he would not pay the agreed price of the accommodation because it was excessive, is a very different case, and I should have no hesitation in saying that as against him it was not excessive. I have already said that I was not prepared to find that this was the true explanation of this defendant's conduct, but rather assume that he is, as he appeared to be, a respectable man who would not so act. I have based my judgment in this case on the ground that the interest must in the special circumstances of this case be adjudged to be reasonable, and therefore not excessive, but I must add that I am quite unable to see how on the facts the transaction can possibly be said to be harsh and unconscionable. Whatever may come within the true meaning of those words as used in the Act, they certainly do refer in some way to the conduct of the money-lender. Here all he did was to name his price for a loan without security to a man whom he did not know, depending only on his personal assurance that he had means to repay, with such corroboration as seeing the style in which he lived and the furniture and pictures which he claimed to be his, afforded. That price the borrower, without being in any really pressing necessity, immediately agreed to give without any bargaining or remonstrance, merely asking one question and getting a satisfactory answer. Even if the price asked was higher than would be expected to be agreed to between two parties bargaining on equal terms, why is the mere proposal of the terms harsh and unconscionable? I fail to see that it is. I therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs for the £62 10s. I do not give any interest, as the last instalment is only just due, but I do give High Court costs. If the defendant desires a stay he can have it on paying the money into court.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, White & Co.

Solicitor for the defendant, W. S. Crookes.

Lunacy.

(Collins, M.R., and Vaughan Williams, Romer, Stirling, Cozens-Hardy, and Moulton, L.JJ.) April 10.

In re S. S. B. (a.)

Lunatic—Lunatic not so found—Tenant for life of settled land—Person appointed to exercise powers of committee—Power of sale—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 7—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 3, 53, 62—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), ss. 116, 120, 128.

The court has no power to authorize the person who has been appointed by the judge in lunacy, under section 116, sub-section 2, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to exercise, as regards the estate of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, such of the powers of the Act as are made exercisable by the committee of the estate of a person of unsound mind so found by inquisition, to sell land, of which the person of unsound mind is tenant for life, either under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, or under the Settled Land Act, 1882.

In re Baggs, [1894] 2 Ch. 416n, approved and followed.

Appeal from an order of Master Ambrose, K.C., one of the masters in lunacy in chambers.

On the 25th of June, 1901, an order was made under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, which, after reciting that it had been established to the satisfaction of the master that S. S. B., though not lawfully detained as a lunatic nor so found by inquisition, was through mental infirmity arising from age incapable of managing his affairs, ordered that his wife and nephew should be and they were thereby authorized to exercise as regards the estate of S. S. B. the powers of a committee of the estate as in the case of a person of unsound mind so found by inquisition. These two persons are hereinafter called the "quasi-committee" or "receivers."

S. S. B. was tenant for life of certain land which was settled by the will of his grandfather in 1840. The Great Northern Railway Co., under the powers of a special Act which incorporated the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, gave notice to treat for a part of the land of which S. S. B. was tenant for life. The amount of compensation was duly assessed, and the question arose whether the quasi-committee could make a title to and sell the land. The quasi-committee accordingly applied to the master in lunacy for an order that they might be at liberty in the name and on behalf of S. S. B.—(1) to exercise with respect to the land comprised in the notice to treat the power of sale conferred on a tenant for life by section 7 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845; and (2) with that view to nominate in his name and on his behalf an able practical surveyor pursuant to section 9 of the Act; or (3) that they (as the parties for the time being entitled to the receipt of rents and profits of the lands in question) might be at liberty in their own names to exercise the power of sale conferred by section 7, and to nominate an able practical surveyor.

The master held that he had no jurisdiction to make the order.

The quasi-committee appealed.

A. Adams, for the appellants.

The arguments and the relevant statutory enactments are fully dealt with in the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

(a.) Reported by W F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

April 10.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: The question in this case is whether, where a tenant for life of settled lands is a lunatic not so found by inquisition, the court can authorize the quasi-committee to carry out a sale of the settled lands under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. I will consider the case, first, apart from section 7 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the Lunacy Act, 1890. The method of legislation adopted as to the execution of powers vested in persons of unsound mind but not found by inquisition to be lunatics has had the effect of raising a number of puzzles for the decision of the courts which have had to deal with this branch of the law. The result is that legislation sufficiently difficult in itself of interpretation has become still more difficult by reason of the attempts from time to time made by the courts to solve the questions presented to them. By the Settled Land Act, 1882, powers were conferred on tenants for life as defined by that statute to sell (section 3) and to lease (section 6) the settled land. In the case of persons of unsound mind, however, no provision was made for the exercise of these powers except where the lunatic had been so found by inquisition, in which case these powers might be exercised by the committee of his estate under order of the court having jurisdiction in lunacy (section 62). The result, therefore, up to this point was that the Settled Land Act, 1882, provided for the case of lunatics so found by inquisition, but made no provision for persons not so found. The next step is the Lunacy Act, 1890—"An Act to consolidate certain of the enactments respecting lunatics." This Act, being, as its heading imports, a consolidating Act, repeals a vast number of prior enactments and forms a code in itself. The method by which it deals with the exercise of powers vested in lunatics not so found by inquisition is peculiar, and has been the source of much of the confusion which has crept into the decisions. Instead of enacting what powers might be exercised on behalf of persons of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, which would seem to have been the simpler course, it provides by section 116 that the management and administration provisions of the Act are to apply to persons in a number of different categories, including lunatics so found and others not so found. It then provides (sub-section 2) that, in case of any of the above-mentioned persons not being lunatics so found by inquisition, "such of the powers of this Act as are made exerciseable by the committee of the estate under order of the judge" shall be exercised by such person as the judge may direct. The judge's powers, therefore, to authorize the quasi-committee to act for a lunatic not so found by inquisition are measured by the powers conferred upon him by the Act itself to authorize action by the committee in the case of lunatics so found by inquisition. This compels us to ascertain what the Act empowers the judge to do in the case of a lunatic so found. This is dealt with, so far as is material to this case, in sections 120 and 128. Section 120 empowers the judge to authorize the committee to do a number of acts described under letters (a) to (l). These are all acts on behalf of the lunatic in his own right. Section 128 deals with powers vested in the lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian, and enables the judge to authorize the committee to exercise them. In order to invoke the judge's jurisdiction, therefore, to order the quasi-committee to exercise the power of sale as desired in this case, it must be brought under one of the heads comprised in sections 120 and 128. Headings (a) and (l) in section 120 are the only ones that seems to relate to this case, but (a) is inapplicable as it relates only to the property belonging to the lunatic, which is not true of the fee simple here, and (l) is inapplicable as the power sought to be exercised cannot be said to be vested in the lunatic for his own benefit. Neither does section 128 cover the case, for unless In re Baggs, [1898] 2 Ch. 416*n*., was wrongly decided, the power in question is not vested in the lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian. The result is that, though the Settled Land Act confers a power of sale on the tenant for life, it cannot in this case be exercised—first, because the Act does not provide for the exercise of the power on behalf of a lunatic not so found by inquisition; secondly, because that gap has not been cured by anything in the later Act. It is not in the words of section 116, sub-section 2, one "of the powers of this Act made exercisable by the committee of the estate." This, in fact, is the decision in In re Baggs. There is, however, another decision of the same court in In re X., 42 W. R. 657, [1894] 2 Ch. 415, which seems difficult to reconcile with that decision. In the latter case a person of unsound mind, for whom a quasi-committee had been appointed, was tenant for life of lands under a settlement containing a power enabling each successive tenant for life in possession to sell the settled lands, and it was held that the court had power under sections 120 and 128 of the Act of 1890 to authorize the sale. The only differing fact in the two cases is that in In re Baggs the power of sale was conferred by the Settled Land Act, in In re X. by the settlement itself. If the latter is right it involves two propositions—(1) that the sections relied on do enable the court to exercise a power of sale vested in a tenant for life, notwithstanding the reasons given in In re Baggs for the contrary conclusion; (2) that the reason why provisions thus held capable of applying to the case of a sale of the settled lands by the committee of a lunatic tenant for life were inapplicable in In re Baggs must be found, not in the nature of the provisions themselves, for they, of course, were identical in both cases, but in the fact that in In re Baggs the power itself was derived under the Settled Land Act, and not under settlement. Or, in other words, that the Settled Land Act inhibited the exercise by the judge of the power conferred upon him by sections 120 and 128 of the Act of 1890. This inhibition, if it exists, must be found in the words of section 62 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, construed on the principle expressio unius exclusio alterius, and the permission there given to the committee of a lunatic so found by inquisition must be construed as a statutory expression of intention that it shall be exercised by no other person. Read in the light of such a prohibition, sections 120 and 128 of the Act of 1890 would be limited to cases where the power of sale was derived otherwise than under the Settled Land Act. The later case of In re X. purported not to interfere with In re Baggs, and it seems to me that they cannot be reconciled except upon the line of reasoning above stated, although I confess it involves a somewhat constrained construction of section 62. There is, however, another case which must be considered before it can be decided that this method of reconciling the authorities can be adopted. That is the case of In re Salt, 44 W. R. 146, [1896] 1 Ch. 117. It was there held that the power of leasing conferred on a tenant for life by section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, could by an order of the court under clause (h) of section 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, be exercised by the quasi-committee of a lunatic not so found by inquisition. This decision, if right, negatives the existence of any prohibition in section 62 of the Settled Land Act debarring any person other than the committee of a lunatic so found by inquisition from exercising the power of leasing conferred by that statute. As section 62 applies equally to all powers conferred by the Settled Land Act, no distinction can be made so far as that Act is concerned between the power to sell and the power to lease. If, therefore, the only hypothesis on which, as it seems to me, In re Baggs and In re X. can be reconciled be adopted, In re Salt cannot stand. On the other hand, if we are content to reject In re X., then there is no inconsistency between In re Baggs and In re Salt, and both may stand. But on no hypothesis, as it seems to me, can all three stand together. Lindley, L.J., was a party to the decisions both in In re Baggs and in In re X., and delivered the leading judgment in both cases, and there is a difficulty, therefore, in concluding that they are irreconcilable. On the other hand, A. L. Smith, L.J., was a party to the decisions both in In re Baggs and in In re Salt. On the whole I think that the difficulty in adopting the hypothesis which alone, as it seems to me, can reconcile In re Baggs and In re X. turns the scale, and that the former must be taken as deciding that the power could not be exercised in that case, not because it was derived under the Settled Land Act and was thereby differentiated from a power drawn from any other source, but because nothing could be found in sections 120 and 128 of the Act of 1890 letting in the power of the judge to authorize its exercise. If this is so, In re Baggs and In re Salt are harmonized, but there is an irreconcilable difference between them both and In re X., and we must choose between them. There is some ground for thinking that the omission to empower the quasi-committee to exercise the power of sale conferred on tenants for life by the Settled Land Act was deliberate, as Moulton, L.J., points out in his judgment, which I have seen, and I am of opinion, on the whole, that the wiser course will be to follow In re Baggs. The position of the quasi-committee is certainly no better in relation to a sale under the Lands Clauses Act than under the Settled Land Act: see In re Tugwell, 33 W. R. 132, 27 Ch. D. 309. It follows that the court cannot authorize the quasi-committee to carry out the sale.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: In my judgment the court in In re Baggs decided, first, that neither under section 62 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, nor under any other part of that Act, was any power given except to the committee of a lunatic so found to exercise the power of sale vested by the Settled Land Act, 1882, in a tenant for life, and therefore did not give this power in the case of a tenant for life coming to be a lunatic not so found, but for the protection of whose property an order had been made under the Lunacy Act, 1890, or whose person was lawfully detained as a lunatic not so found. The fact that this section 62, which was an enabling and not a prohibitive section, only gave such limited powers clearly did not prevent the Legislature by a Lunacy Act of later date from extending the right to exercise this power of sale of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, to persons other than the committee of a lunatic so found by inquisition. The court, therefore, in In re Baggs looked to see if the Lunacy Act, 1890, gave power in sections 120 and 128 or otherwise, in the case of lunatics not so found, to the court to order that some person other than such committee might exercise the power of sale vested in the lunatic tenant for life not so found, and came to the conclusion that the Act of 1890 gave no such power, and I think that the conclusion in In re Baggs was absolutely right. In the case of In re X., the power of sale in the tenant for life was not derived from the Settled Land Act, 1882, but from a deed of settlement, and the court, without differing in any way from the judgment in In re Baggs, was able to make the necessary order for sale. Lastly, in the case of In re Salt, the power sought to be exercised being simply a leasing power, the court found that in respect of such power section 120 (h) of the Act of 1890 gave power to the court to order someone to exercise this leasing power for the lunatic, and in respect of this power of leasing extended the limitation arising on the construction of section 62 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. But in the case of the power of sale vested by the Settled Land Act, 1882, in a lunatic tenant for life, section 120 did not give this power to the court to order someone to exercise the power of sale. I find no such inconsistency in these cases as would prevent them standing together.

ROMER, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment which has been delivered by the Master of the Rolls, and I concur in it.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: In this case the question is whether the judge in lunacy has power to authorize the receiver of the estate of a person of unsound mind not so found appointed under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to exercise the power of sale of that estate of which that person is tenant for life, when it is conferred by section 7 of the Land Clauses Act, 1845. Section 7 authorizes (amongst other persons) tenants in tail or for life, married women seised in their own right, guardians, and committees of lunatics and idiots, to sell, convey, and release; and provides that the power so to sell, convey, and release may be exercised by all such parties, not only on behalf of themselves and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and successors, but also for and on behalf of every person entitled in reversion, remainder, or expectancy after them, and as to such married women, whether of full age or not, as if they were sole and of full age, and as to such guardians on behalf of their wards, and as to such committees on behalf of the lunatics and idiots of whom they are committees respectively, and that to the same extent as such wives, wards, lunatics, and idiots respectively could have exercised the same power if they had respectively been under no disability. The effect of this enactment appears to me to be to confer the power of sale on tenants in tail and tenants for life when not under disability; but as regards persons under disability, whether of infancy or unsoundness of mind, to confer the power on the guardian of the infant or the committee of the person of unsound mind. The power so conferred on guardians and committees would be available when the infant or person of unsound mind is entitled, not merely as tenant in tail or for life, but in fee; in which last case, of course, the owner, if not under disability, does not require and has not conferred upon him any power under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Now section 116, sub-section 2, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, confers on the judge in lunacy power to order that such of the powers of that Act as are made exercisable by the committee of the estate under order of the judge shall be exercised by the receiver. Section 120 empowers the judge by order to authorize the committee of the estate of the lunatic to do (amongst others) the following things: "(l) Exercise any power or give any consent required for the exercise of any power where the power is vested in the lunatic for his own benefit or the power of consent is in the nature of a beneficial interest in the lunatic." Section 128 confers a similar power on the judge "where a power is vested in a lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian or the consent of a lunatic to the exercise of a power is necessary in the like character or as a check upon the undue exercise of the power." If the application before the court is to be granted, the jurisdiction must be derived from one or other or both of these sections. In each section the power spoken of is one vested in the lunatic, and neither section confers on the court any authority with respect to powers which by statute are vested not in the lunatic but in his committee. In my judgment, therefore, the judge in lunacy has no jurisdiction under section 116, sub-section 2, to order that a power which would by statute be vested in the committee of a lunatic (if there were a committee) shall be exercised by the receiver of the estate of a person of unsound mind. For the reasons already given I think that the power conferred by section 7 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is not conferred on a person under disability; and in the absence of authority I should be of opinion that there is no jurisdiction to make the order asked for. The cases of In re Baggs, In re X., and In re Salt were referred to. None of them governs the precise case before us, and the reasons given for the decisions do not seem to be altogether in accordance; but it is plain that the very eminent judges who decided the two later cases did not intend to depart from or overrule the first. In these circumstances I cannot say that those cases afford very clear guidance for the decision of the present case; but In re Baggs, although decided with reference to another statute, the Settled Land Act, 1882, is (unless overruled) an authority against the applicant; and I am not prepared to overrule it. I think, therefore, that the application must be refused.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: The question on this appeal is whether it is competent to authorize the receiver or quasi-committee of a person of unsound mind not so found, who is tenant for life of a settled estate, to sell a portion of the property to a railway company under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. This depends upon the true construction of section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, taken together with section 120 and section 128. There is no decision under the Lands Clauses Act, but there is a decision, In re Baggs, that the similar power conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1882, cannot be exercised by a quasi-committee, and if that decision is sound I think it must govern the present case. The Settled Land Act, 1882, gives a power of sale (section 3) and a power of leasing (section 6) to every tenant for life. See the definition of tenant for life, section 2 (5). If the tenant for life is an infant, the powers of a tenant for life may be exercised on his behalf in the manner prescribed in section 60. If the tenant for life is a lunatic so found by inquisition, the committee may in his name and on his behalf exercise the powers of a tenant for life under the Act (section 62). There is no provision in the Act dealing with the case of a tenant for life who is of unsound mind but not so found, and no provision is made for the exercise of the powers which are conferred upon him. And in 1882 there was no machinery available for the purpose. There are no negative words in section 62. That section did not create the powers. It only prescribed in a particular case how the powers of a tenant for life who is a lunatic so found are to be exercised. Then we come to the Lunacy Act, 1890. Section 116 enables the judge in lunacy to order "such of the powers of this Act as are made exercisable by the committee of the estate under order of the judge" to be exercised by the receiver. Section 120 is the material section. The judge may by order authorize and direct the committee of the estate of a lunatic to do all or any of the following things: Clause (a) does not help. It deals only with a sale of property belonging to the lunatic, and not with a sale of property of which he is only tenant for life. Clause (h), the judge may authorize the committee to "execute any power of leasing vested in a lunatic having a limited estate only in the property over which the power extends." This exactly meets the case of section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; and In re Salt rightly decided that by the combined operation of section 116 and section 120 (h) the receiver might be authorized to execute a power of leasing, whether a statutory power or a power conferred by the express terms of the deed or will creating the settlement. But clause (h) is limited to a power of leasing, and it seems to furnish a powerful argument against the contention that section 120 applies to all powers under the Settled Land Act. It is a plain case for the application of the expressio unius doctrine. Clause (l) cannot apply, for a power of sale given to a tenant for life is not a power "vested in the lunatic for his own benefit." See the observations of Rigby, L.J., in In re Salt, [1896] 1 Ch., at p. 121. Those words are addressed to common and well-known powers, such as the general power frequently given to or reserved by a tenant in tail in a resettlement which enables him to override all the limitations of the resettlement. I am therefore unable to find anything in section 120 which enables a committee of a lunatic tenant for life to exercise the power of sale conferred on the lunatic by the Settled Land Act, 1882. It is true that under section 62 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, he can sell, but that is not one of "the powers of this Act"—that is, the Lunacy Act, 1890, made exercisable by the committee. But then it is said that a power of sale given to a tenant for life is a power of sale vested in a lunatic "in the character of trustee," and that section 128 applies. I cannot accept this view. It is expressly repudiated by Lindley, L.J., in In re Baggs, and by Rigby, L.J., in In re Salt. The result is that in my opinion the decision in In re Baggs was sound, and ought to be followed. A difficulty has, however, arisen by reason of the subsequent decision in In re X. In that case it was suggested that the decision in In re Baggs depended upon the language used in section 62 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; but, with the utmost respect, I am unable to follow this suggestion. It is inconsistent with the whole judgment of Lindley, L.J. But the decision of the court in In re X. cannot, in my opinion, be reconciled with the decision in In re Baggs. I can see no ground for holding that a power of sale conferred upon a lunatic tenant for life by the settlement differs in any material respect from a similar power of sale conferred upon him by the Settled Land Act. In neither case is it one of "the powers of this Act." There are many powers which cannot fairly be brought within the language of either section 120 or section 128; e.g., a power to jointure, a power to raise portions, and the various powers other than leasing powers conferred by the Settled Land Act upon limited owners. This distinction was recognized by the Court of Appeal in In re Earl of Sefton, 47 W. R. 49, [1898] 2 Ch. 378. It is, therefore, necessary to choose which of these two authorities ought to be accepted, and I feel bound to say that I think In re Baggs is the better decision and the one that ought to be followed. I am aware that the more convenient view would be to support In re X. But our function is limited to interpretation, as distinct from legislation. It will be for Parliament to enact, if it thinks fit, that every power, whether conferred by statute or not, which might be exercised by a lunatic if of sound mind may be exercised, with the authority of the judge in lunacy, by a committee, and also by a quasi-committee. I can find nothing in the present statutes to this effect. The result is that, in my opinion, the master was right in holding that there is no jurisdiction to authorize the quasi-committee to sell under the Lands Clauses Act.

MOULTON, L.J., read the following judgment: The point raised in this case is very simply stated. We have to decide whether the receiver or, as he may be termed, the quasi-committee of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition can sell settled lands, of which the lunatic is the life tenant, to a railway company which has compulsory powers of purchase of such lands under the provisions of its special Act, which incorporates, in the ordinary way, the necessary provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, relating to such purchases.

A life tenant, if under no disability by reason of being of unsound mind, has a power of selling the settled land by virtue of two statutes—viz., (1) he has a general power of selling such lands under section 3 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; and (2) he has the special power of selling such lands to parties authorized to take them by a special Act which incorporates the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to the purchase of land by agreement. This special power of sale is given by section 7 of that Act.

In the case of a lunatic so found by inquisition no difficulty arises. Section 62 of the Settled Land Act enables his committee to exercise the power on his behalf, and section 7 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, appears to me, on its true construction, to give the power of sale directly to the committee without even going through the process of conferring it in the first place on the lunatic and then empowering the committee to exercise it on his behalf. But both these statutes are of earlier date than the Lunacy Act, 1890, and thus make no reference to the quasi-committees of persons of unsound mind not so found by inquisition. It is, therefore, to the provisions of this last mentioned Act that we must look for any authorization for the exercise of either of these powers of sale by quasi-committees.

These quasi-committees are appointed under the provisions of section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, which, after enumerating various classes of persons of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, provides with regard to them by sub-section 2 that "such of the powers of this Act as are made exercisable by the committee of the estate under order of the judge shall be exercised by such person in such manner and with or without security as the judge may direct." We have therefore to ascertain what powers of that Act are made exercisable by the committee of the estate of a lunatic. These powers are set out in sections 120 and 128. The latter concerns only those cases in which a power is vested in a lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian, or in which his consent is necessary in a like character. The section which deals directly with dealings with property that belongs to him or in which he is interested is section 120. The case of sale is dealt with first. Sub-section (a) empowers the committee to "sell any property belonging to the lunatic." These words are obviously too narrow to include land of which he is only the life tenant. Is the omission intentional and effective, or can we supply the missing powers from some of the other sub-sections? That the omission was intentional can hardly, I think, be doubted. The power of sale by a life tenant under section 3 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, was so well known and so constantly put into operation that it is impossible that the omission of words which would include it (such, for instance, as "or in which he is interested," or "of which he has the power of sale") could be per incuriam. Moreover, an examination of the subsequent sub-sections of section 120 shows that the draftsman had section 3 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, before him, and that he expressly gave to the committee other of the powers given to the tenant for life by that section. Thus sub-section (b) of section 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, is evidently taken from sub-sections (iii.) and (iv.) of section 3 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the language being in its essentials identical. Here we find a power given to the committee extending not only to property "belonging to the lunatic," but also to property "in which he is interested." Sub-section (ii.) of section 3 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, however, which, like sub-section (i.) relates to the power of sale (in this instance mainly to copyholds), has no corresponding sub-section in section 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Further, we find that by sub-section (h) of the last-mentioned section the whole of the powers of leasing property in which the lunatic has only a limited estate (i.e., powers such as are given by Part IV. of the Settled Land Act, 1882) are transferred to the committee. There can hardly be a doubt, therefore, that in sub-section (a) the Legislature intentionally restricted the empowerment of the committee in the case of sale to property belonging to the lunatic to the exclusion of property in which he had only an interest which gave him a power of sale.

The next question is whether we can find in any of the other sub-sections something which supplies this omission. It is suggested that the language of sub-section (l) is broad enough to do this. If that sub-section stood alone there would be much to say for this view. But we have to construe section 120 as a whole, and it is difficult to accept a construction which would make sub-section (h) absolutely and even formally superfluous, and would render inexplicable the insertion of the important words "or in which he is interested" in sub-section (b), which place it in such marked contrast to sub-section (a). Even without the authority of any decisions of this court to guide me I should have come to the conclusion that in its present collocation sub-section (l) must receive a more limited construction, and that the powers therein referred to are of a different type to the powers over settled land given to the tenant for life by the Settled Land Act, 1882.

The other suggestion is that, so far as the property in the settled land is not in the lunatic, he is in the position of a trustee for those interested, and that therefore the committee has power to sell their interest under section 128 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. This contention is sought to be supported by section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, which provides that in relation to the exercise by himself of any of the powers of that Act the tenant for life shall be deemed to be in the position of a trustee for the parties interested. The power of sale is, therefore, sought to be divided into two parts—viz., (1) the power of selling his life interest which is justified by section 120 (a), and (2) the power of sale of the remaining interests, which is sought to be justified by section 128. It seems to me most improbable that if the Legislature had intended to give to the committee this power of sale of property of which the lunatic is life tenant it would have done so in a way so roundabout and unnatural, or that it would have spoken of the power of sale of the settled land as a power "vested in a lunatic in the character of trustee." These ingenious attempts to supply what is, to my mind, so clearly an intentional omission do not, in my opinion, accord with the canons of sound construction of statutes, and even if I had no authority to guide me I should accept the interpretation that I consider the more natural one—viz., that those sections of the Lunacy Act, 1890, do not give the committee the power of selling settled land which is vested in the lunatic by the Settled Land Act, 1882.

But there is express authority on the point. The court in the case of In re Baggs had before it the precise question which is raised in the present case, so far as it relates to the powers given by the Settled Land Act, 1882. All the arguments pressed upon us were there urged, but the court unanimously came to the conclusion which, as I have said, appears to me to be the right one. That they did so is expressly recognized in the case of In re Salt, and Rigby, L.J., there states that he would have considered himself bound by and would have followed the decision of the court in In re Baggs had the point in that case been the same. I agree with him in thinking that this court would be so bound, so that the view which I hold to be correct as a matter of construction I also hold as having been decided to be the right view by a decision which is binding upon me.

The real difficulty in this case arises from the decision of the court in the case of In re X. There the court (two members of which were parties to the judgment in In re Baggs) had before them the case of a lunatic not so found by inquisition who was the life tenant under a settlement which gave to him as such life tenant the power to sell the settled land with the written consent of the trustees. They held that this differed from the case of In re Baggs, and that the Lunacy Act 1890, ss. 120 and 128, enabled the judge to permit the receiver to exercise the power of sale. I do not myself see the materiality of the distinction that the power of sale of the settled land was, in that case, vested in the lunatic by a settlement, whereas in In re Baggs it was vested in the lunatic by section 3 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and if that point were before us it would, in my opinion, require careful consideration before we could come to the conclusion that the distinction was material. But it is clear that the court thought it was so, and it was on this ground, and on this ground alone, that they decided the case. They showed no intention to dissent from the decision in In re Baggs, but rather to affirm it. This decision, therefore, does not justify us in departing from the clear and unmistakable principle laid down by the court in that case. I may say that I cannot believe that the court in deciding In re X. gave to section 62 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, a prohibitive force limiting the power to committees to the exclusion of quasi-committees on the principle of expressio unius, &c. This principle can only apply to matters as existing at the date when the expressio takes place, and at that date the office of quasi-committee did not exist.

So far I have dealt with the power of sale given by the Settled Land Act, 1882. The case of section 7 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is still clearer. Even if we assume that the power of sale is vested by that section in the lunatic, the restriction of the powers of sale under section 120 to the case of property belonging to the lunatic applies equally, and there is still less ground for arguing that the power or any part of it comes under section 128.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the law as it at present stands does not authorize making an order that a quasi-committee shall sell lands of which the lunatic is life tenant.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Parson, Lee, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 5, 6.

In re JACKSON AND HADEN'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Condition of sale—Right of rescission—Misdescription—Right of compensation.

An arbitrary power to rescind a contract of sale is not given by a condition that gives a right to rescind in the event of the purchaser insisting on an objection or requisition as to title, with which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply on the ground of expense. There must be a reasonable ground for the exercise of the power. So where a condition of sale provided that the sale shall not be annulled by reason of any error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars, but that they shall form the subject of compensation, the purchaser will be entitled to compensation should the particulars give a description of the land that would include the minerals and mines under it, the fact that the mines and minerals are excepted being well known to the vendor.

Bowman v. Hyland, (1878) 26 W. R. 877, 8 Ch. D. 588, explained.

Decision of Buckley, J. (53 W. R. 428, [1905] 1 Ch. 603), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Buckley, J.

The facts were as follows:

The vendor contracted to sell to the purchaser certain house property, and gave such a description of the property that the mines and minerals under it would be included.

One clause of the contract provided that if the purchaser should "insist on any objection or requisition as to title or evidence of title which the vendor shall be unable, or, on the ground of expense, shall decline to remove or comply with, then . . . the vendor shall be at liberty by notice . . . to rescind the contract."

By another clause it was provided that no error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars should "annul the sale, but should form the subject of compensation."

The abstract of title showed that the mines and minerals were reserved to the grantor in a conveyance made to the vendor's predecessor in title in the year 1854, and the fact of the reservation was well known in the district wherein the property lay, but was not known to the purchaser.

The purchaser made requisition for an abstract of title to the mines and minerals which was not given, but the vendor gave notice to rescind under the above clause.

The purchaser then took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, and Buckley, J., held that the vendor was not entitled to rescind and that the purchaser was entitled to compensation with regard to the mines and minerals (53 W. R. 428, [1905] 1 Ch. 603).

The vendor appealed.

Mark Romer, for the appellant, cited Heppenstall v. Hose, (1884) 33 W. R. 30, 51 L. T. 589; In re Ramuz and Edwards' Contract, (1893) 37 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 701; Mawson v. Fletcher, (1870) 18 W. R. 798, L. R. 6 Ch. 91; Ashburner v. Sewell, 40 W. R. 169, [1891] 3 Ch. 405; In re Deighton and Harris' Contract, 46 W. R. 341, [1898] 1 Ch. 458; Riddell v. Simpson, L. R. 2 Ch. 102.

Astbury, K.C., and Whitmore Richards, for the respondent, cited Greaves v. Wilson, (1858) 6 W. R. 482, 25 Beav. 290; Bowman v. Hyland, 8 Ch. D. 588; Nelthorpe v. Helgate, (1844) 1 Coll 203; Powell v. Powell, (1875) L. R. 19 Eq. 422.

COLLINS, M.R.—The appeal must fail. Buckley, J., based his judgment on Bowman v. Hyland, which decided that a condition like this is not applicable where the vendor has really no title at all. It does not appear to me that Bowman v. Hyland is quite in point, because in this case the vendor has title to the greater part of the subject-matter. The case stands on a broader ground. Notwithstanding that the purchaser has raised an objection to title, it is not an objection that the vendor can avail himself of under the clause providing for rescission. The word denoting unwillingness in this condition of sale gives no arbitrary power to the vendor to annul the contract. When a vendor rescinds on the ground of unwillingness he must show some reasonable ground for unwillingness, and he may show that if he complies with a requisition he will incur expenses that he did not contemplate, and to avoid which he reserved a power of rescission. The misdescription in these particulars of sale seems to me within the clause providing for compensation. The decision of Buckley, J., must be affirmed.

ROMER, L.J.—This appeal fails. The vendor knew that he had no title to the minerals, but described the property so as to include them. He thought the purchaser would not be misled. The rescission clause cannot apply in this case.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—The vendor in this case knew that the minerals were reserved and not his to sell; he described the property in terms that included the minerals and chanced the purchaser's knowledge of the facts as to them. It is unreasonable that he should avail himself of the rescission clause and assert that the purchaser is not entitled to compensation in respect of the minerals under the clause providing for compensation for misdescription. The appeal must fail.

Solicitors, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for Waldron, Brierley Hill; Bale, for Harwards & Co., Stourbridge.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Swinfen Eady, J. — March 2.

In re MOORE.
MOORE v. BIGG. (a.)

Will—Settlement—Power of sale—Property not originally comprised in the settlement—Trustees for purposes of Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 16 (i).

A testator gave to the trustees of his will a power of sale in respect of part of certain lands devised by him. He also bequeathed his personal residue on trust to sell and convert the same and invest the proceeds in land, which was to be subject to the aforesaid power of sale. No trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, had been expressly appointed. Upon the tenant for life contracting to sell the mansion-house and the land, as to which no power of sale had been given,

Held, that the land purchased with the proceeds of the residuary personalty was land comprised in the settlement within the meaning of section 16 (i) of the Settled Land Act, 1890, and that the trustees of the will were trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, of such mansion-house and land by virtue thereof.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Summons.

This summons was taken out under section 44 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, for the purpose of determining a question arising in connection with the will, dated the 16th of July, 1880, of F. J. Moore.

The plaintiff was the tenant for life and also a trustee of the will, and the defendants were the remaining two trustees of the will.

The question to be decided was whether the trustees of the will were also trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

By his will the testator devised certain lands to the trustees of his will upon trust for X. Y. for life, with remainder in trust for his eldest son for life, with remainders over in strict settlement.

The trustees were given a power of sale in respect of part of these lands, but not as to the mansion-house or certain land in the same parish and also in an adjoining parish.

The testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to his trustees upon trust to sell and invest the same, and invest the proceeds of such sale and conversion in land, which land was to be subject to the aforesaid power of sale.

No trustees of the settlement had ever been appointed for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

In 1885 the testator died.

Under the powers given to them by the will the trustees had purchased a considerable quantity of land with the proceeds of the personal estate; they also sold all the land devised in respect of which they had a power of sale.

In 1905 the tenant for life entered into a contract for the sale of the mansion-house and land not subject to the power of sale, but the objection arose that there were no trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, which resulted in the issue of the present summons.

T. A. Nash, for the plaintiff.—It is admitted that the trustees of the will are not trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, by virtue of the Act of 1882, but in this case section 16 (i) of the Act of 1890 applies. By that section the persons (if any) who are for the time being under the settlement trustees, with power of or upon trust for sale of any other land comprised in the settlement, and subject to the same limitations as the land to be sold, are declared to be trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Acts 1882-1890, where there are for the time being no trustees within the meaning and for the purposes of the Act of 1882. The trustees of the will in question come within that section of the Act of 1890.

C. L. Coote, for the defendants.—In order to come within the meaning of section 16 (i) of the Act of 1890, several requirements must be satisfied. Someone must be found who answers to the description of trustee for the time being. The trustees must be trustees of land, and the land must be originally comprised in the settlement, and subject to the same limitations. There is a distinction observable in the Act. Sometimes the expression "subject to the settlement" is found, and sometimes the expression "comprised in the settlement." The expression "comprised in" means "which is found in," or "originally comprised in."

H. B. Vaisey held a watching brief for the purchaser.

SWINFEN EADY, J. (after summarizing the provisions of the will).—The question to be decided is whether the trustees of the will are also trustees of the mansion-house and certain lands not subject to the power of sale, for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

I am of opinion that they are, inasmuch as I consider that they come within the meaning of section 16 (i) of the Act of 1890. It has been contended that section 16 (i) does not apply, and that the trustees are not trustees for the purposes of the Acts, because, although they hold land subject to the limitations of the settlement, it is not land originally comprised in the settlement. I cannot uphold this construction of section 16 (i), as in my opinion it is too narrow. The land purchased with the residuary personalty is comprised in the settlement as much as land originally comprised in it. I therefore answer the question in the affirmative.

Solicitors, Wood, Bigg, & Nash; Ernest Bevir, for A. W. Vaisey, Tring.

Chan. Div.
Warrington, J. } Feb. 7, 8.

LEWIS & SOLOME v. CHARING CROSS, EUSTON, AND HAMPSTEAD RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Metropolis—Building—Party structure—Interference—Notice—Railway company—Demolition of building for purposes of station—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), ss. 5 (31), 90 (1)—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), ss. 16, 45—Charing Cross, Euston, and Hampstead Railway Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. ccxiv.), ss. 5, 31.

A railway company in the metropolis acquired land for "extraordinary purposes" under section 45 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, and for the purposes of constructing a station proceeded to demolish the building standing thereon under the powers conferred upon them by their special Act, but without having given to the adjoining owner the notice required to be given by a "building owner" by section 90, sub-section 1, of the London Building Act, 1894. An action for an injunction having been brought by the adjoining owner to restrain interference with the party-wall,

Held, that the railway company were not exempted either by the terms of their special Act or by section 201, sub-section 8, of the London Building Act, 1894, from the provisions of section 90, sub-section 1, of the latter Act as to notice.

Held, also, that no substantial interference with the party structure had in fact taken place, and that therefore the railway company was not a "building owner" within the meaning of section 5, sub-section 31, of the London Building Act, 1894.

Trial of action.

This was an action by the lessees of No. 22, Cranbourn-street, in the City of Westminster, for an injunction to restrain the defendant company from continuing the demolition of No. 21, Cranbourn-street in such a way as to interfere with the party-wall between Nos. 21 and 22, and the question of law turned upon whether the defendant company were liable to give the notice required by the London Building Act, 1894, to the adjoining owner before commencing to pull down No. 21.

Under the provisions of the Charing Cross, Euston, and Hampstead Railway Act, 1893, the defendant company were authorized to construct a tube railway running up Charing Cross-road and crossing Cranbourn-street. At the corner of Charing Cross-road and Cranbourn-street the railway company were erecting a station, and for that purpose acquired No. 21, which was situated outside the line of deviation as delineated upon their deposited plan, by agreement for "extraordinary purposes" under section 45 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

(a.) Reported by E. WAVELL RIDGES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The railway company proceeded to demolish No. 21 without having previously given the statutory notice required by section 90 (1) of the London Building Act, 1894, to be given by a "building owner" to the "adjoining owner," the "adjoining owner" being in this case the plaintiffs, who were in possession of No. 22, Cranbourn-street under a lease from Lord Salisbury.

On the 13th of January, 1906, the writ in the action was issued by the plaintiffs claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant company from interfering with the party-wall, and damages for interference and trespass.

The action came on for trial on the 7th of February, and at the hearing it was agreed that the question of interference should be taken for granted until the legal point with regard to notice had been disposed of.

By section 5 of the Charing Cross, Euston, and Hampstead Railway Act it was provided, inter alia, that the railway company might make "all necessary and proper stations, platforms, approaches, passages, bridges, stairs, subways, tunnels, sidings, shafts, lifts, building apparatus . . . depôts, . . . works, and conveniences" connected with the railway.

By section 31 of the same Act the company were empowered to take by agreement "for the extraordinary purposes mentioned in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, any quantity of land not exceeding in the whole five acres," but nothing was to "exonerate the company from any action, indictment, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused or permitted by them upon any land" so taken. By the same section, "any buildings erected on any land acquired under the section (except such buildings or parts of buildings as might be used for the purposes of a station) were to be subject to the provisions of the Acts relating to buildings in the metropolis."

By section 45 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, it is provided that: "It shall be lawful for the company, in addition to the lands authorized to be compulsorily taken under the powers of this or the special Act, to contract with any party willing to sell the same for the purchase of any land adjoining or near the railway up to the prescribed amount, and for the 'extraordinary purposes' therein specified."

Section 16 of the same Act provides that: "Subject to the provisions and restrictions in this and the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, it shall be lawful for the company, for the purpose of constructing the railway or the accommodation works connected therewith hereinafter mentioned, to execute any of the following works. . . . They may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering or repairing, and using the railway."

By section 5 (31) of the London Building Act, 1894, "the expression 'building owner' means such one of the owners of adjoining land who is desirous of building, or such one of the owners of buildings . . . separated from one another by a party-wall or party structure as does or is desirous of doing a work affecting that party-wall or party structure."

By section 90 (1) of the same Act it is provided, inter alia, that a building owner shall not, except with the consent of the adjoining owners and occupiers, exercise any of his rights under the Act in relation to any party-wall or party structure without having two months previously served on the adjoining owner the party-wall or party structure notice required by the Act.

By section 201 (8) of the same Act the following buildings, inter alia are exempted from the operation of Parts VI. and VII. of the Act: "Any building or structure situate upon the railway or station premises, and used for the purposes of or in connection with the traffic of a railway company." And also: "The foundations and walls of buildings belonging to a railway company . . . immediately adjoining any railway or works of a railway company and upon land acquired under the powers of an Act of Parliament."

Rowden, K.C., Cunningham Glen, and P. B. Morle, for the plaintiffs.—The railway company are not exempted by their special Act from the provisions of the London Building Act, 1894, and should have given the party-wall or party structure notice required by section 90, sub-section 1. Even if they are in the position of a private individual purchasing by agreement, then Standard Bank of America v. Stokes, 26 W. R. 492, 9 Ch. D. 68, shows that the Metropolitan Building Acts form an exclusive code governing their rights and obligations with regard to adjoining owners.

Roskill, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the defendants.—The company are exempted from the provisions of the Metropolitan Building Acts by section 31 of their private Act, which expressly excludes "such buildings or parts of buildings as may be used for the purposes of a station" from the operation of the Acts. The land in question here, and the buildings upon it, are being used for the purposes of a station, and are therefore exempt, and no notice need be given to the adjoining owner under Part VIII. of the London Building Act, 1894. Even if the company are not exempted by section 31 of their private Act they have power under section 16 of that Act to demolish buildings, and they have also power under the terms of their special Act and section 45 of Railway Clauses Act, 1840, to acquire the land in question. That is sufficient to free them from the provisions of the London Building Act, 1894: City and South London Railway Co. v. London County Council, 40 W. R. 166, [1891] 2 Q. B. 513; London County Council v. School Board for London, 40 W. R. 604, [1892] 2 Q. B. 606. Even supposing we cannot succeed on either of these grounds, then we say that the proper remedy is compensation, and not by way of injunction and damages: Kirby v. School Board for Harrogate, [1896] 1 Ch. 437, 44 W. R. Dig. 144. We also deny the fact of substantial interference with the party structure, but we agree to postpone that point until the question of law as to notice has been determined.

Glen, in reply.—In all the cases the defendants have cited upon that part of their case the special Acts have conferred express powers to do something inconsistent with the terms of a general statute. What they would have to show to succeed upon that point is that they have express power not only to demolish buildings, but also not to give notice under the London Building Act, 1894. This is shown clearly in Uckfield Rural Council v. Crowborough Water Co., 48 W. R. 63, [1899] 2 Q. B. 664, where it was said that in order to escape the operation of the general Act there must be some inconsistency between the powers conferred by the special Act and the provisions of the general Act. In the case I have just cited City and South London Railway Co. v. London County Council was distinguished upon that ground. That being so, if in demolishing No. 21 they had not affected the party-wall, then that would have been within their powers, and no notice would have been required. But if they have affected the party-wall, then they are subject to Part VIII. of the London Building Act, 1894, and notice is required: London County Council v. Wandsworth and Putney Gas Co., 82 L. T. 562, 48 W. R. Dig. 120. As to the point raised by the defendants that compensation is the proper remedy, and not injunction and damages, the only case they have cited in support of this contention is Kirby v. School Board for Harrogate; but the City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., L. R. 2 Sc. App. 160, shows conclusively that there is nothing to take a purchaser by agreement out of the obligations imposed upon an ordinary owner; and, therefore, being purchasers by agreement of land outside their limits of deviation, in this case the defendants are subject to those obligations, and to the provisions of the London Building Act, 1894.

WARRINGTON, J.—The question of law to be determined in this case is whether the defendants were justified in pulling down No. 21, Cranbourn-street without giving the notice to the adjoining owner required by Part VIII. of the London Building Act, 1894, which relates to the rights of building and adjoining owners. The plaintiffs are entitled under a lease to the possession of No. 22, which adjoins No. 21. The defendants, the Charing Cross, Euston, and Hampstead Railway Co., were incorporated by private Act in 1893, and are authorized by that Act to construct a tube railway running up the Charing Cross-road and crossing Cranbourn-street. At the corner of these roads the company are constructing a station, and for that purpose acquired No. 21 by agreement for "extraordinary purposes." They have pulled down No. 21, and in so doing the plaintiffs allege that damage has been done to the party-wall between Nos. 21 and 22, and that the defendant company were only entitled to pull down No. 21 after giving the notice required by the London Building Act, 1894. The question to be determined is whether, assuming that the defendants have in fact done something which would, under ordinary circumstances, require notice to be given, they were, having regard to the special enactments bearing upon the case, bound to give that notice or not. It is necessary first to consider what the provisions of the various enactments relating to the case are. [His lordship here stated the provisions of sections 5 and 31 of the Charing Cross, Euston, and Hampstead Railway Act, 1893, and of sections 16 and 45 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, as set out above.] It is clear that the company were acting within their rights in acquiring the land for "extraordinary purposes" under section 45 of the Railway Clauses Act, and that they were also acting within their rights in pulling down No. 21. Now, the London Building Act, 1894, consists of a number of parts. Parts VI. and VII. relate to the "construction of buildings," Part VIII. relates to "rights of building and adjoining owners." It is said that the company are exempted by section 201 (8) of the London Building Act, but that section only exempts "station buildings" from the provisions of Parts VI. and VII., but not from the provisions of Part VIII. It is also said that the company are exempted by the terms of section 31 of their private Act, which exempts "such buildings or parts of buildings as might be used for the purposes of a station" from the provisions of the Acts relating to buildings in the metropolis. It seems to me that this provision has nothing to do with Part VIII. of the London Building Act, which relates to the "rights of building and adjoining owners," and it refers to buildings to be erected by the company, and not—to what is a totally different thing—to interference with a party structure consequent upon the demolition of an already existing building. There is therefore nothing in the special Act to exempt the company from the provisions of the Metropolitan Building Acts, and it becomes important to consider what the effect of those enactments is with regard to adjoining owners. Their effect was pointed out by Sir George Jessel in dealing with a provision of the Metropolitan Buildings Act, 1855, which is almost similar in terms to that contained in the London Building Act, 1894, in Standard Bank of British South America v. Stokes, 9 Ch. D., at p. 73. The result of that decision is, that whatever rights adjoining owners in the metropolis may have at common law, their rights depend now upon the Metropolitan Building Acts and nothing else. An adjoining owner has the rights conferred upon him by those enactments, but nothing more. The company say that they are entitled by statute to demolish the building, and that, if they are doing what a private owner could not do without notice, it does not matter in their case, because they have statutory authority, and the proper remedy is compensation and not injunction and damages. The fallacy of that argument lies in this: that the Act authorizes them to demolish buildings, but not to affect the party structure; it does not follow that in demolishing a building they need affect the party structure, in fact in this case the company say they have not done so. There is, therefore, nothing in the enactments to exempt the company, and they must be treated as an ordinary owner of land who is "desirous of doing a work affecting" a party-wall or structure within section 5 (31) of the London Building Act, 1894. The result is that the company are bound to give the notice required by the Act.

[The point as to notice having been disposed of, his lordship, after hearing the evidence, and after a private view of the premises on the morning of the 8th of February, held that the actual damage to the party structure was so slight as not to afford a good ground of complaint by the plaintiffs. His lordship therefore proceeded:] I held yesterday that if the company were "building owners" within the meaning of the London Building Act it was their duty to give notice. I now find as a fact that the company were not "building owners" within the meaning of the Act, because what they have done did not amount to interference with the party structure. This is in accordance with the views expressed by Sir George Jessel in Standard Bank of British South America v. Stokes. In fact, what the defendants have done is to pull down the adjoining building and not the party structure. In some trivial respects, perhaps, there may have been interference, but upon the principle de minimis non curat lex the court cannot regard it. Therefore nothing has been done "affecting" the party structure, and there can be no injunction or damages; but having regard to the fact that the defendants, by denying the obligation to give notice, intended to assert a special right under their Act which they were not entitled to, the action will be dismissed, without costs.

Judgment for the defendants accordingly.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, G. O. L. Fry.

Solicitors for the defendants, Bircham & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Ridley and Darling, JJ.) March 8.

SUCKLING v. PARKER. (a.)

Adulteration — Food and drugs — Adulterated milk — Analysis — Condition precedent — Analysis impossible through no fault of applicant — Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 9, 14, 21, 22; and 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), s. 21.

Section 21 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, provides: "The justices or court referred to in section 22 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, shall on the request of either party under that section cause an article of food or drug to be sent to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for analysis, and may, if they think fit, do so without any such request."

If through no fault of the party sought to be burdened, the analysis by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, contemplated by the above section, is a matter of impossibility, the court may convict for an offence under section 9 of the Act of 1875, notwithstanding that the analysis has not been made. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue reported that an examination of the bottle of milk submitted for analysis showed that the cork was loose and portions of fat and dried milk were adhering to the outside of the bottle and the paper wrapper, and that under these circumstances a satisfactory examination of the milk was not possible.

Held, that the court having come to the conclusion, upon proper evidence, that the milk was adulterated, the defendant was properly convicted.

Case stated by one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis.

On the 14th of April, 1905, a complaint was preferred by Thomas Parker (hereinafter called the respondent) against Alfred Suckling (hereinafter called the appellant) under section 9 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, charging the appellant with having, on the 9th day of April, sold an article of food, to wit, milk, which was injuriously affected in its quality, substance, or nature by being altered by there being 12 per cent. less than the proper proportion of butter fat, without making disclosure of the alteration to the respondent.

The following facts set in the case are material: Between 10 and 11 o'clock on the said morning a pint of the said milk was purchased by a Mrs. Wilkin from a man in the appellant's employment. Such milk was then given to the respondent, who informed the said employee that he was an inspector under the Food and Drugs Act and that the said pint of milk had been purchased for analysis, and that it was his intention to have the same analyzed by the public analyst. The respondent thereupon, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, divided the said milk into three parts, each of which parts he poured out into a separate bottle. He then placed in each of the said bottles a cork, and upon each cork the respondent placed a seal and upon each of the said bottles he also placed a mark. The respondent delivered one of the said bottles to the employee and retained the other two bottles, one of which he subsequently sent for analysis, the other of which he retained.

At the hearing of the said complaint on the 21st of May, 1902, the certificate of the public analyst was produced to the magistrate by the respondent, and the said certificate showed that the sample submitted to the said analyst was deficient in butter fat to the extent of 12 per cent. The appellant did not require that the analyst should be called as a witness.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant's solicitor called for the production of the third sample, which was not then in court, but was subsequently produced. Upon the said sample being produced it appeared that the cork had been partly forced out of the bottle owing to the fomentation of the milk and part of the contents of the bottle had escaped. The cork had not been secured in the bottle by string or other ligature. The appellant's solicitor thereupon contended that the said sample had not been sealed or fastened up or retained in accordance with the provision of section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and that no conviction could therefore follow. The objection was overruled, and at the request of the appellant the said bottle was duly sent to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for analysis, and the case was adjourned for their report.

At the adjourned hearing of the said complaint on the 9th of June, 1905, a letter from the said commissioners was produced in which it was stated that an examination of the bottle showed that the cork was loose and portions of dried fat and milk were adhering to the outside of the bottle and the paper wrapper, and that under these circumstances a satisfactory examination of the milk was not possible, and that the analysis could not therefore be carried out by the department.

The appellant's solicitor contended that when (as in this case) a request had been made for the analysis of the third sample such an analysis was a condition precedent that must be fulfilled before the court could convict.

The court found as facts that the said milk was milk from which a portion of the cream had been removed, and convicted the appellant, but stated this case.

Clarke Hall, for the respondent.—Section 14 of the Act of 1875 provides for the taking of the three samples, one of which he shall retain for future comparison, and section 21 of the Act of 1899 says that at the request of either party this third sample must be sent to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for analysis, the words being imperative. [RIDLEY, J.—Section 21 does not say the third sample is to be sent, but shall cause "an article of food or drug."] That must refer to section 14 of the 1875 Act. The case is really covered by Lowery v. Hallard, 22 Times L. R. 186, where the court held that each of these samples must be of sufficient quantity to admit of an analysis. [DARLING, J.—That does not refer to an accident. Suppose the food was such as would not keep till the trial, would every prosecution fail in respect to such an article of food?] After thirty years of experience the Legislature has found that the Act need not provide for such an eventuality. All cases of fruit and like perishable commodities are provided for aliunde. This very case has arisen in Scotland, where the bottle of milk constituting the third sample became broken, and the court held that its existence was a condition precedent to a conviction: Hutchinson v. Stevenson, 4 Fr. 69.

Bethune, for the respondent.—This accident was not due to the fault of the respondent, but to that of the defendant, who should have applied earlier for it to be sent to Somerset House. The object of the section is to allow of a check, and if the defendant does not avail himself of it he must blame himself. Clearly section 21 of the 1899 Act does not necessarily refer to the third sample, but to any of the food in question.

Clarke Hall in reply.

RIDLEY, J.—In this case the appellant has been convicted under section 9 of the 1875 Act. The main point urged on behalf of the appellant is that there was not produced the third sample which had been taken as required by section 14 of the 1875 Act [His lordship read the section.] This was complied with in the first instance as stated in the case. Before the magistrate it turned out that the third sample has been kept in such a condition that it could not be analyzed in Somerset House. [His lordship read the facts.] The magistrate convicted the appellant. The point taken is that the Act of Parliament required not only the production of the third sample, but also it should be sent to Somerset House and analyzed. In support of that contention the case of Hutchinson v. Stevenson has been cited, decided in 1902. In that case it appeared that on the sample being called for the respondent said that the bottle had burst some days before, and therefore could not be produced. The court said it was a condition precedent that that sample should be produced. That follows from section 21 of the Act of 1875; but in the present case a sample was produced but not in such a state as to furnish an analysis. Thus in the reasoning of the judgment in Hutchinson v. Stevenson it does not appear that the court took the distinction which commends itself to us, for the judgment of Lord Clerk says: "The statute further enacts that if the accused so desires it he is entitled to have the third sample sent to Somerset House for analysis by the Government analyst there so that his analysis may be produced at the trial." In that case it was of importance, because the third sample had ceased to exist. That is true; but here it had been produced and there it was not. That point was not present in the minds of the judges, but it does seem to me that, although section 21 of the 1875 Act says that this part of the article shall be produced, it is nowhere said that the analysis should be produced before the justices before conviction. There is in section 21 of the Act of 1899 this provision. [His lordship read the section.] But I do not find that that says it is to be the third sample. It seems to me an additional provision for the protection of the person who sold, but it does not say it must be the third sample. It is said it must be so because of the concluding part of section 14 of the 1875 Act. I do not find that. [He read the section.] It does not say there that the third portion is to be in anyway identified so that you can say that where section 21 of the 1899 Act refers to articles of food to be sent to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, it necessarily refers to that third portion; but if it did, it does not appear to me to follow that the analysis must necessarily be produced. It would be a strong thing to say if all that had been done had been done properly, and it happens without fault, that the third portion has been spoiled, that therefore a person who ought to be convicted on the merits should escape. There ought to be some statutory provision to compel that. Mr. Clarke Hall also referred to Lowery v. Hallard. I was a party to the judgment. But in that case we were only dealing with the question of the taking of the samples, and we said that the samples taken should be taken in proportions to enable the analysis to be taken. I do not see how that case bears upon this question, which is to be solved in the events that have happened in this case. If that was the only point I should say that the conviction should stand. I think it may be necessary for the magistrate to go into the question whose fault it was. The fastening seems to be satisfactory so far as stated that the three samples were corked up. It may be that they were sufficiently corked; it may be they were not. I think we ought to know whether it was a fact that there was proper care taken by the respondent in corking up, by reason of the words in section 14, "Sealed or fastened up in such a manner as its nature will permit." If this has not been done, then it follows that what I have been saying before applies, because one of the conditions precedent has not been observed. It seems to me, as in the case of Lowery v. Hallard, we should know if the samples have been properly fastened up. If that is the case, I think that the result would follow that the conviction should be confirmed, but if it turned out otherwise I think the contrary would follow. The case should go back for the magistrate to state the facts on that point.

DARLING, J.—I agree.

Solicitor for appellant, W. T. Ricketts.

Solicitor for respondent, Hortin.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Jan. 16.

REX v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.
Ex parte NORRIS. (a.)

Education Act—Compensation—Transfer of powers of London School Board to London County Council—Officer of authority whose powers were not transferred—Direct pecuniary loss—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 120—Education Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 42), Schedule II., rr. 16, 21.

Before the Education Act of 1902 came into force in London, the London School Board directed its precept for a rate to be levied for public education expenses to the Corporation of London. N. was at that time a collector for the Commissioners of Sewers, the rating authority for that corporation, and as such collected the education rate, and received for so doing a certain poundage on the amount collected. When the powers of the school board were transferred to the London County Council the education rate was collected with the poor rate. N., having by the change lost the poundage which he formerly earned, claimed compensation under rule 21 of Schedule II. of the Education Act, 1902, and section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888, from the London County Council.

Held (by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley, J., Darling, J., dissenting), that compensation could not be claimed, because N. was not in the employment of the authority whose powers had been transferred to the London County Council under the change brought about by the Education Act, 1902, nor under the Local Government Act, 1888.

Rule calling upon the respondent county council to hear and determine an application for compensation by one Norris, a rate collector in the employment of the Corporation of the City of London.

The claim was made under rule 21 of Schedule II. of the Education Act, 1902, which provides that "Section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which relates to compensation to existing officers, shall apply as respects officers transferred under the Act and also (with the necessary modifications) to any other officers who by virtue of this Act or anything done in pursuance or in consequence of this Act suffer direct pecuniary loss by abolition of office or by diminution or loss of fees or salary, in like manner as it applies to officers transferred under this Act."

By section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888: "Every existing officer declared by this Act to be entitled to compensation and every existing officer . . . who by virtue of this Act or anything done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act, suffers any direct pecuniary loss by abolition of office or by diminution or loss of fees or salary, shall be entitled to have compensation paid to him for such pecuniary loss by the county council, to whom the powers of the authority, whose officer he was, are transferred under this Act."

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The claim arose in this way: Before the Education Act of 1902 became applicable to London the London School Board had directed its precepts for a rate to be levied by the Commissioners of Sewers, the rating authority for the Corporation of London, and Norris as a collector of that corporation collected the rate and received certain poundage for so doing. When the powers of the school board were transferred to the London County Council the education rate was collected with the poor rate, and Norris therefore no longer collected it, and consequently lost the poundage he formerly received.

Macmorran, K.C., and Ryde, for the county council.—As Norris was neither an officer transferred under the Education Act, 1902, nor an officer of any authority whose powers were transferred to the county council, he is not entitled to compensation. Before the rule can be made absolute the court would have to hold that the words in section 120 "to whom the powers of the authority, whose officer he was, are transferred" have no bearing on this case. It is submitted that the whole right to compensation turns on that condition precedent being satisfied.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the applicant.—By reason of what was done under the Education, 1902, the applicant has suffered a direct loss. Certain rights to compensation in such circumstances are conferred by rule 21, and the court is bound to modify section 120 in order to carry them into effect. Rule 16 provides for the case of officers whose rights and liabilities are transferred, so that the second part of section 21 can only have reference to the officers of an authority whose powers have not been transferred to the county council.

DARLING, J.—In this case I have the misfortune not to have come to the same conclusion as the rest of the court, and I therefore must express my opinion first.

I think that the rule nisi should be made absolute, because if rule 21 does not apply to the present case then the words "and also shall apply (with the necessary modifications) to any other officers" are useless. The difficulty is that the powers of the authority whose officer he was are not transferred. I think that if those words must remain unqualified they would exclude the present applicant, but then I think that at the same time they would prevent any effect being given to all the latter part of rule 21. Therefore in my view it is necessary to make the modification which unless made would render the latter part of rule 21 incapable of application to any class of case at all. For this reason I think the rule should be made absolute.

RIDLEY, J.—I regret that I differ from the view taken by my brother Darling and that the applicant is not entitled to compensation. Here we have a case of a man who loses, not his office, but a portion of the fees which he used to gain in his office or employment. That is not a case, I think, within the scope of the Act at all. The words in section 120 of the Act of 1888, "whose officer he was," are a necessary part of this legislation. It is agreed that Norris does not come within the category of officers of any authority whose property, rights, and liabilities have been transferred. In my opinion we are being asked to apply the words of the Act to a state of things not contemplated by the draftsman, and I don't think that the words "with necessary modifications" in rule 21 authorize us to strike out the words "whose officer he was" in section 120. I think the rule must be discharged.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The case certainly presents considerable difficulties. I agree with my brother Ridley that rule 21 in Schedule II. is not sufficient to give this particular officer compensation. I am not impressed very much by the suggestion that this result creates an injustice. Mr. Norris was appointed annually by the corporation, and he need not go on collecting for them unless he likes.

It is necessary to consider section 120 of the Act of 1888 and these rules having regard to the purview of the Education Act, 1902. In the first place it should not be overlooked that the objects of the Act of 1902 were the transfer of the source from which the fund was to come, the transfer of the authority, the school board, to the new authority, the county council, and the transfer of the property itself. Section 25 of the Education Act, 1902, shows that the schedules are framed with reference not only to the transfer of powers, but also to the transfer of property. That fact necessitated certain modifications which have to be made in section 120 of the Act of 1888. Section 18 provides for the different ways in which the fund is to be raised and expenses met, and the result is that the money was collected by some other officer representing another rating authority. Now, rule 16 in the schedule provides for the simple case where the officer of a school board goes over bodily; if his office is abolished he gets compensation under rule 21. Then we come to rule 21, which had to provide for a different set of people whose rights, powers, and property were being affected. This rule applies clearly to the officers of managers as well as to the officers of the school board, because when we look to the modification which is indicated in clause (c) we see this: "Any reference to powers transferred shall be construed as a reference to property transferred." As my brother Ridley has already pointed out, the words "direct pecuniary loss by abolition of office or by diminution or loss of fees or salary" were already in section 120 of the Act of 1888, but the only cases in which there could be compensation paid under that section were where the officer was the officer of the authority from whom the powers were taken away, and the compensation was to be paid by the authority to whom those powers were transferred. In the new state of matters that was not sufficient, for the Education Act contemplated the transfer of the property also. I cannot construe the words "with the necessary modifications" as enabling us to do more than modify section 120 of the Act of 1888 in order to give effect to the clear purpose and intention of the Act of 1902. It would be going too far to bring within the purview of the section persons who in the ordinary construction of the words would be outside it. I think, therefore, this rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for the applicant, Rivington & Son.

Solicitor for the county council, Seager Berry.

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) — Dec. 4, 20.

YSTRADYFODWG AND PONTYPRIDD MAIN SEWERAGE BOARD v. BENSTED (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax, Schedule A—Sewer or sewage carrier—"Hereditament capable of actual occupation"—Assessment—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Income Tax Commissioners for a district affirmed an assessment made upon a sewerage board under Schedule A of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, in respect of some 2½ miles of the length of a sewer or sewage carrier passing through or over land in a parish forming part of their district. The sewerage board appealed, on the ground that they had no land in the parish and that their interests in the realty were easements only acquired for the purpose of the sewer or sewage carrier.

Held, that the appellants were liable to the assessment.

Taylor v. Oldham, 4 Ch. D. 39, discussed.

Appeal by the sewage board from a decision of the commissioners for the general purposes of Income Tax Acts for the district of Newport, Monmouthshire.

The commissioners had affirmed an assessment made upon the appellants in the parish of Rhymney for the year ending the 5th of April, 1905, of £800 (gross) under Schedule A of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, in respect of some 2½ miles of the length of a sewer or sewage carrier passing through or over land in that parish.

The appellants alleged that they had no land in the parish and that their interest in the realty were easements, only acquired for the purpose of the sewer or sewage carrier, and a case was stated by the commissioners for the opinion of the court on the question whether on the facts the appellants were liable to be rated in respect of this property.

The material paragraphs dealing with the facts as set out in the case are referred to at length in the judgment.

Upon the facts as stated the commissioners held (1) that the appellants' concern was not one which fell within 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 60, Schedule A, r. 3, and was not chargeable as a whole in respect of its profits in accordance with the rules prescribed by Schedule D; (2) that the appellants were chargeable in respect of the portion of their sewer and works in the parish of Rhymney under Schedule A in respect of the annual value thereof according to the general rule Schedule A, No. 1, and they accordingly confirmed the assessment made upon the appellant, subject to the opinion of the court.

The provisions of Schedule A, r. 1, and Schedule A, r. 3, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 60, are respectively as follows: Schedule A, r. 1, provides that "The annual value of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages charged under Schedule A shall be understood to be rent by the year at which the same are let at rack-rent, if the amount of such rent shall have been fixed by agreement commencing within the period of seven years preceding the 5th day of April next before the time of making the assessment, but if the same are not so let at rack-rent, then at the rack-rent at which the same are worth to be let by the year, which rule shall be construed to extend to all lands, tenements, and hereditaments or heritages capable of actual occupation, of whatever nature, and for whatever purpose occupied or enjoyed and of whatever value, except the properties mentioned in No. II. and No. III. of this schedule." Schedule A, r. 3, provides that "the annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for one year, or the average amount for one year of the profits received therefrom within the respective times limited." The properties mentioned in the third heading of the rule are as follows: "Iron works, gas works, salt springs or works, alum mines or works, water works, streams of water, canals, inland navigations, docks, drains and levels, fishings, rights of markets and fairs, tolls, railways and other ways, bridges, ferries and other concerns of a like nature, from or arising out of any lands, tenements, hereditaments or heritages, on the profits of the year preceding."

S. T. Evans, K.C. (J. H. Redman with him), for the appellants.—There is no authority for holding that a sewer belonging to a public authority is assessable in respect of income tax. If the appellants are assessable at all they are not liable under Schedule A, r. 1, but only on account of their profits on the part of the sewer affected under rule 3 (d). A sewer carrier does not come within the words in rule 1, "land, tenements, or hereditaments capable of actual occupation," because sections 13 and 16 of the Public Health Act show that the property the appellants have in the sewer is less than ownership. To hold otherwise would be to hold for the first time that the owners of a sewer were the owners of the land which had been displaced by the placing of the sewer pipes in the land: Rolls v. St. George's Vestry, 28 W. R. 867, 14 Ch. D. 785; Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird, [1896] A. C. 434, 44 W. R. Dig. 96. If this sewer is assessable, then every sewer in the country is assessable also. If it be assessable, then it must come under Schedule A, r. 3, and to do that it must be ejusdem generis with the concerns therein mentioned, or they must derive some profit from it which at present they do not, as the money borrowed has not been repaid: Paddington Cemetery Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 32 W. R. 551, 13 Q. B. D. 9; Ystradyfodwg, &c., Main Sewerage Board v. Newport Union, 49 W. R. 292, [1901] 1 Q. B. 406; and Edinburgh South Cemetery Co. v. Kinmont, 2 Tax. Cas. 516.

Sir R. B. Finlay, K.C., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the Crown.—Upon the principle applied in all these cases a sewer is a hereditament capable of being used and occupied in that sense that renders the local authority in whom the ownership is vested liable to assessment under Schedule A, r 1: Taylor v. Corporation of Oldham, 25 W. R. 178, 4 Ch. D. 395; Holywell Union v. Halkyn Drainage Co., [1895] A. C. 117, 43 W. R. Dig. 131; Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne, [1896] 2 Q. B. 205, 44 W. R. Dig. 93; Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co., 32 W. R. 776, 13 Q. B. D. 904; Metropolitan Railway Co. v Fowler, 40 W. R. 306, [1892] 1 Q. B. 165, [1893] A. C. 416; Westminster Corporation v. Johnson, 52 W. R. 350. With regard to the question whether the appellants ought to be assessed under rule 1 or rule 3 of the schedule, it is clear that rule 3 is wholly inapplicable, for that rule deals only with commercial, and not with sanitary undertakings: Dillon v. Haverfordwest, 3 Tax. Cas. 31; Dublin Corporation v. Macadam, 2 Tax. Cas. 387.

S. T. Evans, K.C., in reply, cited Attorney-General v. London County Council, [1901] A. C. 26, and Glasgow Corporation Waterworks v. Miller, 2 Tax. Cas. 131.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—WALTON, J.—The first and main question in this case is whether the appellants are chargeable under the Income Tax Act, Schedule A, r. No. 1, in respect of the annual value of their sewer in the parish of Rhymney. The appellants are the governing body of a united drainage district consisting of the urban district of Rhondda (formerly known as Ystradyfodwg) and the urban district of Pontypridd, constituted by virtue of a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board dated the 4th of June, 1885, and duly confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 7) Act, 1885, for the purposes of carrying into effect a system of sewerage for the use of such urban districts, and it was provided by article 19 of the said Order that all sewers made by the appellants should vest in and be under the control of the appellants. Pursuant to the powers vested in them by the said Order the appellants designed and constructed, and have since always maintained, a sewer or sewage carrier for the use of the said district, and have erected, maintained, and worked such works, machinery, and plant as were required for conveying the sewage of the said district to the sea. The total length of the said sewer or sewage carrier is about 17¼ miles, whereof nearly 2½ miles passes through or over land situate in the said parish of Rhymney, which land (excepting such part as forms part of the foreshore of the Bristol Channel) was previously to the construction of the said sewer or sewage carrier, and still is, rated and assessed for the relief of the poor The construction of the sewer or sewage carrier within the parish of Rhymney is as follows: 182 yards of iron pipes carried on concrete arches above the surface of the ground; 1,021 yards of pipes laid below the surface and ordinary level of the ground; 1,890 yards carried below the surface of the ground, but covered by an artificial embankment of varying height, which rises above the level of the adjacent land; and 1,246 yards of pipes (hereinafter called the outfall) passing partly over and partly beneath the surface of the foreshore of the Bristol Channel. Under the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 8) Act, 1896, the appellants obtained powers enabling them with the consent of the Local Government Board to allow the sewers of the council of any county borough or district to communicate with the said sewer or sewage carrier vested in the appellants. In pursuance of these powers, and with the consent of the Local Government Board, agreements had previously to the date of the making of the assessment now appealed against been made with the Dinas Powis Urban District Council and the Caerphilly Urban District Council and the Cardiff Corporation whereby sewage of certain parts of the district under the control of the said local bodies was to be received in, and carried away by, the said sewer or sewage carrier of the appellants upon payment to the appellants by the said local bodies of certain sums levied upon the respective rateable values of the said districts. The assessment in question is for the year ending the 5th of April, 1905, and the amount of the assessment is £800. Although during the year in question the appellants received, in addition to what was levied in rates in their own districts, sums amounting to £943 19s. 7d. from the Cardiff Corporation and the three urban district councils which made use of the sewer under the Order of 1896, it seems clear, and was not disputed, that they derived no profit from the use or working of their sewer or of that part of it which is in the parish of Rhymney. The appellants appealed against the assessment to the commissioners for the general purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the district of Monmouth, who confirmed the assessment subject to the case upon which I have now to pronounce the opinion of the court.

The question which thus arises is of very general importance, and, so far as I know, entirely new. I believe I am right in saying this is the first time that the question has been raised, and perhaps the first time that a local authority has been assessed under the Income Tax Acts in respect of their interest in their sewers. However this may be, there seems to be, at all events, no direct authority upon the question. It is not contended by the appellants that a public authority such as a sewerage board is exempt from liability for income tax, or for income tax in respect of property used for public purposes. I have not to deal with any broad questions of policy. I have only to say whether, having regard to the language of the Acts, the assessment in question ought to be confirmed. The appellants contend, in the first place, that their interest in the sewer is an easement only, and as such is not a "hereditament capable of actual occupation" within Schedule A, r. 1. The rule is as follows: [His lordship read the rule, and continued:] The sewer in this case is vested in the appellants under art. 19 of the Order of 1885. But it is admitted that their interest in the sewer is precisely similar to the interest which is vested in a local authority in the sewers within its district under section 13 of the Public Health Act. And this again is similar to the interests in "streets" vested in the local authority under the same Act. I mention this because the numerous cases cited during the argument related mostly to streets or sewers vested in the local authorities under the Public Health Act. These authorities are, I think, applicable to the present case. Since the case of Taylor v. Oldham, which was decided in 1876 (4 Ch. D., p. 39), many questions have arisen as to the interest and duration of the estate vested in local authorities in their sewers or streets under the Public Health Act. But, subject to the later decisions upon these questions as to the extent in space and time of the estate of the local authorities, I think that what was said by Sir George Jessel in that case is a correct statement of the law. The passage to which I refer is as follows: "It was found under the old law, and it was sometimes held, that the sewer authorities had only an easement, and it was found to be very inconvenient, and consequently in the modern Acts the property in the sewers has been vested in the sewer authorities. That is to say, that instead of allowing the subsoil to remain in the owner of the soil, subject to an easement or right of sewerage or drainage, the absolute property in the sewer (which means not merely in the brick barrel, or whatever it may be, forming the sewer, but the whole interior of the sewer, that is, the whole of the space occupied by it) is now vested in the sewer authorities." Mr. Evans, for the appellants, contended that the later authorities are not consistent with this statement of the law. And I have carefully considered the cases to which he referred me. The authority which appeared to go the furthest in support of his contention was a passage from the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen in Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne, [1896] 2 Q. B., p. 205. There the Lord Chief Justice had to consider the question as to whether a drain which connected two or more houses with a public sewer, and existed before the Public Health Act, 1890, came into operation, was a "private drain" within the meaning of section 19 of the Act. And he was dealing with the argument that as the drain in question was a sewer within the meaning of section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and was vested in the local authority under that section, it could not be a "private drain" under section 19 of the Act of 1890. In dealing with this argument Lord Russell had to consider the effect of section 13 of the Act of 1875 and the decisions upon the section, and in doing so he used the language which is relied upon by Mr. Evans. The passage is as follows: "But what is the meaning of the word 'vest' in section 13 of the Act of 1875? It has been clearly held that the vesting is not a giving of the property in the sewer and in the soil surrounding it to the local authority, but giving such ownership and such rights only as are necessary for the purpose of carrying out the duties of a local authority with regard to the subject-matter." In this passage Lord Russell was not dealing with the question whether the interest of the local authority in a sewer is a mere easement or a property in the land. He was referring to the cases which have decided that the extent and duration of the property or estate acquired by the local authority are limited by reference to the purposes for which the property is vested in such authority. I do not think that the Lord Chief Justice intended to decide or to say that the interest acquired by the local authority was an easement only. In 1904 the case of the Westminster Corporation v. Johnson, 52 W. R. 350, [1904] 1 K. B. 19, came before Wright J., and he accepted and acted upon the construction of Lord Russell's language which is relied upon by Mr. Evans. But his judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, [1904] 2 K. B., p. 737, where the present Master of the Rolls said as follows: "No doubt the tendency of modern decisions has been to limit the meaning of the word 'vest' in the Public Health Acts in connection with a street to vesting 'in the urban authority such property and such property only as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use,' as stated by Lord Herschell in the passage cited by Wright, J., from Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird, [1896] App. Cas., p. 434, 44 W. R. Dig. 96. But no case has gone so far as to hold that actual property, as distinguished from an easement only, was not passed to the authority by that word." It is true that the question in Westminster Corporation v. Johnson arose, not under the Income Tax Act, but under the Land Tax Act, 1797, s. 4. The words in the section are: "All and every manors, messuages, lands, and tenements . . . and all hereditaments of what nature or kind soever they be." The Court of Appeal held that the interest in question was a hereditament within the meaning of the section. But the importance of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls for the purposes of the present case is in the expression of his opinion as to the meaning of the word "vest" in the Public Health Act in connection with streets and sewers, having regard to the language used by Lord Russell, which had been relied upon in the court below by Wright, J. As I have said, and as appears from these cases, the questions as to the vesting of streets and the vesting of sewers are, in principle, identical. In my opinion the interest of the appellants was not a mere easement, but was a property in the land and a "hereditament" which was "capable of actual occupation" (and, in fact, was occupied by the appellants) within the meaning of Schedule A, r. 1. I ought perhaps to mention an argument in the nature of a reductio ad absurdum that if sewers fall within rule No. 1, streets also must be chargeable. The answer to this is that streets are public highways, and unless the mines or subsoil under the highway is occupied or used for some profitable purpose, the land occupied by the highway is of no value to its owner or to any one except the public. But it is further contended for the appellants that even if their interest in the sewer is a "hereditament capable of actual occupation" it is within, and should be assessed under, Schedule A, rule No. 3, and not under rule No. 1. The material words of rule No. 3, paragraph No. 3, are as follows. The rule begins: "The annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for one year or the average amount for one year of the profits received therefrom within the respective time herein limited." The first paragraph is as to quarries, the second as to mines, and the third one, which has been relied on, is in these words: "Of iron works, gas works, salt springs or works, alum mines or works, water works, streams of water, canals, inland navigations, docks, drains and levels, fishings, rights of markets and fairs, tolls, railways and other ways, bridges, ferries, and other concerns of the like nature, from or arising out of any lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, on the profits of the year preceding." It is said that the sewer comes under the general words of this rule, "other concerns of a like nature"; that it is a concern of a nature like to that of a "stream of water," "dock, drain or level." But it must be remembered that to fall within this rule it is not sufficient that the "concern" should be like one or other of the hereditaments expressly mentioned; it is not indeed sufficient, in my opinion, that the hereditament should be one of those expressly mentioned, as, for example, "a stream of water" or a "bridge." It is necessary, in order to bring the "concern" or hereditament within this rule, that it should be used for the purpose of a business by which profits are earned; although, of course, every hereditament used for the purpose of such a business is not within this rule. Some light upon the interpetation of the rule may be obtained from what was said in the case of the Edinburgh Southern Cemetery Co. v. Kinmont, 2 Tax. Cas. 516, by Lord Shand at p. 528, and by Lord McLaren, at p. 530. As Lord Macnaghten said, in [1901] App. Cas., at p. 35, income tax is always a tax upon income, or at all events, upon a profit or gain in the nature of income. In the case of land, whether it is occupied by its owner or let, the annual profit or gain in the nature of income arising from the land is, in most cases, fairly and conveniently measured by the rack-rent at which the land could be let by the year; but in some cases where the land is used for the purposes of business and constitutes what may be described as the plant, or sometimes indeed the stock-in-trade, of the business, the actual thing sold or dealt in, rack-rent is not a convenient measure of the profit or gain arising out of the land; and I think it will be found that it is cases of this kind which are described and regulated by rule No. 3 of Schedule A. If the appellants were making any profit by allowing any other local authorities to use their sewer the case might be different and other questions might arise. But in fact the appellants make no profit whatever. They receive certain comparatively small payments which go pro tanto to reduce the very much larger costs of the maintenance and working of the sewer. The case falls within the words of Schedule A, rule No. 1. In my opinion it is not taken out of the rule by the fact that some payment is made to the appellants by the other authorities who make use of the sewer. There is another contention of the appellants with which I must deal. It is stated in the appellants points for argument, Nos. 10 and 11, "that if contrary to what the appellants contend they are chargeable under Schedule A in respect of the annual value of the land, then in the alternative they contend that such annual value for the year ended the 5th of April, 1905, is to be ascertained by reference to the adjoining land, which is purely agricultural land, and the rack-rent at which the same is worth to be let as agricultural land, and inasmuch as the acreage of the land covered by this assessment is one and a-half acres or thereabouts, and the rack-rent of the adjoining land does not exceed £2 per acre, the assessment should be upon that basis. That the poor rate assessment upon the subject-matter claimed to be chargeable has no application to the appellants' undertaking for the purposes of income tax." Upon the question of amount, it appears to me that the commissioners were at liberty to take the poor rate assessment into consideration as evidence of the gross annual value. They were not, and, as I understand their findings, did not, consider themselves bound by it. On the other hand, I do not think they were bound to ascertain the annual value by reference to the rent at which the adjoining agricultural land is let. I do not think that the amount of the assessment has been ascertained upon any wrong principle. In my judgment, therefore, the assessment must be confirmed.

There will be judgment for the respondent with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Wrentmore & Son, for Walter Morgan, Bruce, & Nicholas, Pontypridd.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div.
(Bigham and Walton, JJ.) April 2.

In re MELLISON.
Ex parte DAY. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Disclaimer—Administration of estate of deceased insolvent—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 55, 125, sub-sections 5, 6.

The provisions of section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (disclaimer of onerous property), are applicable to administrations in bankruptcy under section 125 of the same Act, of the estates of persons dying insolvent.

Dictum of Cave, J., in Ex parte The Official Receiver, In re Gould, 35 W. R. 569, 19 Q. B. D. 92, followed.

Appeal from a decision of the registrar of the county court at Brighton giving the trustee in the administration of the estate of J. B. Mellison, a person who had died insolvent, leave to disclaim the lease of a hotel at Brighton.

The lease in question had been granted by one Isaacs to the deceased Mellison, who had sub-let to a Mrs. Morse, who had in her turn assigned to the appellant, Francis Day.

Mellison having died insolvent, an order was made for the administration of his estate in bankruptcy in the county court at Brighton under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and Mr. Oscar Berry was appointed trustee.

The trustee applied to the registrar at Brighton for leave to disclaim the lease from Isaacs to the deceased under section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Day opposed the application on the ground that the court had no power to give leave to disclaim in administrations under section 125.

The registrar gave the trustee leave to disclaim.

Day appealed.

Reed, K.C., and Hodges, for the appellant.—The question in this case depends upon what parts of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are applicable to administrations under section 125 of that Act. By sub-sections 5 and 6 of section 125 it is laid down that the trustee shall realize and distribute the estate in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and that with certain modifications "all the provisions of Part III. of this Act, relating to the administration of the property of a bankrupt, shall, so far as the same are applicable, apply to the case of an administration order under this section." It is true that section 55 is one of the provisions of Part III., but there are many sections in that part which are not applicable to these administrations. The court of bankruptcy in cases under this section will, unless there is some provision to the contrary, follow the practice of the Chancery Division in the administration of insolvent estates: Ex parte Ellis, In re Crowther, 36 W. R. 189, 20 Q. B. D. 38. Section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, lays down what rules in bankruptcy are applicable to administrations in Chancery, and does not import disclaimer which is unknown in administrations in Chancery In re Westbourne-grove Drapery Co., 25 W. R. 509, 5 Ch. D. 248. There is no direct authority as to whether section 55 applies in these cases. The registrar in his judgment relied upon a dictum of Cave, J., in Ex parte The Official Receiver, In re Gould, 35 W. R. 569, 19 Q. B. D. 92, where, referring to sections 50 to 57 and 58 to 65, he said, "Speaking generally, there can I think be no doubt that the last two portions apply to an administration under section 125, though even in those portions there are sections, such as 52 and 64, which would not be applicable." The registrar also relied on Hasluck v. Clark, 47 W. R. 471, [1899] 1 Q. B. 699. [WALTON, J.—Is there anything in section 55 which makes it inapplicable.] Sub-section 1 refers to "the property of the bankrupt," and sub-section 2 speaks of disclaimer operating "to determine the rights, interests, and liabilities of the bankrupt." In administration there is no bankrupt. Sub-section 6 makes the person who takes a vesting order subject to the liabilities of the bankrupt "at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed." In administration there is no such date.

E. E. Humphreys, for the trustee.—The lease in question formed part of the property of the bankrupt. Under sub-section 5 of section 125 it vested in the trustee and he was entitled to deal with it in accordance with the provisions of the Act. As it was onerous property, he could deal with it under section 55 and disclaim it.

He referred In re D'Epineuil, 30 W. R. 423, 20 Ch. D. 217, cited by Cave, J., in In re Gould.

Clayton, for Isaacs, the lessee, did not argue.

BIGHAM, J.—The only point in this case is whether in administrations in bankruptcy of the estates of persons dying insolvent there is jurisdiction to allow the disclaimer of onerous property. I see no reason why there should not be, and I think that there is jurisdiction. This lease which had been granted to the deceased was undoubtedly part of the property of his estate, and vested in the trustee just as in an ordinary bankruptcy. Sub-section 6 of section 125 applies the provisions of Part III. of the Act, so far as they are applicable, to the administration of the property of a person dying insolvent. The administration order vested this lease in the trustee, and I do not see why he should not have the rights of an ordinary trustee in bankruptcy.

In the cases of In re Gould and Hasluck v. Clark, the courts refused to import sections 47 and 45 into these administrations because they would have then had to deal with the property of persons other than the bankrupt which would be outside the scope of section 125, but in the present case the property to be dealt with is the property of the insolvent estate, and I do not see why the trustee should not be entitled to disclaim it. I consider the judgment of Cave, J., in In re Gould an authority upon the point, though it was but an obiter dictum.

WALTON, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal granted.

Solicitor for the appellant, R. W. Beckwith.

Solicitors for the trustee, Cushman & Clifton.

Solicitors for the lessor, Hyman, Isaacs, & Lewis.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) March 24.

BROWN v. FEENEY. (a.)

Practice—Payment into court—Liability not denied—Death of defendant before trial—Jurisdiction to order payment out of money—Ord. 22, rr. 1, 5.

The defendant in an action of libel without denying liability paid a sum of money into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff proceeded with the action and did not take the money out of court. Before trial the defendant died, and his executors applied for an order that the money in court should be paid out to them.

Held, that, though the action had abated owing to the death of the defendant, the court had power, under its, general jurisdiction over money in court, to order it to be paid out as it thought right, and that the plaintiff's right was superior to the executors', and the court would order it to be paid out to him.

Appeal from an order of Walton, J., in chambers.

The action was brought to recover damages for libel. The defendant, with his defence, which did not deny liability, paid a sum of money into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff proceeded with the action and did not take the money out of court. Before the trial the defendant died. The action having thus abated, the defendant's executors took out a summons, headed in the action, for an order that the money should be paid out to them. The summons was referred by the master to the judge, who refused the application. The executors appealed.

In order to avoid any technical difficulty that the summons could not be taken out in an action which was dead, it was agreed between the parties with the consent of the court that the summons should be treated as an originating summons not taken out in the action, and that the court should say to whom the money should be paid.

Montague Lush, K.C., and R. E. Vaughan Williams, for the executors.—Where money is paid into court, even without a denial of liability, and is not accepted in satisfaction, it remains the property of the defendant. The plaintiff had merely a right, under ord. 22, r. 5, to take it out during the pendency of the action. The action having abated by the death of the defendant without the money having been taken out of court by the plaintiff, the executors are entitled to have their own money paid out to them. If the action had gone to trial, and the plaintiff had recovered less than the amount paid into court, the judge at the trial could have made an order under rule 5 for payment of the balance back to the defendant: Gray v. Bartholomew, 43 W. R. 177, [1895] 1 Q. B. 209. That showed that the money did not become the property of the plaintiff. Gray v. Bartholomew and Best v. Osborne, Garrett, & Co., 12 Times L. R. 419, were both inconsistent with the money becoming the property of the plaintiff. The order ought therefore to have been made for payment of the money out to the executors.

They also referred to Barnes v. Jeaffreson, 6 Times L. R. 435.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Montague Shearman, K.C., and P. B. Morle, for the plaintiff.—Where money is paid into court under ord. 22, r. 1, as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, without a denial of liability, it becomes the property of the plaintiff from the moment of payment in, and he can take it out at any time he pleases. He may accept it in satisfaction and take it out, or he may not accept it in satisfaction and may proceed with the action, in which case he may, if he likes, take the money out of court under ord. 22, r. 5, at any time. That power to take it out does not cease because the action has abated. The defendant ceased to have any interest in the money. Ord. 22, r. 5, merely preserved the old practice: Knapton v. Drew, Barnes N. of C. 279; Crockay v. Martin, Barnes N. of C. 281; Archbold's Practice (14th ed.), p. 347. The money became the plaintiff's money subject to be devested by an order of the judge under the last clause of rule 5, as was done in Gray v. Bartholomew. It was paid into court by way of amends to the plaintiff, and it remained in court for that purpose: Berdan v. Greenwood, 26 W. R. 902, 3 Ex. D. 251; Emden v. Carte, 30 W. R. 17, 19 Ch. D. 311; Coughlan v. Morris, 6 L. R. Ir. 403. Even if the money did not become the plaintiff's property when paid into court, it was paid in subject to the provisions of ord. 22, r. 5, which gave the court power to order it to be paid out as it thought right. The court had also inherent jurisdiction to make an order as to the payment out of money in court. In the exercise of its discretion the court would refuse to order the money to be paid to the executors as the plaintiff's right to it, the action being undefended and the defendant having assessed the damages at the sum paid into court, is better than that of the defendant.

R. E. Vaughan Williams replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an action for libel in which a sum of money has been paid into court by the defendant without a denial of liability. The plaintiff did not accept that sum in satisfaction and take it out. While the money was still in court, and before trial, the defendant died, and upon the principle actio personalis moritur cum persona the action is no longer alive. The question therefore arises as to what ought to be done with the money in court. The executors of the defendant have applied by what has been agreed shall be taken to be an originating summons for an order that the money be paid out to them. The judge in chambers refused that order, and the executors now appeal to this court. In my opinion that refusal is right.

The matter lies really in a small compass, though the point is a new one. I do not propose to go into the old law relating to the payment of money into court, nor to the law under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852; I propose to deal solely with the rules made under the Judicature Acts and the present practice which now regulates the matter. Ord. 22, r. 1, provides that "where any action is brought to recover a debt or damages, any defendant may, before or at the time of delivering his defence, or at any later time by leave of the court or a judge, pay into court a sum of money by way of satisfaction, which shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment is made; or he may with a defence denying liability (except in actions or counterclaims for libel or slander) pay money into court which shall be subject to the provisions of rule 6." I do not think that it was disputed, when the case was argued, that if the money is paid in without a denial of liability and the plaintiff takes it out, but not in satisfaction, he is entitled to go on with the action and claim damages ultra. Rule 5 of order 22 made special provision as to what was to be done in the case of money paid into court without a denial of liability—namely, "the money paid into court shall be paid out to the plaintiff on his request, or to his solicitor on the plaintiff's written authority, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order." Now I have no doubt myself but that, if this money had been taken out under that clause of rule 5, the plaintiff would have been entitled to say that the sum was not sufficient to satisfy his claim and to claim damages ultra. In these circumstances we have to consider whether, the defendant having died, the plaintiff is still entitled to take the money out under rule 5. So far as the rules are concerned, in my opinion the plaintiff is not entitled to take it out. It was argued that the moment the money was paid in without a denial of liability, inasmuch as that constituted an admission of the cause of action, and also an admission that the amount paid in was due in respect thereof, the money from that moment became the plaintiff's money, and that the rule which enabled him to take it out was only the necessary consequence of the money having become his money from the moment when it was paid in. There seems to me to be a good deal to be said for that contention, but in my opinion the case of Gray v. Bartholomew shows that it is wrong. That case shows that the money did not become the property of the plaintiff, that he merely got the right under the rule to take it out of court, and that he got nothing more. The head-note in that case states that "in an action for slander the defendant paid £5 into court. The plaintiff recovered a farthing damages, and judgment was entered for the defendant with costs. The judge directed that the money paid into court, less one farthing, should be paid to the defendant. On appeal, held, that the judge had power to make such an order." That decision was inconsistent with the money having become the property of the plaintiff; because it was inconceivable that any court should make an order taking away money from the plaintiff after it had become his property. Lord Esher, after reading the last clause of rule 5 of order 22, said: "The meaning of that is that the court or a judge may order that it shall not be paid to the plaintiff. To whom, then, is it to be paid? It must be paid either to the plaintiff or to the defendant, and if it is not paid to one, it must ex necessitate rei be paid to the other. It seems to me that ord. 22, r. 5, was passed for the express purpose of giving the judge, in certain cases, power to deal with money paid in by the defendant, and that it gave jurisdiction to the judge in this case to make the order appealed against." It seems to me that in the present case the court must take it that, if the case had been tried, the judge who tried it would have had power to order the money to be paid out. I do not think that that power is one which necessarily must be exercised under the rules. In my opinion when money is paid into court the judge has power to say what should be done with it, when the power given to him by the rules is exhausted. What, then, should the court now say should be done with the money? We must see whether there is any reason why one should get it more than the other. The plaintiff was entitled to say that his cause of action was admitted and the amount of damages. The defendant was entitled to say that the money was his money, and that the cause of action was now dead, and that therefore the money should be returned to him. In my opinion the latter is not a sufficient reason. Primâ facie the right thing to do is to order the money to be paid out to the plaintiff, his cause of action being admitted by the defendant, and the amount of the damages. The appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the plaintiff is entitled to an order for payment of the money out of court to him under ord. 22, r. 5. This, to my mind, is plain from the observations of Thesiger, L.J., in Berdan v. Greenwood, and of all the judges in Emden v. Carte, upon the rules which were then in force, and which upon this point are similar to those now in force. The words at the end of rule 5 were doubtless inserted to prevent injustice while the action is pending. The defendant's personal representatives were no parties to the action, and could not have been made parties. Upon the death of the defendant, the action having thereby come to an end, they applied for an order that the money should be paid out of court to them. It is unnecessary to decide whether the plaintiff could take the money out of court without an order. It seems to me that the court has jurisdiction to order the money to be paid out. Wright v. Mitchell, 18 Ves. 293, is an authority that the court has such jurisdiction. There, after a bill had been dismissed for want of prosecution, an application was made for an order that the money which had been paid into court should be paid out, and the Lord Chancellor made the order. In Wynne v. Jackson, 2 Russ. 351, at p. 355, the Lord Chancellor said: "If a bill is dismissed where money has been brought into court by the plaintiff, the court must part with the money to some one or other." That reasoning appears to me to apply where the action is at an end by the death of the defendant In those circumstances we have, in my opinion, jurisdiction to make an order in favour of the executors. But they must show some reason why the plaintiff should be deprived of the money, and they have shown none, except that the action is at an end.

MOULTON, L.J., agreed.

*Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Churchman & Winser, for G. H. Hindley, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the executors, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Pinsent & Co., Birmingham.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 1.

In re EDWARDS. JONES v. JONES. (a.)

Will—Construction—Gift to class attaining twenty-one—Gift over in the event of death without leaving any children surviving—Death of surviving child in infancy—Vested or contingent gift—Intestacy.

A testatrix by her will gave all her property in trust for her children, who, being sons, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry under that age. In the event of her death "without leaving any children surviving" her, she gave the property to her brothers and sisters. The testatrix left one child surviving her who died an infant.

* An order was made by consent that the money should be paid out to the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the infant child did not take a vested interest at birth, and that, there being no reason for construing the words "without leaving any children" as meaning "without leaving any such children," the gift over also failed, and there was an intestacy.

Kidman v. Kidman, 40 L. J. Ch. 359, 19 W. R. Dig. 125, dissented from on the second point.

This was an appeal from the decision of Buckley, J.

Elizabeth Edwards made her will dated the 20th of December, 1902, in numbered paragraphs.

Paragraph 3: "I give all my property, both real and personal, to my trustees in trust for my children or child who being sons shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters shall attain that age or marry, and if more than one in equal shares."

Paragraph 4: "In the event of my death without leaving any children surviving me, I give all my property equally between my brothers and sisters—namely, Peter Evan Jones, William Thomas Jones, Margaret Sarah Jones, and Agnes Ada Luff, in equal shares as tenants in common."

The testatrix left one child only surviving her, who died an infant.

She left both real and personal property.

Buckley, J., held that, having regard to the gift over in clause 4, the infant child who survived took a life interest.

The heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the testatrix appealed.

On the appeal two questions were argued: First, whether the decision of Buckley, J., was right in holding that the infant child took a vested interest at birth; and secondly, if not, whether the gift over to the brothers and sisters took effect in the events that had happened, or whether there was an intestacy.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Cruickshank, for the appellants.

Astbury, K.C., and P. F. Wheeler, for the husband of testatrix.

J. W. Greig, for the brothers and sisters.

The following cases were cited: In re Bevan's Trusts, 35 W. R. 400, 34 Ch. D. 716; Ingram v. Suckling, 7 W. R. 386; Bree v. Perfect, 1 Coll. 128; In re Wrangham's Trust, 9 W. R. 156, 1 Dr. & Sm. 358; Kidman v. Kidman, 40 L. J. Ch. 359, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 125; Walker v. Mower, 16 Beav. 365.

ROMER, L.J.—On the first point involved in this appeal—namely, whether the gift in clause 3 of the will is or is not contingent—speaking for myself, I cannot say that I feel any doubt whatever. The words are perfectly clear; there is no possible ambiguity about them. The very essence of the gift is that only those children shall take who being sons attain twenty-one, or being daughters attain that age or marry. No other gift is contemplated. Then, when I come to clause 4, how can that be said to throw any light on the preceding gift, or to make that ambiguous which was perfectly clear? Clause 4, in my opinion, casts no light on the preceding gift, which was clear; it did not make that ambiguous which was clear before, and the testatrix's words in both clauses are, as I have shown, perfectly clear, simple, and free from doubt. There have been cases, no doubt, where you have had, first, a gift in language which is not perfectly clear, or might not be held in certain cases to be perfectly clear, whether it intended to make a gift to a class contingent or not. A gift to children as and when they shall attain twenty-one, though primâ facie meaning a gift to children contingently upon their attaining twenty-one, may be said to be words of a character that may have light thrown upon them by the words of a gift over on the parent dying without leaving any children; though speaking for myself, I think at the present time the decision in In re Wrangham's Trusts, followed as it was—and I think rightly followed on this part of the case—in Kidman v. Kidman by Malins, V.C., accurately represents the law even as to those cases, though there are, no doubt, earlier authorities, and there may be one or two since which conflict with that view. Speaking for myself, I think that, even where you have words such as those I have referred to, which primâ facie import contingency, though they are somewhat ambiguous you will not turn them into non-contingent words and make gifts to the children vest at birth merely because you have a gift over on the parent dying without children or without issue. But whether those authorities are in doubt at the present day or not, they would not, to my mind, apply to the will before us. For the reasons which I have given, therefore, I think the decision of the learned judge in this case, on the main part of the will, was erroneous and should be reversed.

Then comes the second point, about which the authorities are not quite so clear—that is to say, whether, in the gift over in the will before us, in the event of the testatrix's death without leaving any children surviving her, we ought to read the words as meaning "without leaving any such children surviving her"—in other words, convert it into a gift over to the brothers and sisters in case there should be no child of the testatrix who attained a vested interest under the prior gift. As to that, speaking for myself, I am strongly of opinion that when you have clear words used by a testator, those words ought to be adhered to, unless there is something in the context which shows that a contrary effect ought to be given. I find here clear words. The words are "In the event of my death without leaving any children surviving me." Those words are free from ambiguity, and I see nothing in this will which would enable me to say that those words ought not to be adhered to. It is said that the court leans against an intestacy. I do not know whether that expression at the present day means anything more than this—that in cases of ambiguity the court may, at any rate in certain wills, gather an intention that the testator did not intend to die intestate; but it cannot be that, merely with a view to avoiding intestacy, the court is to do otherwise than construe plain words according to their plain meaning. A testator may well intend to die intestate. When he makes a will he intends to die testate only so far as he has expressed himself in his will. Therefore, unless I were forced by authority in the present case to hold otherwise, I should hold that the words "without leaving any children surviving me" mean what they say.

Now, do the authorities compel us to hold the contrary? I think not. I need only refer to a few. As far as I can find the only authority in support of the view that the words are not to have their literal meaning here is that of Kidman v. Kidman, a decision of Malins, V.C. In giving that decision the Vice-Chancellor based his decision on what he appears to have thought had been decided by Kindersley, V.C., in In re Wrangham's Trust. I turn to In re Wrangham's Trust, and when I look at it I find that Malins, V.C., has misinterpreted what Kindersley, V.C., said in In re Wrangham's Trust. What Kindersley, V.C., really said appears at p. 362 of the report of the case in 1 Dr. & Sm., and he points out that the object of a similar gift in the will with which he had to deal was not what Malins, V.C., thought he meant, but quite the contrary. The words I refer to are these, on p. 362, where Kindersley, V.C., said: "The object of that clause" (that is, the gift over) "was to provide for the event of one or more children attaining twenty-one in the life of their mother, and all of them and all her issue predeceasing her." That is to say, he thought the gift over in that case, being a gift over on the lady dying without leaving any issue, meant what is said, without leaving any issue at her death, and therefore Malins, V.C., quite misunderstood what Kindersley, V.C., decided, and in fact erroneously interpreted Kindersley, V.C.'s, real meaning. Kindersley, V.C.'s, view was to the opposite effect. Then I find in Walker v. Mower a decision of Lord Romilly, where he decided the exact point. Incidentally I may say that he decided both the points which arise in this appeal. In that case there was a gift to A. for life with a provision that after A.'s death the property should be assured equally between A.'s children on their respectively attaining twenty-one, with a gift over on A.'s death without leaving any child. The Master of the Rolls first held that the gift to the children was contingent, and then, with regard to the gift over, he said this: "As to the gift over, I am of opinion that it did not take effect, because the tenant for life did not die without leaving any child, the deceased leaving a daughter. There is therefore an intestacy, and the moiety of the freeholds goes to the heir, and of the leasholds to the next-of-kin." Therefore, as the authorities stand on the point, we have the Master of the Rolls and Kindersley, V.C., on the one hand, and Malins, V.C., on the other, relying on a misinterpretation of Kindersley, V.C. The effect of the authorities is to support the view I am now expressing—namely, that in the present case the words on which the question turns, being plain in meaning, must have due effect given to them.

The only other authority I need refer to is one which has been supplied by my brother Cozens-Hardy, L.J., a case of In re Hamlet, Stephen v. Cunningham, 37 W. R. 245, 39 Ch. D. 426. There the gift over was in this form: There was a gift to a daughter for life, then to her children, like the gift here—that is to say, on sons attaining twenty-one or daughters on attaining that age or marrying. The gift over was this: "And in case my said daughter shall happen to die without leaving any child or children her surviving, or leaving such they shall all die without having attained a vested interest in the said trust moneys, and without leaving any issue them, him, or her surviving," then over. The Court of Appeal declined to give to that gift over anything but the effect that ought to be given to it according to its plain words. As Lopes, L.J., points out, in a form which summed up the matter, and which I may here cite: "If the intention of the testator was that every child of his daughter who attained twenty-one should take a vested interest, absolute and indefeasible, though such child should die in the daughter's lifetime, then to make the gift over consistent with that intention, it would be necessary to substitute the word 'having' for 'leaving' and to attach no meaning to the words 'her surviving.' This would be doing a violence to the language which nothing would warrant but a clear and unmistakeable intention collected from the other parts of the will, and such an intention to my mind is not apparent upon the face of this will." Likewise I say here the words of the gift over of this testatrix in the event of her death "without leaving any children surviving" her are clear, and to depart from them would be doing a violence to the language which nothing can warrant but a clear and unmistakable intention collected from the other parts of the will, and such an intention cannot be gathered from this will. For these reasons I am of opinion that the gift over did not take effect.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion I am quite unable to follow the view of Buckley, J., that the children took vested interests at birth. I cannot imagine a more clear contingent gift than that which is found in clause 3, and, for the reasons which have been stated by Romer, L.J., I can find nothing in the context which suffices to turn that which is a clear contingent gift into a gift which would vest in all the children who survived the testatrix, whatever their age might be. I think that a contrary view would not be without danger, having regard to the fact that the form of gift which you find in clause 3 is one of the commonest possible forms in all wills and settlements where parents are giving or settling money on their children—sons at twenty-one, and daughters at twenty-one or marriage. I think, therefore, that the infant who survived its mother for only a few hours did not take a vested interest at birth.

On the second point, whether there is an intestacy altogether, or whether the gift over which is found in clause 4 is operative, there is no doubt rather more difficulty; but I feel myself quite unable to get over the strength of the words "surviving me," and I think the only safe course is to read that clause literally and as it stands. That being so, the event has not happened on which, and on which alone, anything is given to the testatrix's brothers and sisters. The result is that the declaration of the learned judge should be reversed, and it must be declared that there is an intestacy; and, I suppose, the costs of all parties here and below will come out of the estate.

COLLINS, M.R.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Schultz & Son, for Gwilym James, Charles, & Davies, Merthyr Tydvil; F. Kinch, for Lloyd & Pratt, Newport, Mon.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. March 27.

BARRY v. SMART. (a.)

Inland revenue—Husband and wife—Deed of separation—Alimony—Deduction of income tax—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 102.

Where a wife is entitled under a deed of separation to an annuity by way of alimony, the husband may deduct income tax in respect of the annuity.

Warren v. Warren, 43 W. R. 490, followed.

Adjourned summons.

This case was commenced by originating summons taken out by the plaintiff, Mrs. Katherine Vincent Mayell Barry, on the 8th of July, 1905, for the determination (inter alia) of the following question: whether income tax could be deducted by her husband, James Hewitt Barry, from the payments made by him to the plaintiff under a deed of separation dated the 24th of March, 1903.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants were the said J. H. Barry and Frederick Bertram Smart and Walter Samuel Simpson, the trustees of the said deed of separation.

The said F. B. Smart and W. S. Simpson appeared separately.

The facts were as follows:

On the 19th of July, 1900, the plaintiff presented a petition for the dissolution of her marriage with the defendant J. H. Barry, and for the custody of the seven children, issue of the marriage.

When this petition was in the paper for hearing, and was about to be heard, the plaintiff and the defendant J. H. Barry agreed upon a deed of separation dated the 26th of November, 1901, whereby the late Mr. F. A. Inderwick, K.C., was appointed arbitrator, and it was (inter alia) referred to him to decide what provision ought, under the circumstances of the case, to be made by the defendant J. H. Barry in respect of (a) the allowance to be paid by him to the plaintiff, and for what period or periods, by way of alimony or maintenance; (b) the allowance to be paid by him to the plaintiff, and for what period or periods, for the maintenance, education, and support of the children of the marriage.

After a long investigation, Mr. Inderwick made his award on the 10th of October, 1902. By this award the defendant J. H. Barry was to pay to the plaintiff for her life by way of alimony or maintenance the sum of £450 per annum payable quarterly in advance, in addition to a sum of £150 then already secured to her by an indenture dated the 12th of March, 1900, and he was also to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £40 per annum payable quarterly in advance in respect of each son until he should attain the age of twenty-one, and in respect of each daughter until she should attain the age of twenty-one or marry.

The deed necessary to carry out the terms of this award was afterwards settled by Mr. Inderwick, and was executed on the 24th of March, 1903, the defendants F. B. Smart and W. S. Simpson being appointed trustees.

Mr. Inderwick died on the 16th of August, 1904.

Until October, 1904, the defendant J. H. Barry paid to the plaintiff the various sums mentioned above in full without making any deduction for income tax, but by a letter dated the 5th of October, 1904, the defendant F. B. Smart intimated to the defendant W. S. Simpson that the annuity of £450 would not in future be paid in full, but that income tax would be deducted therefrom. There was some correspondence on the subject between the parties, and finally the plaintiff issued the summons as stated above.

There was nothing to show whether Mr. Inderwick had intended that this payment should be made in full or whether he had intended that income tax should be deducted therefrom.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Beddall, for the plaintiff.—Where the Divorce Court orders alimony to be paid by a husband to his wife, it is the practice of that court in estimating the net income of the husband in order to arrive at the amount of alimony to be paid by him, to deduct income tax and outgoings. The alimony is, therefore, usually payable in full: Frankfort v. Frankfort, 4 Notes of Cases, 280.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and E. Ford, for the defendant J. H. Barry.—This case comes directly within the case of Warren v. Warren. It is the general practice that, where alimony is allowed, income tax can be deducted: Pemberton v. Pemberton, 2 Notes of Cases, 17. In Frankfort v. Frankfort it was proved that income tax had been deducted from the husband's income in order to arrive at the amount he should pay by way of alimony. There is nothing to show that the arbitrator had done so in this case. The husband is clearly entitled to deduct income tax under section 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842.

Cozens-Hardy, for the defendant F. B. Smart.

Norman, for the defendant W. S. Simpson.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, said: By the deed of the 24th of March, 1903, Mr. Barry covenanted with the trustees that he should pay to them during the lifetime of the plaintiff the sum of £450 per annum in addition to the £150. There can be no question that the £150 was payable after deducting income tax. The £450 is directly covered by Warren v. Warren. In that case the judge regarded it as a contract apart from the practice of any court, and held that the payment was subject to the deduction of income tax. In Pemberton v. Pemberton Dr. Lushington held that income tax must be deducted. In Frankfort v. Frankfort the point was gone into very fully, but under entirely different circumstances. In that case the payments were made under an order of the court. In this case the payments are made by virtue of a contract, and section 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, provides that annual sums payable under a contract are liable to deduction for income tax. The £450 per annum must therefore be paid less income tax, so far as the payments not yet made.

The trustees, although they appear separately, can only be allowed one set of costs as between party and party.

Solicitors for the plaintiff and the defendant W. S. Simpson, Booth & Smee.

Solicitors for the defendant J. H. Barry, Harcourt, Sons, & Rolt.

Solicitors for the defendant F. B. Smart, Cox & Lafone.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } March 30.

In re SMITH, DECEASED.
SMITH v. DODSWORTH (a.)

Will—Annuitant—Tenant for life and remainderman—Capital or income—Charges in respect of compensation fund—Licensing Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 23), s. 3.

Where part of a trust estate under a will consists of freehold beerhouses with on-licences, on which annual charges are imposed in respect of the compensation fund under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1904, and by reason of the deduction by the tenants from their rents of the proper proportion of such charges, the income of the trust estate becomes insufficient to pay in full an annuitant under the will, such annuitant is not entitled to have any part of such charges paid out of capital, but they must be borne by the income of the estate.

Adjourned summons.

By his will dated the 12th of March, 1892, the testator, John Francis Smith, thereby appointed the plaintiff Ann Smith and the defendants John Francis Cook and John William Harrison executors and trustees thereof, and made certain pecuniary and specific bequests and devised and bequeathed all the rest of his personal estate and all his real estate to his trustees upon trust to permit his wife during widowhood to have the enjoyment of his household effects and to occupy rent free his then present residence, and upon trust to pay her out of the income of his trust estate, during her widowhood, an annuity of £200, and to accumulate any balance of such income for the purpose of reducing the incumbrances on his real estate, but with full power to resort to such accumulations for the purpose of repairs or insurance, or otherwise, incurred in connection with his estate or for making up the said annuity as his trustees should see fit, and upon the marriage again or death of his wife, upon trust as to all his trust estate for his three daughters in equal shares.

(a.) Reported by P. W. PEGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The will contained a direction that his wife during widowhood should have the management of his real estate, and the collection of the rents, and the payment of all interest, and the sole discretion as to the repair and insurance thereof. And he empowered his trustees to sell his real estate when it should, in his trustees' discretion, be to the advantage of his estate.

The testator died on the 11th of March, 1896.

The testator's real estate consisted of several small freeholds, including three beerhouses with on-licences, situate at Kingston-upon-Hull, known respectively as the Drum Inn, the Clarence Inn, and the South Myton Tavern.

The Drum Inn was in lease to a tenant for a term which at the date of the action had two years unexpired, at an annual rent of £35. The Clarence Inn was in lease to a tenant for a term which at the date of the action had three years unexpired, at an annual rent of £35. The South Myton Tavern was in lease to a tenant for a term which at the date of the action had three and a-half years unexpired, at an annual rent of £50.

The total rent received in respect of the said three beerhouses amounted, therefore, to £120 per annum.

In the year 1905 the justices in quarter sessions imposed charges towards the compensation fund under section 3, sub-section 1, of the Licensing Act, 1904, in respect of the said three beerhouses, as follows—namely, £4 8s. 4d. on the Drum Inn, £7 12s. on the Clarence Inn, and £11 8s. on the South Myton Tavern.

The total amount payable in respect of the said charges for the year 1905 amounted, therefore, to £23 8s. 4d., and the respective tenants thereupon deducted a proper proportion thereof from their rents in pursuance of section 3, sub-section 3, of the above Act, which provides that the licence-holders may deduct a certain percentage of the charge from their rent as set forth in the second schedule thereto.

The income of the trust estate not being sufficient to pay the widow's annuity of £200, she issued this summons against the other trustees of the said will, and her three daughters, who were entitled to the corpus in remainder on her death or remarriage, to have it determined: (1) Whether the amounts deducted by the respective lessees of the beerhouses respectively known as the Clarence Inn, the South Myton Tavern, and the Drum Inn, situate at Kingston-upon-Hull (forming part of the testator's residuary estate), on account of the charges payable under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1904, in respect of the existing on-licences of the same premises, ought to be borne and raised wholly or in part by and out of the capital of the said estate by way of exoneration of the income thereof; (2) whether the annuity of £200 payable to the plaintiff under the said will is charged upon the corpus as well as the income of the testator's residuary estate.

Nash, for the plaintiff, did not contend that the widow's annuity was charged upon capital having regard to Stelfox v. Sugden, John. 234, and Foster v. Smith, 1 Ph. 629. The charges imposed on the premises under the Act of 1904 ought to be paid first out of the rent, and then the tenant for life is entitled to be recouped the whole or a proportionate part thereof out of the capital. The income not being sufficient to meet the annuity, the plaintiff is in the position of a tenant for life. The charge is analogous to an insurance against fire, and a tenant for life, whether legal or equitable, is not bound to insure freeholds. It is not an ordinary outgoing. The Act has thrown the charge upon the rent in the first instance, but that does not determine the ultimate incidence of the charge. The tenant for life could not receive any part of the compensation money—that is, capital. It is a payment for the preservation of the property: Dent v. Dent, 30 Beav. 363. It is analogous to the case of drainage expenses required to be done under some Act: In re Barney, 43 W. R. 105, [1894] 3 Ch. 562; In re Farnham, [1904] 2 Ch. 561.

Martelli, for the defendant trustees and two of the daughters entitled in remainder.—No part of the charges deducted under the Act ought to be paid out of capital. This is not strictly a case of tenant for life and remainderman. The plaintiff practically argues that the income should be not only the actual rent received from the tenants, but in addition a sum taken each year from capital. It is an annually recurring charge payable by the licence-holder, and not a capital charge. It is not an insurance for the benefit of this particular property.

Galbraith for a person entitled in remainder.—The capital will really get no benefit from the charges under the Act: In re Crawley, 28 Ch. D. 431.

Nash, in reply.—This case is analogous to a payment made by a tenant for life in keeping up a life policy: In re Morley, 44 W. R. 140, [1895] 2 Ch. 738.

SWINFEN EADY, J., after stating the facts, said: It is to be observed that the trustees were to pay the yearly sum "out of the income of the trust estate." I think it is clear, on the construction of the will, if the matter depended on that alone, that all the widow is entitled to is a yearly sum of £200 out of the income of the trust estate; the annuity is payable out of the income only, and is not charged upon capital. The will does not contain any provision for payment of a deficit out of capital, or for augmenting the income by any sum to be raised thereout. There is nothing within the four corners of the will to enable the widow to throw any part of the charge upon capital. So if the application is to succeed it must be by reason of something to be found in the Act, or in the ordinary rules applicable to such a case. The Act of 1904 rather contemplates that the charge will be borne by the persons entitled to the income, because, after providing by section 3, sub-section 1, that quarter sessions shall in each year impose those charges for the purposes of the Act, unless they certify that it is unnecessary to do so in any year, it enacts by sub-section 2 that they shall be levied and paid together with and as part of the duties on the corresponding excise licence; so the result is that the tenant has to pay them, together with the ordinary excise licence, and unless he pays the two amounts he does not often obtain the excise licence. Then sub-section 3 provides that such deductions from rent as are set out in the second schedule may be made by any licence-holder who pays a charge under section 3, and also by any person from whose rent such a deduction is made.

The result is that a proportion of the charge, varying with the length of the tenancy, may be deducted by the licence-holder from his rent, and if his landlord is himself a lessee he also may make a deduction; so that the incidence of the sums deducted is to fall on the person ultimately receiving rent for the premises, and the sums charged form a fund out of which compensation is to be paid in cases where licences are not renewed.

The Act contains no provision under which any part of the charge may be thrown on capital. The nature of the charge seems more akin to income than capital. It is an annual charge, and not like one for improvements made once for all; it is to be made every year, unless certified to be unnecessary; and it is coupled with the excise duty, and is to be levied and paid as part of that duty. It bears no analogy to cases where money is paid by way of salvage, or an outlay is made for capital improvements. It is much more in the nature of an annual charge, and if the argument is well founded that it is to be regarded as a premium paid for insurance, then it is much more proper to be regarded as an annual outgoing than as a charge to be raised and paid out of capital.

None of the authorities which have been cited afford any assistance, except In re Crawley, and like that I think this is a case where the Legislature has provided the way in which the charge is to be borne. There is nothing in the will or in the statute or general law to relieve the widow from bearing it, or to entitle her to come and say that the income of the trust estate is to be notionally increased by treating as part of it those sums which have been deducted from the rents before they were paid. I decide, therefore, that the annuitant is not entitled to have all or any part of the annual charge raised and paid out of the capital of the trust estate.

Solicitors, Rollit, Sons, & Burroughs, for Thompson, Cook, & Babington, Hull; H. Davey Turner.

Chan. Div. Warrington, J. } May 7.

BLAIBERG v. KEEVES. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Particulars of sale—Misrepresentation—Conditions of sale—Title—Enlargement of long term into freehold—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 65 (1).

A vendor of property, where he has reasonable grounds for so stating, is entitled to describe in the particulars of sale the property as being held on a particular tenure, and in the conditions of sale to limit the proof of title which the purchaser might otherwise require.

Torrance v. Bolton, 21 W. R. 134, L. R. 14 Eq. 124, 8 Ch. 118, distinguished.

Action.

This was an action by a purchaser for the recovery of a deposit paid on the signature of the contract for the purchase of certain property, upon the grounds that the purchaser was induced to enter into the agreement by the misrepresentation of the defendant and was entitled to have the contract rescinded.

The property was originally held under a lease for 500 years granted in 1672 by the then lord of the manor of Stebunheath, alias Stepney, reserving the yearly rent of one shilling.

No rent had been paid for many years, and in 1902 a deed-poll was executed under section 65 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, purporting to enlarge the leasehold interest into a fee simple.

The property was then offered for sale by auction, and Lot 3, which was the property in question, was described as "an eligible freehold investment comprising a capital house and shop situate and being No. 249, Whitechapel-road."

The fifth condition of sale was as follows: "The property comprised in Lot 3 was formerly held with other property under an indenture of lease dated the 31st of January, 1672, for the term of 500 years at the yearly rent of one shilling, but the property was assigned in the year 1828 free from the said rent, which has never been paid by the vendor, and the purchaser shall assume that the said rent has been released and is not now charged upon the property sold. By a deed-poll in 1902, under the provisions of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, the property was expressed to be enlarged by the beneficial owner into a fee simple. No objection or requisition shall be made on account of the lease dated the 31st of January, 1672, or a copy thereof not being forthcoming, or as to the contents thereof or the identity of the parcels or otherwise in relation thereto, and it shall be assumed that the said deed-poll operated as an effectual enlargement according to its tenor."

The plaintiff read the particulars of sale, but not the conditions, and, relying upon the statement in the particulars of sale, bought Lot 3, and paid a deposit of £242 10s.

Jenkins, K.C., and W. M. Spence, for the plaintiff.

Upjohn, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the defendant.

WARRINGTON, J., after stating the facts, continued: The question whether the property was freehold would depend upon whether the deed-poll of 1902 was effectual under the statute to enlarge the term into freehold. Section 65, sub-section 1, of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, provides: "Where a residue unexpired of not less than 200 years of a term, which, as originally created, was for not less than 300 years, is subsisting in land, whether being the whole land originally comprised in the term, or part only thereof, without any trust or right of redemption affecting the term in favour of the freeholder or other person entitled in reversion expectant on the term and without any rent, or with merely a peppercorn rent or other rent having no money value incident to the reversion, or having had a rent not being merely a peppercorn rent or other rent having no money value, originally so incident, which subsequently has been released, or has become barred by lapse of time, or has in any other way ceased to be payable, then the term may be enlarged into a fee simple in the manner and subject to the restrictions in this section provided." I assume the rent of one shilling is a rent having a money value and is not barred by lapse of time As far as the effect of the deed of 1902 is concerned, the question resolves itself whether the rent had been released prior to this deed. The vendor being in the difficulty of having no evidence of actual release inserts in the contract certain provisions. Now were these particulars and conditions misleading? I think the plaintiff has not shown that the statement that the property was freehold was false, and it is at least an open question whether in fact there had been a release or not.

(a.) Reported by L. T. FORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

All that the defendant did was to describe the property as being held on a particular tenure, which he believed reasonably on sufficient grounds might be the true tenure; but having a difficulty in proving the freehold tenure, he then in the conditions of sale imposes on the purchaser the burden of assuming certain facts. Thus stated, the case comes within the principles of In re Sandbach and Edmondson's Contract, 39 W. R. 193, [1891] 1 Ch. 99. In Torrance v. Bolton, 21 W. R. 134, L. R. 14 Eq. 124, 8 Ch. App. 118, the particulars of sale described the property as an immediate absolute reversion. The conditions there pointed out that the reversion was subject to certain incumbrances, and the purchaser was to take a conveyance subject to these incumbrances. Both before Malins, V.C., and in the Court of Appeal it was held that the purchaser was entitled to recover the deposit paid. The Court of Appeal decided that the vendor was not entitled to correct by the conditions a false statement in the particulars of sale. The purchaser was not bound to look at the conditions to correct a statement in the particulars.

The present case is distinguishable from Torrance v. Bolton. Here the property was described as freehold, which may or may not be true. Whether it was or not was a question of title only. It was not the function of the particulars to deal with such a question, but it was the function of the conditions to state what evidence of title the purchaser was to have.

The defendant therefore was entitled to describe the property in the particulars as freehold, and in the conditions to state what facts the purchaser should accept as proved, and upon these facts should accept the statement made in the particulars as true. The action therefore fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Action dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Pedley, May, & Fletcher.

Solicitors for the defendant, Bolton & Co.

Chan. Div.
Warrington, J. } March 6, 7.

DAWSON v. ISLE. (a.)

Bill of exchange—Indorsement to bank for purpose of discount—Property in bill—Bill receivable whether a book debt—Debts omitted from books—Whether book debts.

The property in a bill of exchange, indorsed to a bank for the purpose of being discounted, does not pass to the bank before it has been actually discounted and the amount credited to the account of the customer.

Giles v. Perkins, 9 East 12, followed; Ex parte Schofield, In re Firth, 27 W. R. 925, 12 Ch. D. 337, distinguished.

Until this has been done it remains a "bill receivable" in the hands of the customer, and therefore a "book debt" of the customer.

In re Stevens, Stevens v Keilly, (1888) W. N. 110, and correction at p. 116, followed.

"Book debts" may include debts omitted from the books, but which should have been entered in the ordinary course of trade.

(a.) Reported by E. WAVELL RIDGES Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Special case.

This was a special case stated by the referee appointed by the court in an action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of certain shares in a tannery company, and the questions to be determined were (inter alia): (1) Whether a bill of exchange indorsed to their bank by the company for the purpose of discounting, but not actually discounted until after the date of the contract, was to be regarded as a book debt of the company at the time when the contract was entered into? (2) Whether certain debts due to the company at the time when the contract was entered into, but not actually appearing in their books, were to be regarded as book debts of the company for the purposes of the contract?

By a contract in writing, dated the 27th of February, 1905, the plaintiff agreed to sell, and the defendant to buy, 15,000 preference shares and 1,000 ordinary shares in the Meersbrook Tannery (Limited) at the price to be fixed as therein mentioned. Clause 2 of the agreement provided that the price to be paid for the shares was to include (inter alia) "the amount of the book debts due to the company (less the discounts), such debts to be taken as good at the amounts standing in the company's books," with the exception of certain specified debts.

On the 3rd of May, 1905, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming specific performance of the agreement of the 27th of February, 1905, and all necessary accounts and inquiries.

The action came on for trial on the 31st of July, 1905, and an order was made by consent declaring that "the book debts in the pleadings mentioned which are to be valued do not include the bank balance (if any) or the cash in hand."

By the same order it was directed that the whole action should be referred to some person as therein described "to determine the amount to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff under the agreement of the 27th of February, 1905."

In ascertaining the amount to be paid under the agreement before the referee, the plaintiff sought to bring into account as part of the book debts due to the company a bill of exchange for £600, which the company had received in the ordinary way of trade for goods sold and delivered. This bill was indorsed by the company and handed to their bank on the 22nd of February, 1905, it being the custom of the bank to discount bills handed to them by the company in the ordinary course of business. The bank subsequently discounted the bill, and on the 28th of February, 1905, credited the amount of the bill to the company's account in their bank pass book, and debited the account on the same date with the discounting charges.

The plaintiff also claimed to bring into account certain debts due to the company, but not actually appearing in their books at the date of the agreement.

These claims being disputed by the defendant, the following questions (inter alia) were stated by the referee for the opinion of the court:

(1) Should the bill of exchange for £600 be treated for the purposes of the said agreement as a book debt standing in the books of the company and brought into account in ascertaining the amount of the said purchase-money, or as part of the bank balance to the credit of the company's account on the 27th of February, 1905, which by the said order is not to be included in the book debts?

(2) Is the plaintiff entitled, having regard to the terms of clause 2 of the said agreement, to claim as book debts due to the company debts which may be found due to the company on the 27th of February, 1905, but do not appear in the company's books?

Cave, K.C., and Hollis Walker (C. E. Dyer with him), for the plaintiff.—By the mere fact of indorsement the property in the bill did not pass to the bank. The bank did not agree to discount the bill until the 28th of February, the day following the date of the agreement, and until the bill was discounted it remained the property of the company: Giles v. Perkins, 9 East 12. That being so, the bill was a "bill receivable" in the hands of the company, and therefore a book debt of the company on the authority of In re Stevens, Stevens v. Keilly, (1888) W. N. 110, and correction at p. 116.

H. Terrell, K.C., and Greig, for the defendant.—The property in the bill passed to the bank by indorsement, and to hold otherwise would be directly in the teeth of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Schofield, In re Firth, 27 W. R. 925, 12 Ch. D. 337. The property in the bill having passed to the bank it could no longer be a book debt of the company, and therefore could not be included in the price to be paid for the shares as ascertained under the agreement. Further, the company treated the amount of the bill as cash in their books at the date when the bill was handed to the bank; it would therefore come under the category of "cash in hand or at the bank"; and by the terms of the consent order made in the action should not be included in the purchase price of the shares.

WARRINGTON, J., after stating the facts as set out above, proceeded: With regard to the bill of exchange for £600 the defendant claims that on the 27th of February, 1900, the amount represented by the bill was "cash in hand" of the company, and therefore, according to the order made by consent in the action, should not be included in the purchase price of the shares. Now, is that the right view? It was said on the defendant's behalf that first the customer would be debited in the company's ledger account with the amount of the debt, and that then he would be credited with the amount of the bill. So far an end is put to the debt, but does not the debt on the bill itself still remain? And would not the bill itself still be treated as a "bill receivable" by the company? In re Stevens, Stevens v. Keilly is an authority for the proposition that a "bill receivable" is a "book debt," and as such it would be a substitution for the debt in the ledger account. Now prior to the 27th of February the bill was handed to the company's bankers (I will assume from what is stated by the special case to have been the custom of the firm, though it was not actually so stated) for the purpose of being discounted; but on the 27th of February it was not actually discounted. Was this bill at that date a debt due to the company or to the banker? In Giles v. Perkins the head-note is to the following effect: "A customer paying bills not due into his bankers in the country, whose custom it was to credit their customers for the amount of such bills, if approved, as cash (charging interest), is entitled to recover back such bills in specie from the bankers becoming bankrupt; the balance of his cash account independent of such bills being in his favour at the time of the bankruptcy." That case was stronger in favour of the banker than this, because there the customer was credited with the cash by the bank, here the company was not credited until after the date of the agreement. In this case the bill was indorsed (I assume for the purpose of being discounted), and when it was discounted it would have been the property of the banker. Therefore, when the bill was handed to the bank there was a condition attached, and until it was actually discounted the money due on the bill was owing to the company, and therefore a book debt. It was said that the decision in In re Stevens is directly in the teeth of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Schofield, In re Firth. That was a case of bankruptcy, and the head-note states that "bills of exchange indorsed by a customer to his banker in order that they may be discounted, and held by the banker pending discount"—i.e., pending inquiries as to the solvency of the acceptors, the banker meanwhile making some advances to the customer on the credit of the bills, are not securities which the banker, in proving in the customer's bankruptcy for the amount due to him by the customer, is bound to value. The banker is entitled to prove for the full amount due to him, and also to recover what he can from the other parties to the bills, provided that he does not on the whole recover more than 20s. in the pound. The point made on behalf of the defendant was that by indorsement the property in the bill passed to the bank in the case I have just referred to, and therefore that the property in the bill passed by indorsement in this case. But on looking at the case it will be found that the question depends upon whether the bill was handed to the bank as security for money advanced or not. The chief judge says in his judgment at p. 342: "In my opinion these bills are no part of the estate. A man indorses bills to his banker, and says, 'I owe you a good deal of money; you can collect these bills for me and carry them to my account.' Those bills no longer remain part of the customer's estate, so as to deprive the banker of the full title in law and equity which arises out of such transactions between bankers and their customers." Clearly in that case the bill was handed to the bank, not for collection, but as security against money owed to the bank, and that distinguishes it from the present case. The result, then, is that until the bill was discounted the debt upon the bill itself remained the property of the company, and if the debt was the property of the company, it was a book debt, and should be taken into account in ascertaining the price to be paid for the shares under the agreement.

With regard to the debts of the company which did not actually appear in their books at the time when the contract was entered into, it was said that as a matter of law the mere fact of omission does not cause the debt to cease to be a book debt. I think the case of Shipley v. Marshall, 14 C. B. N. S. 566, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 13, is directly in point, and that debts accidentally omitted from the books do not on that account cease to be book debts according to the construction of the agreement. This question ought to go back to the arbitrator to ascertain what were the particular debts owing. The circumstances attaching to the debts may make a great deal of difference as to whether they ought to be regarded as book debts or not.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Andrew Wood, Purves, & Sutton, for Andrew & Thompson, Lincoln.

Solicitors for the defendant, Miller & Smithe, for Clitherow & Son, Horncastle.

K. B. Div. (Buckley, J.) Feb. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 21.

HOBART v SOUTHEND CORPORATION. (a.)

Fishery—Sea—Discharge of sewage—Contamination—Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 49—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 23—Sea Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45)—Sea Fisheries Act, 1888 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 54).

A local sanitary authority has no right, either by common law or under the Public Health Acts, to discharge sewage into the sea so as to cause a nuisance.

An injunction to restrain a discharge of sewage by a local sanitary authority may be granted if the prescriptive rights of householders are not interfered with.

Harrington v. Derby Corporation, [1905] 1 Ch. 205, 53 W. R. Dig. 138, explained.

Action.

The plaintiff was the lessee of a several fishery and had the right to put his oysters on the banks of the river. The defendants were the local sanitary authority of the district, and as such had constructed certain sewage works which discharged into the river, which, being tidal as well as navigable, was for the purpose of this action treated as if it had been the sea. The plaintiff asserted that the defendants' sewage works had contaminated his oyster beds, and he claimed an injunction to restrain the continuance of the nuisance and damages.

On the question of fact the judge found that the plaintiff's oyster beds were contaminated by the sewage discharged by the defendants.

The arguments on the point of law sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Macmorran, K.C., G. A. Scott, and A. W. Atkins, for the plaintiff.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., Montague Lush, K.C., and C. Herbert Smith, for the defendants.

BUCKLEY, J., after dealing with the facts at great length, continued: The defendants, however, have argued that as a matter of law they are entitled to discharge their sewage as they do whether nuisance arises to the plaintiff or not. They say, first, that they have a common law right to do it; and secondly, that if that be not so, they have a statutory right to do it. In my opinion neither proposition is well founded. Is there such a right at law? The plaintiff is entitled to the enjoyment of a several fishery; he has a right to enjoy the land for the purpose of putting oysters there. That right of his on the land is interfered with by nuisance caused by the discharge by the defendants from their pipes of offensive matter in such a way as that it reaches the plaintiff's land. Upon the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands, 1 Ex. 265, 3 H. L. 330, and the decisions upon which that case was founded, the defendants must keep their noxious matter from trespassing upon their neighbour's land. The case of Tennant v. Goldwin, 1 Salk. 21, 360, 2 Ld. Raym. 1089, is an express authority upon this point. The passage from Salkeld which was read seems to me entirely applicable. It runs thus: "It was the defendant's wall and the defendant's filth, and he was bound of common right to keep his wall so as his filth might not damnify his neighbour, and it was a trespass on his neighbour as if his beasts should escape, or one should make a great heap on the border of his ground and it should tumble and roll down upon his neighbour's." The defendants have, I think, no common law right. But if there be no right at law the defendants say that they have a right by statute. For that purpose they refer to section 49 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (Public Health Act, 1848), and argue that if the sea be within 100 feet of the site of a house the owner might under that Act have been called upon to construct a drain into the sea. The Act of 1848 was, however, repealed by the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 23 of the latter Act, in reproducing the substance of section 49 of the former Act, omits all provision as to draining into the sea, while section 27 of the Act of 1875 provides that for the purpose of disposing of sewage the local authority may do certain things; but with this proviso, that no nuisance may be created in the exercise of any of these powers. Any argument based upon the repealed Act of 1848 seems to me, therefore, to be displaced. But the matter does not rest there. By the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45), the property in oysters and mussels is, by section 57, in the owner of the fishery, and by section 53 it is not lawful for any person, other than the grantee, within the limits of a fishery knowingly to disturb or injure in any manner any oyster-bed, and a penalty is imposed for doing the forbidden act. The defendants point to the word "knowingly," and it may be that until this present trial the corporation might be successful in saying that they did not "knowingly" injure the bed by discharging their sewage as they did. But after this trial they would be doing it "knowingly." Further, by the Sea Fisheries Act, 1888 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 54), provision is made for the creation by the Board of Trade of sea fishery districts and for local fishery committees for the regulation of sea fisheries carried on within the district. It is provided by section 2 that a local fisheries committee may, with the confirmation of the Board of Trade, make bye-laws, amongst other things, prohibiting or regulating the deposit or discharge of any solid or liquid substance detrimental to sea fish or sea fishing. The bye-laws may, under section 3, impose penalties. Further, section 6 provides that, for the purpose of enforcing the bye-laws, fishery officials may stop and search vessels and so on, and that for the enforcement of the provisions of the bye-laws the officer shall be deemed a constable. By section 7 a justice of the peace may by warrant authorize a fishery officer to enter and search premises. These provisions show that an act in breach of the bye-laws is an illegal act. The plaintiff's fishery lies in the Kent and Essex sea fisheries district, and within the jurisdiction of the Kent and Essex Sea Fisheries Committee, being a district and a committee constituted under that Act of Parliament. They have made bye-laws which have been properly confirmed by the Board of Trade, and bye-law 15 provides as follows: "The deposit or discharge of any solid or liquid substance detrimental to sea fish or sea fishing is hereby prohibited." Not only, therefore, have the defendants no common law or statutory right to discharge the sewage so as to cause a nuisance, but they are, in my opinion, forbidden to do so by a bye-law properly made under a statute. This bye-law is binding upon the defendants, for they are not within section 13 (c) of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1888. They have no power to discharge sewage given them by a general or local Act of Parliament, or by a provisional order confirmed by Parliament. The local Act which was referred to—namely, the Southend Local Board Act, 1887, s. 5—has no bearing upon the matter. The defence raised upon the point of law fails. In Earl of Harrington v. Corporation of Derby, [1905] 1 Ch. 205, I refused to grant an injunction upon grounds which are there stated at length. Of these the ground which might have been pertinent to the present case is that arising upon prescriptive right in the householders to discharge their sewage into the existing sewers. In this case I think it right—whether a prescriptive right exists in the householders or not—to grant the injunction which in Lord Harrington's case I refused. If prescription had not been abandoned and prescriptive rights enjoyed by the householders had been shown to exist, it does not appear on the facts of this case that an injunction to restrain the defendants from committing a nuisance by pollution of the plaintiff's beds will result in any interference with the rights of any of the householders. The defendants have not shown that, if proper control is maintained as regards the times at which the sewage is discharged, they cannot, without any interruption of the householders' rights of drainage, so discharge the sewage as not to commit a nuisance. In my judgment the plaintiff has proved a nuisance against which he is entitled to an injunction, and I grant an injunction as asked in the claim, limiting it in point of time to the plaintiff's lease. I assess the damages at £1,500, and, as asked by Mr. Macmorran, the costs will be on the higher scale.

(a.) Reported by T. PAKENHAM LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors, W. E. M. Buchanan; Sharp, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for W. H. Snow, Town Clerk, Southend-on-Sea.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) Feb. 14.

DAVIES v. SEISDON UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Assessment—Sewerage board—Value of sewage farm as means of discharging statutory duties.

A sewerage board let a sewage farm to a tenant at a fair rent including an additional sum for the manurial value of the sewage.

Held, that the sum paid by the tenant was the true basis of assessment, and the rating authority was not entitled to take into account in their assessment the annual value of the advantages and facilities accruing to the sewerage board by the user of the farm for the performance of their statutory duties.

Case stated by the quarter sessions for the county of Stafford.

Upon the hearing of an appeal by the quarter sessions against a poor rate made on the 2nd of May, 1904, whereby the appellant was rated in respect of certain hereditaments in the occupation of the appellant in the parish of Kinver, in the Seisdon Union, known as the Whittington Hall Farm, and consisting of land, house, buildings, sewerage works and plant, it was ordered that the gross estimated rental of the farm should be assessed at £479, the rateable value of the agricultural land at £380, and the rateable value of the buildings and other hereditaments, not being agricultural land, at £46, subject to the following case for the opinion of the court.

The Whittington Hall Farm and the houses, buildings, and sewerage works thereon (except a small portion of land in the parish of Wolverley, rated at a rateable value of £2 15s.) are situated within the parish of Kinver and belong to the Upper Stour Valley Main Sewerage Board, which is a sewerage board duly constituted by statute for the purpose of dealing with the sewage of a certain district situate outside the parish of Kinver and the Seisdon Union. For the purposes of carrying out the duties imposed upon them the said sewerage board acquired the Whittington Hall Farm, which farm is let in the manner hereinafter mentioned to the appellant Davies. After the farm was acquired it was converted by the sewerage board into a sewage farm for the purpose of dealing with the sewage of the said district, and for this purpose they laid down and constructed upon the farm, carriers, distributors, catchpits, and sluices, consisting of brick or pipe channels and appliances. The said plant was constructed under and upon the surface of the farm for carrying the sewage from the mains of the sewerage board to suitable places and disposing thereof on the farm. The sewage brought to the farm by the board is distributed upon the farm by means of the said plant, and is there dealt with by the system known as the broad irrigation system. The sewerage board have spent in laying down and equipping the said plant and in making roads on the farms (in addition to the cost of the farm) the sum of £8,962 or thereabouts. They were able to borrow the money at the rate of 3¼ per cent. per annum.

The Whittington Hall Farm contains about 435 acres, and has been let to the appellant by the sewerage board and the former owners for many years. By a lease under seal dated the 16th of March, 1903, the Upper Stour Valley Main Sewerage Board, in consideration of the rent and covenants therein reserved and contained, and on the part of the lessee to be paid, observed, and performed, demised to Edward Davies the Whittington Hall Farm for the term of one year at the rent of £460. The tenant thereby covenanted that he would cultivate the land demised, as a sewerage irrigation farm, and would utilize all the sewage during the tenancy delivered thereon by the board, so that the sewage might be freed from noxious matter and purified by application to the land in such a manner that it might properly be discharged by the lessee into any stream without breach of the law, and would at all times during the term receive and distribute on the land and through a sufficient portion thereof all the sewage which should be delivered on the land by the board, and would keep the board indemnified against all claims and demands made against the board on account of any nuisance caused by the sewage from the time it came upon the land until it was discharged purified into some stream.

By an agreement dated the 27th of February, 1904, the said rent was in March, 1904, increased to the sum of £490 per annum, and subject to that variation the tenancy was continued upon the terms of the said lease so far as the same were applicable to a tenancy from year to year.

The sewerage board are duly rated in respect of the whole of the premises, mains, and works (used in dealing with their sewage) other than the said plant upon the farm.

The sewerage board were at one time rated in respect of the said plant, but on appeal to quarter sessions the rate was amended on the ground that the board were not in occupation of the plant and that the plant was in the occupation of the tenant of the farm. In a subsequent rate the present appellant, as tenant of the farm, was rated separately for the plant under the heading "sewage works and plant" in the sums of £364 gross estimated rental and £291 5s. rateable value as for "buildings and other hereditaments not being agricultural land." But on appeal to the quarter sessions, which was by consent referred to Mr. A. T. Lawrence, K.C., as arbitrator, the said rate was ordered to be amended by striking out the assessment. The sewerage board during the tenancy of the appellant continue to discharge their sewage by means of the said plant on to the said farm, and thereby are enabled to perform their statutory duties. The rent payable under the lease was fixed after negotiation, and is a fair rent for the advantages which the appellant gets under the lease, including the value of the sewage. The rent is more than it would be if the appellant did not get the manurial value of the sewage.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended for the respondents that to assess the appellant on the basis of the actual money paid under the lease was to treat the farm merely as an agricultural holding, and to leave out of account the fact that under the terms of the lease the appellant is bound to so use the farm and by and upon it to give such facilities to the sewerage board as to enable them to carry out their statutory duties, for which facilities they would be willing to pay; that the farm in the hands of the sewerage board would be equal in value to the money paid by the appellant plus the annual value of such facilities; and that in the hands of the tenant the value of the obligation imposed by the lease upon the tenant (which would equal the value of the facilities) must be added to the actual money paid by the appellant for the purpose of arriving at the rateable value of the farm.

The justices held that the actual sum paid by the appellant was the true basis upon which the hereditaments should be rated, and that they ought not to take into account the annual value of the advantages and facilities accruing to the sewerage board in connection with the said plant, and they reduced the rate accordingly.

Glen, K.C. (Disturnal with him), for the appellants, the Seisdon Union.—The justices have confused the value of the tenant's occupation of the land and the value of the land. This land here produces two classes of profits, the profit to the tenant and the profit to the sewerage board. If the justices are right the parish will lose the rateable value of the sewage plant.

He cited Reg. v. Rhymney Railway Co., 17 W. R. 530, L. R. 4 Q. B. 276.

Ryde, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the point which has been raised by Mr. Glen is one which has been negatived by many cases decided over a long period, and to adopt it would be to upset the principles of rating which have now been recognized for certainly a generation. The standard of value as fixed by the Act of 1836 is "the rate at which the same (that is, the hereditament) might reasonably be expected to let from year to year free of all usual tenant's rates and taxes, and to the commutation charge, if any, and deducting therefrom, the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent. In this case it appears that the assessment committee first rated the sewerage board in respect of these mains and carriers and on appeal the quarter sessions decided they were no longer in occupation of them, and that therefore their lessee was the proper person to be rated. Thereupon the next thing done was to rate the lessee at £291, being the annual value of the buildings and hereditaments not agricultural land, which was based upon the capital cost of those conduits and interest thereon. Under no circumstances would that have been the right method of rating, although no doubt capital cost may be a matter to be taken into consideration. That went before A. T. Lawrence, J., and he very properly struck out the assessment. Then the committee appear to have said: "Although we cannot rate the board as occupiers of these mains and carriers, and though we cannot rate the tenant in respect of them, we shall ask to have exactly the same figure added on to the value of the agricultural land." I agree with the contention of counsel that the rent reserved by the lease is in no way conclusive of the amount of rent which the hypothetical tenant was willing to pay. It is only evidence. And it was quite open to the sessions to have found that the real value of the premises was the reserved rent plus the value of the service in receiving the sewage and that consequently something ought to be added to the £490 rent received. If they had said that we should have no right to interfere. Now what have the sessions found They have found that "the rent payable by the appellant under the said lease is a fair rent for the advantages which the appellant gets under the said lease, including the value of the said sewage. The said rent is more than it would be if the appellant did not get the manurial value of the said sewage." In my opinion the sessions have here applied the right test, and I further think they were right in not including any sum in the assessment which represented the annual value to the sewerage board in respect of the facilities afforded to the board to carry out their statutory duties.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellants, Denneson, Horne, & Co., for T. Green, Wolverhampton.

Solicitor for respondent, H. Taylor, Wolverhampton.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) — Jan. 12.

MANSEL v. ITCHEN OVERSEERS. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Demand—Distress warrant.

Upon a summons for non-payment of poor rate the justices are entitled not only to decide what is the amount due, but also, when the amount so found to be due is less than the whole amount of the rate, to issue a distress warrant for the amount found due.

Case stated by justices for the county of Southampton.

The appellant O. L. Mansel was summoned on the 24th of March, 1905, by the overseers for non-payment of a sum of £6 5s. 8d. The following facts were proved at the hearing of the summons:

On the 18th of October, 1904, a poor rate was made for the parish of Itchen for the half-year ending March, 1905, the appellant being rated in a sum of £9 7s. 3d. in respect of the occupation by him of a house and garden, land and buildings, and the above sum of £9 7s. 3d. was duly demanded in November, 1904, but was not paid, and no further demand in respect of that rate was at any time made.

The appellant, who had ceased to farm the land at Michaelmas, 1904, continued in visible occupation of it down to the 25th of November, 1904, when his farm stock was sold by auction, but he remained in possession of the house and garden down to the end of March, 1905.

On the 24th of March, 1905, the appellant was summoned by the overseers for non-payment of a sum of £6 5s. 8d. being the full amount of the rate for the house and garden, and the proportion of the rate for the land and buildings down to the 17th of January, up to which the overseers claimed that he continued in occupation. The justices found that the appellant had continued in occupation of the land and buildings up to the 25th of November, 1904, and that the amount due from him was £3 10s. 3d., and they accordingly issued a distress warrant for that sum with costs. It was objected on behalf of the appellant that no demand of the precise sum found to be due had ever been made upon him, and that consequently the justices had no jurisdiction to issue the distress warrant. But the justices overruled the objection subject to a case for this court.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Emanuel, for the appellant.

J. A. Simon, for the respondent.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The question in this case is whether upon a summons for non-payment of poor rates in Form B in the schedule to the Distress for Rates Act, 1849, it is competent for the justices not only to decide what is the amount due, but also when the amount so found to be due is less than the whole amount of the rate, to issue forthwith their distress warrant for the amount so found. It has been contended for the appellant that they cannot do so, but that they ought in such a case to find the amount due, but dismiss the summons and leave the overseers to make an amended demand upon the ratepayer. We ought not to uphold this contention unless we are compelled by the language of the statutes or by decisions to do so. The original Poor Relief Act of Elizabeth contemplated the recovery of rates by distress warrant in the event of the ratepayer refusing to pay. Then a series of decisions under that statute, of which Hurrell v. Wink, 8 Taunt. 369, is one, decided that as there could be no refusal without a demand, a demand of the rate was an essential preliminary to proceedings for a distress warrant. But in that case the effect of the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 38, s. 32, was not considered by the court, and no question appears to have arisen thereunder. The difficulty in the present case arises out of the later legislation.

By section 16 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, which repeals and re-enacts in an amended form section 12 of 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, it is provided that where there is a change of occupation in the middle of the period the outgoing occupier shall be liable for so much of the rate only as is proportionate to the term of his occupation. And by the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1882, the benefit of the former Act is extended to an outgoing occupier who is not succeeded by an incoming tenant. Here the demand which was made upon the appellant was for £9 7s. 3d., which was the whole amount of the rate; but as he had gone out of occupation during the period of the rate he was entitled to relief under the Act of 1882, and could be required to pay no more than his fair proportion. The question is, therefore, what ought the justices to do in such a case upon a summons in Form B in the Schedule of the Act of 1849, which alleges that the ratepayer "being a person duly rated and assessed to the relief of the poor . . . in the sum of . . . hath not paid the same or any part thereof, but hath refused to do so." Upon such a summons the justices have jurisdiction to determine the amount which is due from the party summoned. It is clear that they cannot issue a distress warrant to recover more than the amount due: Davies v. Woodfield, 64 J. P. 213. But I am of opinion that, having ascertained the amount due, they can proceed to give effect to their decision, and issue their distress warrant at once for the amount due. In my opinion we ought not to hold that their power is confined to a declaratory order as to the amount without following it up with a warrant, but that they can make the same order with respect to the ascertained amount as they could have made with respect to the whole rate, had the whole rate been due. There is no hardship upon the ratepayer in this view, for he knew the exact date at which the occupation ceased, and the consequent proportion of the rate which was due from him, whereas the overseers did not.

RIDLEY and DARLING, JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Speechly, Mumford, & Craig, for Lamport, Bassitt, & Hiscock, Southampton.

Solicitors for the respondent, P. J. Nicholls, for Hallett & Martin, Southampton.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) — Jan. 11.

WANDSWORTH BOROUGH v. BAINES. (a.)

Metropolis—Bye-law—Daily removal of house refuse—Notice to occupiers to place movable receptacles on kerbstone—Refusal of sanitary authority to remove refuse placed elsewhere—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 16 (2), 30.

A bye-law made by the London County Council under section 16, sub-section 2, of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, provided that where a sanitary authority arrange for the daily removal of house refuse in their district, or any part thereof, the occupier of any premises in such district, or part thereof . . . shall at such hour of the day as the sanitary authority shall fix . . . deposit on the kerbstone or on the other edge of the footpath immediately in front of the house or in a conveniently accessible position on the premises as the sanitary authority may prescribe by written notice served upon the occupier, a movable receptacle in which shall be placed for the purposes of removal by . . . the sanitary authority of the house refuse." A sanitary authority issued notices under the bye-law to the occupiers of all houses in a certain area in their district requiring each occupier to deposit on the kerbstone or edge of the footpath in front of his house a movable receptacle containing the house refuse. The respondent was occupier of a detached house situated within the prescribed area of the notice, which had a garden in front and was approached by a carriage drive. He refused to comply with the notice to place his house refuse on the kerbstone, but was willing to place, and did place, the refuse receptacle in a conveniently accessible position on his front premises. The sanitary authority refused to take it away unless the receptacle was put on the kerbstone, and the respondent thereupon took proceedings against the authority under section 30 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891.

Held, that the sanitary authority was not empowered under the bye-law to give a general notice to every occupier of premises within a particular area to place the refuse receptacle on the kerbstone for removal, and their refusal to remove the house refuse of this particular occupier from what was found as a fact to be a conveniently accessible position on his premises was a refusal without reasonable cause within the terms of the section.

Semble, that it was no objection to the validity of the bye-law that the placing of the receptacles on the kerbstone would cause a temporary obstruction of the highway.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate before whom the appellants had been convicted upon an information preferred by the respondent under section 30 of the Public Health (London Act), 1891, against the appellants for that they, on the 19th of January, 1905, at 37, Carlton-road, Putney, did without reasonable cause unlawfully fail to comply with a written notice, dated the 16th of January, 1905, and duly served on them, requiring them to remove house refuse from the above-mentioned premises.

The material facts stated in the case were that the respondent Baines resided in Carlton-road, Putney, in a detached house which was situated about forty feet from the highway, and was approached by a carriage drive.

By printed notice, dated the 12th of October, 1904, the appellants gave notice to the respondent and to all other occupiers of houses within a certain defined area of the borough of Wandsworth (hereinafter called the "prescribed area"), that on and after the 1st of January, 1905, a system of daily removal of house refuse would be substituted for the weekly removal then prevailing, and the said notice (which purported to be given in accordance with a bye-law made by the London County Council) required occupiers to deposit on the kerbstone or edge of the footpath immediately in front of their respective houses a movable receptacle in which should be placed for the purpose of removal of the house refuse which he had accumulated since the preceding collection. The appellants also issued to the respondent and the said occupiers a printed circular explanatory of the said notice.

The bye-law made by the London County Council in pursuance of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 16, sub-section 2 (b), was in the following terms: "Where a sanitary authority arrange for the daily removal of house refuse in their district or any part thereof, the occupier of any premises in such district or part thereof in which any house refuse may from time to time accumulate shall at such hour of the day as the sanitary authority shall fix and notify by public announcement in their district deposit on the kerbstone or on the outer edge of the footpath immediately in front of the house or in a conveniently accessible position on the premises as the sanitary authority may prescribe by written notice served upon the occupier, a movable receptacle in which shall be placed, for the purposes of removal by or on behalf of the sanitary authority, the house refuse which has accumulated on such premises since the preceding collection by such authority. The sanitary authority shall collect such refuse or cause the same be collected between the hours of the day as they have fixed and notified by public announcement in their district."

On the 2nd of January, 1905, in accordance with the notice, the system of daily removal of house refuse and the bye-law were put into operation within the prescribed area. The carts arrived in the different streets at different times, and the whole collection in the prescribed area was finished by 9.30 a.m.

The respondent refused to comply with the requirements of the appellants and to place his dust-bin on the kerbstone daily, and the house refuse was after the 9th of January not removed.

On the 16th of January the respondent gave the appellants notice requiring the house refuse to be removed from his premises, and was informed that the appellants were willing to do so if the same were placed on the kerbstone or edge of the footpath in accordance with the notice of the 12th of October, 1904.

The respondent was always ready and willing to place his house refuse in a proper receptacle in a conveniently accessible position on his premises for removal, and under protest placed the house refuse in movable receptacles on the kerbstone in front of his house for removal on the 20th of January and subsequently to that date, and it was removed by the appellants.

On the 19th of January he preferred an information against the borough council for refusing to comply with his notice.

The respondent contended (a) that the said bye-law and notice respectively were ultrà vires as being repugnant to the law—(1) as involving acts of wilful obstruction and the creation of nuisances; (2) as contrary to sections 30 and 34 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891; (3) as inconsistent with the bye-law No. 18 made by the London County Council under section 39, sub-section 1, of the same Act. (b) That the notice was bad in point of law by reason of its limiting the operation of the bye-law as to the time and locality. (c) That the bye-law was unreasonable by reason of being partial and unequal in its operations. (d) That assuming the bye-law to be legally valid, the appellants were wrong in applying generally the one alternative and that occupiers of premises upon which conveniently accessible positions could be found for the placing of receptacles containing house refuse should not be compelled to place their refuse outside their premises. (e) That on the above grounds the appellants had no reasonable cause for failing to comply with the respondent's written notice.

The appellants contended (a) that they had properly and legally fulfilled their duties under section 30 of the said Act in regard to the respondent's refuse on the 19th of January, 1905, and at all times; (b) that the bye-law and notice respectively were valid in law and neither ultrà vires nor unreasonable; (c) that in operation the new system created no obstruction or nuisance; (d) that the respondent's noncompliance with the appellant's notice was reasonable cause within section 30, sub-section 2, entitling them to a dismissal of the information; (e) that assuming the bye-law to be ultrà vires or unreasonable, the appellants were entitled to rely upon a bye-law duly made by the London County Council so long as it was in existence and not held to be invalid, and such reliance was reasonable cause entitling them to dismissal of the information.

The magistrate was of opinion that the appellants, under all the circumstances, failed without reasonable cause to perform the duties cast upon them by section 30 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, in that they had failed to remove from the respondent's premises his house refuse; that the notice dated the 12th of October, 1904, went beyond the bye-law to such an extent as to give the occupier permission to cause an obstruction in the street; that the notice amounted to an order to the respondent to place his dust-bin on the pavement in front of his premises; and that the respondent was justified in refusing to obey such order, inasmuch as it amounted to an order to do something which entailed the commission of illegal acts. He was further of opinion that for the purposes of his judgment it was not necessary for him to decide (and he did not decide) whether or not the bye-law was a valid bye-law, because by the course adopted the appellants had put it into operation in an illegal and unreasonable manner, whereas it might have been put into operation in a legal and reasonable manner, since he found as a fact that the respondent had a reasonably accessible position on his premises from which the sanitary authority might have removed his house refuse. He was further of opinion that the bye-law contemplated voluntary arrangements being made between occupiers and the sanitary authority as to the removal of house refuse, which was not done, or attempted to be done, in the case before him. He accordingly convicted the appellants in 20s. and 25 guineas costs, but stated this case for the opinion of the court as to whether he was right in so doing.

Avory, K.C. (Bernard Campion with him), for the appellants.—The question really comes to this, whether the London County Council can in the excercise of their discretion impose on every occupier within a prescribed area on due notice being given the duty of placing his bust-bin or box on the kerbstone. The respondent impugns the validity of the bye-law set out in the case, but the magistrate, although deciding in his favour, did not hold that the bye-law was bad, but merely that the way in which the appellants sought to enforce it was unreasonable. The bye-law gives an absolute discretionary power to the sanitary authority to determine and say where the refuse is to be put by the occupier. That is a discretion which the magistrate cannot override. Further, the requirement by the sanitary authority in this case was perfectly reasonable. The bye-law would be unworkable if the sanitary authority had to consult the wishes of every individual occupier. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., referred to Borrow v. Howland, (1896) 74 L. T. 787, 44 W. R. Dig. 106.] Further, sub-section 2 of section 30 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, under which the appellants were convicted, only imposes a penalty where the sanitary authority have failed to remove house refuse without reasonable cause, in the proper manner and at the proper times.

Macmorran, K.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case is certainly one of very considerable importance, but after the very clear discussion of it by Mr. Avory, I am of opinion that the magistrate was right, although I do not agree with some of the reasons he has given for it.

The summons was against the Wandsworth Borough Council for not removing the refuse pursuant to section 30 of the Act of 1891. That was found against them on the ground that they had failed, without reasonable cause, to comply with the provisions of the section requiring them to remove the refuse. It must be taken as found by the magistrate as a fact that the respondent had a reasonably accessible position on his premises from which the sanitary authority could have removed the refuse, and that he was willing to place it there. The appellants, however, relied upon the exercise of their discretion, and said that they had a right to have, and would have, the refuse, as against this particular occupier, placed on the kerbstone.

Now, I desire to point out that the Wandsworth Borough Council have gone considerably past the bye-law made by the London County Council, if it is to be construed as contended for by Mr. Avory. I agree that a question may arise whether, if a notice had been given with regard to the particular occupier of the particular house that the refuse should be placed on a given spot, the magistrate could override the discretion of the local authority. The case before us raises no such point. The local authority have thought fit to give a notice that in a particular area occupiers should put their refuse upon the kerbstone. They have not prescribed a conveniently accessible position on the premises. Even assuming that the local authority might prescribe with regard to particular premises, although I do not decide it in favour of Mr. Avory, where the refuse shall be placed, and that the magistrate could not go beyond that, that was not what had happened in this case. There has been a notice given beyond that contemplated by the bye-law—namely, a notice that in a given area every one should place his refuse on the kerbstone. I sympathize with the desire of the local authority to have frequent removals of the house refuse in their district, but they had to consider the rights of the occupiers in the district. I desire to say that I sympathize very strongly with the sanitary authority in their wish that there should be a very frequent and, if possible, a daily removal of the refuse, and should be most unwilling to embarrass a sanitary authority in that respect; but we have really to consider what are the duties and rights of persons. An obligation to remove the house refuse rests upon the local authority. Occupiers and owners are, by statutory provisions, required to facilitate such removal, and owners might be called upon to spend money in making that removal easy and convenient, as, for instance, by providing movable dust-bins; but the question is, can a local authority give a notice applying a part of a bye-law in such a way as to relieve themselves of their obligation to remove the refuse where the occupier was willing to do everything which, apart from the particular notice, he could be called upon to do? The respondent was willing to place the dust-bin in a conveniently accessible position on his premises. The local authority said they would not remove the refuse unless it was brought out to the kerbstone. That was not a proper prescription of a conveniently accessible position as contemplated by the bye-law. If there was no prescription with respect to particular premises, then the obligation on the occupier was to put the refuse in a conveniently accessible position on the premises. It seems to me, therefore, that without saying that this notice is absolutely invalid, that the true view of it is, attempted to be put into force in the way in which it has been in this case, no matter how inconvenient it may be to some persons to put their refuse on the kerbstone, that it would be unreasonable. Therefore, in such a case the magistrate would be right in holding that the sanitary authority had failed without reasonable cause to discharge the duty cast upon them by the Act, as the respondent was willing to put the refuse in a place from which they could conveniently remove it. The other point most pressed upon us was whether there was a refusal, without reasonable cause, by the appellants, seeing that the respondent could have got the refuse removed if he had chosen to take it down to the kerb. If the hard-and-fast requisition, whatever the circumstances, was a requisition which, having regard to the law itself, the sanitary authority were not entitled to make, then their refusal to remove the refuse from the convenient position offered by the occupier was a refusal without reasonable cause within section 30 (2) of the Act of 1891. The conviction was therefore right, and the appeal will be dismissed.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree; I do not think I can usefully and anything.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree; the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, W. W. Young, Son, & Ward.

Solicitors for the respondent, Turner & Co.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div.
(Bigham and Darling, JJ.) Feb. 5.

In re A. J. HARRIS.
Ex parte THE TRUSTEE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Transfer of bankrupt's business to limited company—"Fraudulent conveyance"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (b).

A trader being in difficulties transferred his assets to a company in the bonâ fide hope of thereby benefiting his creditors. His assets were estimated at £2,000, and his debts at £1,000. The consideration for the transfer was an undertaking by the company to pay his debts and the allotment of ninety-four shares and debentures of the nominal value of £1,000. The debentures could not be enforced until interest was two months' overdue—i.e., eight months from their issue, or until execution was put in against the company.

Held, that this transfer did not necessarily tend to defeat or delay creditors, was not a fraudulent conveyance within section 4, sub-section 1 (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and should not be set aside as void against the trustee in bankruptcy.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Bompas, K.C., in the county court at Bradford.

The bankrupt had carried on business as an electrical engineer and dealer in electric fittings since 1892.

In August, 1903, he borrowed from William Mitchell, the petitioning creditor, £500 at 5 per cent. interest without any security but a promissory note payable on demand. At the same time Mitchell's son, Joseph William Mitchell, was apprenticed to the bankrupt for three years, with the option of putting capital into the business and becoming a partner at the end of his apprenticeship.

In April, 1905, the bankrupt got in arrears with the interest on the loan and asked Mitchell to let the payments of interest stand over for a time, and further suggested that J. W. Mitchell should at once enter into partnership with him and bring fresh capital into the business. Mitchell refused to consent.

On the 16th of May the bankrupt again wrote to Mitchell asking him to let his son come into the business as a partner and bring in £200 capital. Mitchell again refused and advised the bankrupt to try to get an overdraft from his bank, which the bankrupt did try but without success.

On the 27th of May the bankrupt's solicitors wrote to Mitchell that the bankrupt was being pressed by his creditors, and suggested that J. W. Mitchell's apprenticeship should be terminated, but the parties came to no agreement on the matter.

About the end of June Mitchell heard a rumour that the bankrupt was about to turn his business into a limited company, and had an interview with him on the subject. The bankrupt admitted that he had thought of doing so, but said that he had practically given up the idea, and promised not to deal with his assets without Mitchell's consent.

Nevertheless, on the 3rd of July, without consulting Mitchell, the bankrupt registered the company of A. J. Harris & Co. (Limited) with a capital of £2,000 in £1 shares; and on the 7th of July executed a transfer of all his assets to the company for £1,094—£94 in shares, £750 in debentures, and £250 in cash. The company undertook to pay the bankrupt's existing debts, estimated at £1,000.

The assets were estimated to be worth £2,000, made up of stock, £1,170; plant, £662; book debts, £268.

No shares were issued to the public, and only 228 were issued in all—7 to the signatories, 94 to the bankrupt, 87 to his wife for an alleged debt, and 20 each to the two directors, Fawcett and Myers, as qualification shares.

A board meeting was held on the 19th of July, when it was resolved, with the bankrupt's consent, that he should be paid the sum of £250 in debentures instead of cash as agreed.

The bankrupt said that he had agreed to take payment of this sum in debentures because he wanted them as a good investment, but he was in such straits at that time that he had to borrow £20 on a bill of sale on the following day (the 20th of July).

By the terms of the debentures interest was payable thereon half-yearly, and no proceedings could be taken to enforce the security until interest had been unpaid for two months after it had become due. Consequently no proceedings could be taken upon the debentures until eight months from the date of their issue unless a judgment was obtained against the company and execution put in, in which event they also were enforceable.

On the 28th of July Mitchell obtained judgment against the bankrupt for the amount of his loan and interest, and, having issued a bankruptcy notice, he presented a petition on the 8th of August, upon which a receiving order was made against the bankrupt on the 18th of August.

Adjudication followed, and a trustee was appointed, who moved in the county court at Bradford to set aside the assignment to the company as a fraudulent conveyance.

Prior to serving the notice of motion the trustee obtained a private examination of the bankrupt, who stated that before the assignment he had been pressed by his creditors, he could not get J. W. Mitchell, or another man whom he had approached, to join him as partner, and had been refused an overdraft from his bank. He thought he could raise capital by forming a company, and that he would be able to borrow on the debentures allotted to him and repay Mitchell's loan. The bank, however, had refused to lend anything on the debentures.

The county court judge dismissed the motion, and the trustee appealed.

Frank Mellor, for the appellant.—The effect of the assignment by the bankrupt was to delay his creditors. When pressed he assigned his property in such a way as to put it out of the creditors' power to get anything but shares and debentures: Ex parte Lücke, In re Wood, 20 W. R. 403, L. R. 7 Ch. 302. [BIGHAM, J.—If he had sold for cash it would have been a proper transaction. Here he has sold for debentures charged on the property transferred. Do they honestly represent the property parted with?] The creditors cannot be compelled to take debentures. Wright, J., pointed out in In re Slobodinsky, 52 W. R. 156, [1903] 2 K. B. 517, that debentures and shares are not the same as cash. Here the debentures cannot be enforced for eight months from their issue.

He cited Smith v. Cannan, 22 L. J. Q. B 290; In re Hirth, 47 W. R. 243, [1899] 1 Q. B. 612; Wheatley's Trustee v. Wheatley & Co. (Limited), 85 L. T. 491, 50 W. R. Dig. 12.

Waugh, K.C., and Newell, for the respondents.—This was a bonâ fide transaction; the bankrupt handed over his business to the company without charging anything for the goodwill; the company undertook to pay his debts, and the debentures became enforceable as soon as execution is put in against the company. It is not a transfer for a past consideration.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Frank Mellor in reply.—The company are no better able to pay the debts after they have have issued the debentures than the debtor was when he had the assets free. The creditors never agreed to the transfer of his liability to the company, consequently he has not got rid of his liability. [BIGHAM, J.—The trustee can sue the company and put in execution, when the debentures will become enforceable.] The creditors could not sue the company; the debtor, not the company, was liable to them; they would have had to compel the debtor to sue the company.

He cited In re Sharpe, Ex parte Gundry, 83 L. T. 416, 49 W. R. Dig. 8.

BIGHAM, J.—The question in this case is whether this transaction naturally tended to defeat and delay creditors, and was therefore a fraudulent conveyance within section 4, sub section 1 (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The facts are these: The debtor was in difficulties and cast about for a way to get out of them. He had more than enough assets—they were estimated at £2,000 and his debts at about £1,000—but he could not realize them. He thought he could make his estate liquid by turning his business into a company, and that he would so get something to pay his debts with. He therefore transferred his business to a company in exchange for an undertaking by the company to pay his debts and the allotment to him of ninety-four shares and £1,000 in debentures. It is said that he thereby necessarily defeated or delayed his creditors, and that it was a fraudulent gift, delivery, or conveyance. He honestly believed it to be for the advantage of his creditors, therefore it cannot be a fraudulent transaction within the statute. He did not delay his creditors by changing the character of his assets. He was entitled to sell them for money, or for promissory notes, or for other goods. I think that he was acting within his rights and that this appeal must be dismissed.

DARLING, J.—I have much doubt whether the cases cited do not establish the case put forward by Mr. Mellor. Still I take it here that the debtor acted honestly in the interest of his creditors, hoping that he would improve the value of his business and have the means of paying them. I therefore assume that the conveyance was made honestly as far as the debtor was concerned, and that he had no sinister or oblique motive in making it. It is, however, said to amount to an act of bankruptcy as necessarily tending to defeat and delay creditors, and though not dishonest per se, to be "fraudulent" within section 4, sub-section 1 (b). If that be so, "fraudulent" would appear to have no meaning whatever, and I must admit that the decisions in Smith v. Cannan, 20 L. J. Q. B. 290, and Ex parte Lückes, In re Wood, 20 W. R. 403, L. R. 7 Ch. 302, do seem to amount to that.

Nevertheless in this case I think that the creditors could have sued the debtor and seized the debentures in execution, and though when they got them they might not have been able to put them in force, still I think they could have sold them as easily as the electric fittings which they represented. I therefore agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Stamford & Metcalfe, Bradford.

Solicitors for the respondent, Wynne-Baxter & Keeble, for Banks, Newell, & Hammond, Bradford.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) — May 18.

LUMSDEN, JUN. v. SHIPCOTE LAND PROPERTY CO. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Amendment—Alterations—Omissions—After verdict—Taxation — Reference — Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.

A., a solicitor, delivered to his client, B., a bill of costs which he subsequently amended by a second bill of costs increased by certain items omitted from the first bill. Subsequently A. brought an action upon the second bill of costs against B., who pleaded (1) no retainer, (2) no right of action upon an amended bill of costs. It was agreed by the parties at the trial of the action that only the question of liability should go to the jury. Upon this question the jury gave their verdict in favour of the plaintiff.

Held, that the bill sued upon—i.e., the second bill—could not after verdict be sent by the judge to a taxing-master to be taxed under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, but could only be sent as a reference under the general jurisdiction of the court to order a reference as to quantum. Upon such reference it would be open to the defendants to put forward the first bill of costs as evidence of what the proper charges should be.

Semble (per Vaughan Williams, L.J.), that, although the taxing-master, acting as a referee, would bring to bear upon the question the principles of taxation, yet all the principles applicable to taxation of a bill of costs would not necessarily apply, e.g., the rule that the solicitor must pay the costs of taxation if one-sixth part of the bill be taxed off.

Per Moulton, L.J.—A solicitor may amend bonâ fide his bill of costs at any time before an order of taxation has been obtained or taxation has been threatened by the client.

Appeal from the judgment of Ridley, J.

The plaintiff was a solicitor and was a joint adventurer with the defendants in a certain venture. He did certain professional services for the syndicate and was requested to make his charges as low as possible. He accordingly on the 18th of January, 1904, sent in a bill of costs for £192 10s. 10d., having intentionally omitted certain items in order to fall in with the wishes of his co-adventurers, the defendants.

The defendants denied liability on the ground that the work had been done merely as a co-adventurer.

Thereupon the plaintiff on the 16th of July, 1904, sent in an amended bill of costs for £673 2s. 10d., which included the items omitted from the first bill. Subsequently he brought an action on this bill and the defendants pleaded, for the purpose of this appeal, (1) want of retainer, (2) no action would lie on the second bill of costs.

Upon the trial of the action counsel agreed that the jury should only try the issue of liability and not the issue as to quantum.

The jury returned their verdict for the plaintiff. Thereupon counsel for the plaintiff asked leave, if leave were necessary, to bring in the second bill of costs for taxation.

The judge said that if leave were necessary he should refuse it, as he considered under all the circumstances of the case the first bill should be brought in for taxation.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), enacts: "From and after the passing of this Act no attorney or solicitor . . . shall commence or maintain any action or suit for the recovery of any fees, charges, or disbursements for any business done . . . until the expiration of one month after such attorney or solicitor shall have delivered unto the party to be charged therewith . . . a bill of such fees, charges, and disbursements. And upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill within such month, it shall be lawful . . . for the court . . . or any judge . . . to refer such bill . . . to be taxed and settled by the proper officer, and in case no such application as aforesaid shall be made within such month as aforesaid, then it shall be lawful for such reference to be made as aforesaid . . . upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill . . . and the court or judge may restrain such attorney or solicitor from commencing or prosecuting any action or suit touching such demand pending such reference. Provided, always, that no such reference as aforesaid shall be directed upon an application made by the party chargeable with such bill, after a verdict shall have been obtained or a writ of inquiry executed in any action for the recovery of the demand of such attorney or solicitor . . . except under special circumstances to be proved to the satisfaction of the court or judge to whom the application for such reference shall be made: And in case any such reference as aforesaid shall be made, if such bill when taxed be less by a sixth part than the bill delivered, then such attorney or solicitor shall pay the costs of taxation."

Manisty, K.C. (Newbolt with him), for the appellants.—There is no rule of law that a solicitor may not amend his bill of costs before any order of taxation has been made. He takes the risk of so doing because there is the chance that one-sixth may be taxed off if he unduly increases it. Of course if he sends in an exorbitant bill of costs, and then upon the fear of taxation, he reduces it the court would not permit him to escape from his liability to pay the costs and would insist upon the first bill being taxed. This is clearly the case after an order for taxation: In re Heather, 18 W. R. 1079, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 604. The client has a right under the statute to tax, but not a particular bill, if that bill is amended. The nearest case where a bill has been increased and then taxed is In re Cartwright, L. R. 16 Eq. 469, at p. 474. The earliest foundation for the rule that a solicitor may not increase the items in a bill of costs once delivered is Loveridge v. Botham, 1 B. & P. 49. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—That case is of no assistance for the foundation of the rule which is based upon the statute. That case only lays down a rule of evidence which is confirmed in Anderson v. May, 2 B. & P. 237, showing that the first bill is conclusive of the reasonableness of the items. It is a rule applied to bills in other trades, as is shown by the case of Knox v. Whalley, Esp. N. P. 159 (referred to in Anderson v. May), which was a case of a tailor's bill. All these cases were long prior to the statute of 1843.] In re Chambers, 34 Beav. 177, is a clear authority that a solicitor prior to an order for taxation may withdraw one bill and substitute another. MOULTON, L.J.—The statute does not forbid a solicitor to amend his bill. If there is any rule of law it must be a disciplinary one based on the fact that a solicitor is an officer of the court. The rule does not apply to other professions or trades.] The learned judge at the trial was greatly influenced by the case of In re Thompson, 34 W. R. 112, 30 Ch. D 441, but that was decided on the well-known principle that a solicitor may not reduce his bill to avoid the results of taxation.

Waugh, K.C. (Roche with him).—All the authorities which have been referred to show that a solicitor may not decrease or increase his bill of costs except where the omissions are due to mistake or fraud. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In every authority so far cited to us there has been either an order for taxation, or taxation has been threatened by the client.] That fact was not material to any of the decisions. [STIRLING, L.J.—This is not a case of taxation at all. It is after verdict, and the statute says a bill cannot be taxed after verdict except under special circumstances.] In re Woollett, 12 M. & W. 504, was a case where a bill was taxed after verdict. [STIRLING, L.J.—There was no verdict in that case.] A solicitor is bound by his bill once delivered: In re Carven, 8 Beav. 436. No appeal in any case lies here because the judge only refused to give leave if leave was necessary.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The case has been heard at length, and I am far from saying that it is not in its way an important case. I am also far from saying that there is not a certain amount of authority for the proposition that the rule which is applied when there is a taxation under the Solicitors Act, 1843, in respect to the delivery of a second bill of costs and the right to have that taxed, that there is an obligation upon the solicitor to get leave to have the second bill taxed, is a rule that applies not only in the case where the second bill reduces the amount of the charges, but also where the second bill increases the amount of the charges; and, speaking for myself, though it is not wise to deal with a question not actually before the court, I agree that there may be cases where the rule applies. But in my judgment the question does not arise here. Here was a case of one of several gentlemen interested in a venture, who was a solicitor and employed as the solicitor of the venture. He was invited to make his bill of costs as low as possible, and therefore he delivered a bill of costs which was low; it did not include scale charges for the rendering of certain services. Presently the persons liable to pay these charges took up the position of a total denial of liability. They denied, I suppose, that a retainer was given, or if one were given, of any work done under it, the work done being done by a co-adventurer who was therefore not entitled to be paid for it. At all events they denied their liability. But for that determination the defendant might have got an order to tax. But they did not do it because they were determined to fight the question of liability, and the solicitor brought his action, and the action having been brought, the defendants pleaded denial of liability and set up the circumstances under which they denied it. The first was the position of the plaintiff as a co-adventurer. Then they also set up a plea, which, as far as the facts were concerned, was not denied, that the bill sued upon, for some £600 instead of some £200, was the bill delivered subsequently to the first bill. I do not want to say that in my opinion the defendants might not have taken out a summons for taxation and raised the queston that they were entitled to have the smaller bill taxed and not to be subjected to having the second bill taxed. I cannot say, if they had raised it, what would have been the result. The judge, if he had taken the view that it was a case like In re Thompson and other cases cited to us in the course of the argument, of a solicitor who had sent in a larger bill as a try on and then diminished it in fear of taxation, might have thought the bill was not to be altered. I can conceive of cases in which the bill, although increased, ought not to be brought in for taxation, because in some cases it might be of the greatest importance to increase the total of the charges because the more the bill be increased the further might be the danger of being ordered to pay the costs of the taxation. The defendants did not choose to take out a summons. They let the case go to trial, and the finding of the jury on the question of liability was against them. That being so, it is necessary to consider the proviso of section 37. [His lordship read it.] In my judgment, where a solicitor brings an action, and it is tried, and the jury return a verdict but do not try the quantum, it is referred for the purpose of ascertaining the quantum to a taxing-master not under the statute, but to the taxing-master as a referee, who will, as a referee, bring to bear upon the question his experience of bills of costs. Under these circumstances, the order that was made by Ridley, J., was not, I think, the right one. I think the matter ought to have gone to the master as a referee, and the judge ought to have given directions to the master not to tax, but to moderate the bill. Instead of that, the judge seems to me to have made an order as if there had been no action at all. When this case comes before the master, if what Mr. Roche contends did in fact transpire, that the plaintiff did things which might have been done by him professionally yet were not done professionally, but as one of seven co-adventurers each giving assistance to the best of his ability, the master may say that these are things which cannot be charged for. Some of the charges may be disallowed, not because they are excessive charges, but because they are in respect of work done by a volunteer. There is nothing in this case to prevent full justice being done between the plaintiff and defendants. I should like to point out that in my judgment some of the rights which the client possesses against the solicitor when there is an order for taxation cannot be claimed when there is a reference after a verdict. It is not for me to decide, but I do not think the one-sixth-taxed-off rule would apply. However that may be this judgment of Ridley, J., must be set aside to this extent: There will be the verdict for the plaintiff as found by the jury, subject to a reference to a taxing-master to ascertain the amount for which the judgment should be entered.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, with all respect to Ridley, J., when he directed this taxation, he ought not to have proceeded as though directing a taxation under the Solicitors Act. The proviso in section 37 says that there shall be no taxation under that Act after verdict except under special circumstances, and it seems to me that here there were no special circumstances. But notwithstanding that, the court has, by virtue of its general jurisdiction, power to ascertain the proper amount of the fees which should be charged by the solicitor in respect of professional services, by reference to a taxing-master not under the statute, but simply in exercise of its general jurisdiction. In point of fact there is no difference between this and any other action to recover in respect of a bill for work and labour done. If such a long bill is delivered involving many items it is within the jurisdiction of the court to direct the items to be gone into before an official referee. Here, by virtue of its general jurisdiction, the court would have power to direct a reference to a taxing-master to ascertain the proper amount to be allowed for professional services as a solicitor. That principle has been very frequently acted upon in the Chancery Division in correcting bills which come before the court which cannot be directly taxed. That being so, it seems to me the order made by Ridley, J., ought not to stand. There ought to be a simple reference to the taxing-master to ascertain the amount for professional services. As far as I am concerned, I think the taxing-master will have full power to deal with the bill before him in such a way as to do justice without any directions from us. I should think that the principles laid down in Loveridge v. Botham and May v. Anderson should be found useful to the taxing-master.

MOULTON, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. This is only a case of a verdict for the amount of a bill subject to a reference to a skilled tribunal competent to settle it. The point is raised whether it is open to a solicitor to correct a bill once it is delivered, or whether he is bound by a bill once delivered so that he cannot amend his claim. A solicitor is only a person doing professional work, but he differs from other professional men in that he is under the Solicitors Act and under the disciplinary power of the court, being an officer of the court. Now, if there is any principle of law that he cannot amend his claim once it is delivered in the form of a bill, it must be by virtue of one of these two things to which I have referred, because it cannot be doubted that an architect, say, can amend his bill. It cannot be a consequence of the Act, because, if so, the court would have no power to permit him in any case to send in an amended bill. It must be, then, under the disciplinary power of the court. But giving the best consideration I can to the many authorities that have been cited in argument, I can see no reason to think that the court has ever taken up, in my eyes, so unjust a position as to say that a solicitor may not amend his claim. I can see this, that if the taxation has been applied for, or threatened, the court has considered it too late then for the solicitor to amend his claim, because taxation is a right of the client granted to check exorbitant demands. Where no taxation has been demanded or threatened, I can see no reason why the court should forbid a solicitor bonâ fide to amend his claim, and I cannot find in any case that the Courts have made it a practice to do so. If a solicitor sends in one bill and then another it seems to me he is in the same position as any other person carrying on a profession. The first bill would be only evidence against him of the charges being right in that bill. So with a solicitor. In my opinion the passage in Archibald's Practice by Chitty (9th ed.), p. 113, exactly describes the position of a client who has received a corrected bill: "The delivery of a bill is strong evidence against an increase of charge, in a subsequent bill, for any of the items contained in the first bill, and presumptive evidence against any additional items." The value of a previously delivered bill is an evidential value, and it is of no other value in a case where it is delivered bonâ fide in a corrected form before application for taxation or threat of taxation; and therefore this bill must go for reference in the ordinary way, and of course it is open to the defendants to say that the first bill is evidence of what the charge ought to have been.

Appeal allowed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Stokes & Stokes, for J. G. Aitchison, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Solicitors for the respondents, King, Wigg, & Co., for Keenlyside & Forster, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling and Moulton, L JJ.) — Feb. 23; March 24.

REX v. LLOYD & SOLMAN.
Ex parte DAY. (a.)

County court—Judge—Deputy—Appointment of two deputies—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 18-21.

A county court judge is not appointed to a circuit, but to different courts with a district, and has power therefore under sections 18 to 21 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to appoint a separate deputy to each court district within his jurisdiction.

Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 410, [1906] 1 K. B. 22) affirmed, Moulton, L.J., dubitante.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (reported ante, p. 410, [1906] 1 K. B. 22).

One Day, the defendant in an action of Solman v. Day, tried before Deputy-Judge Clement E. Lloyd, Esq., in the Brompton County Court, had obtained two rules to show cause respectively why a writ of certiorari and a writ of prohibition should not issue for the purpose of quashing the judgment obtained against him in the county court and staying all further proceedings in the action.

The action happened to be tried on a day when Deputy-Judge F. B. Fitzroy-Cooper was sitting at Marylebone—both deputy-judges having been duly appointed by his Honour Judge Stonor, in whose district (Middlesex) Marylebone and Brompton County Courts are—and the rules were applied for on the ground that the deputy-judge before whom the action was tried had no jurisdiction, and, the proceedings being coram non judice, should be quashed, since a county court judge being appointed to one office could appoint but one deputy to act for him on any one day.

The Divisional Court discharged the rules.

Day appealed.

Duke, K.C., and W. O. Hodges, for the appellant.—The power to appoint a deputy must depend upon statutory authority. The power to appoint a deputy on general principles of law does not confer power to appoint two deputies: Parker v. Kett, 12 Mod. 467, and Denny v. Trapnell, 2 Wilson 378. A county court judge is appointed to one office, and can appoint but one deputy. Judge Stonor was appointed to the county court of Middlesex holden at Brompton and Marylebone. County court judges are appointed to one district or one circuit, in which there may be one or more courts. They are not in an analogous position to recorders, who are appointed sometimes to more than one city, for they are appointed under a different commission for each city.

S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the deputy county court judge.—Each court in a circuit constitutes a separate unit. This is not a case where the judge has appointed two deputies. He appointed one deputy for one court and another for another court. In all the sections in the County Courts Act, 1888, which deal with the constitution, jurisdiction, and machinery of the court, "district" is specified as the district of the particular court and not the whole circuit of the judge. If the appeal is allowed, every order made by each of the two deputy judges during these two months is so much waste paper, and an Act of Parliament might have to be passed to put matters right. It is submitted that the view taken by the Divisional Court is correct, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

I. A. Symmons, for Solman, the plaintiff.—In Reg. v. Parham, 13 Q. B. 858, the appointment of a county court judge for more courts than one was stated to be an appointment to "several offices." The general practice has been to appoint a deputy to each court, and the defendant must therefore be presumed to have known this when he applied for an adjournment of the hearing and cannot claim to take this point now.

Duke, K.C., in reply.—There never was a judge of the Brompton or of the Marylebone County Court, because the appointment of the judge who was to sit at those courts was to the county court of Middlesex holden either at Brompton or Marylebone, and it was to the office of the county court judge of Middlesex that Judge Stonor was alone appointed, and being one office he could appoint but one deputy.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L J.—In my judgment this appeal must be dismissed, and the judgment of the King's Bench Division affirmed on the grounds given by the court. Lord Alverstone says: "I therefore come to the conclusion that there being the power to appoint a deputy, and there being jurisdiction in each of these courts, and in the districts of each of these courts, it is not contrary to the statute, or contrary to any rule of law that the appointment of a deputy should be made for the district of a court"; and he goes on to say: "Therefore I think that these appointments made by the county court judge, and sanctioned by the Lord Chancellor, are within the powers of the Act of Parliament, and that both these rules should be discharged." The rules in question were rules to show cause respectively why a writ of prohibition and a writ of certiorari should not issue. The case arose in this way: His Honour Henry James Stonor, judge of the Marylebone County Court, being ill, made on the 13th of February, 1905, an order appointing F. B. Fitzroy Cowper, Esq., barrister-at-law, to act as his deputy for the said Marylebone Court in his absence, from the 13th of February until the 13th of April next, and failing the said F. B. Fitzroy Cowper from illness or other cause on any day or days during the said periods, further appointed Clement Elphinstone Lloyd to act as his deputy during his absence for the said court on such day or days aforesaid. Judge Stonor, who was also judge of the Brompton County Court, on the same day made an order in similar terms appointing Clement Elphinstone Lloyd to act as his deputy in the said Brompton County Court, and failing him appointing Mr. Fitzroy Cowper. The periods of appointment were the same in the two orders. The two barristers thus appointed respectively sat as deputies, the former in the Marylebone County Court, the latter in the Brompton County Court, and sat on the same day. The unsuccessful defendant in the cause of Solman v. Day, tried before Mr. Lloyd, has raised the question as to the jurisdiction of Mr. Lloyd sitting as the deputy of his Honour Judge Stonor. When the rules were first granted they were granted upon the ground that a county court judge has no power to appoint more than one deputy to sit for him on the same day, even though the deputies are appointed to sit in different district courts. But in the argument before us, and in the argument in the King's Bench Division, Mr. Duke did not argue his case upon the ground of the inability of the county court judge to appoint two deputies to act for him in different district courts on the same day, but argued it on the ground that a county court judge could only appoint a deputy to exercise the whole of his jurisdiction as county court judge in all the courts within the county of which he had been appointed judge; or, to put it in other words, he argued that a county court judge could not appoint a deputy to sit for him at one of the courts within his circuit as it is called, but if he appointed a deputy at all must appoint him as his deputy to sit at all the courts within his circuit and to exercise the whole of his jurisdiction. Now, in my opinion, there can be no doubt but that the court of each district to which a county court judge is appointed is a separate court, with separate jurisdiction, separate officers, and separate procedure, and the question we have to decide is whether a county court judge of the county of Middlesex can for proper cause appoint a deputy to act for him in one of the district courts of which he has been appointed the judge. Now, the power of appointment is given by section 18. That section provides, first, that in case of illness or unavoidable absence of any judge it shall be lawful for such judge to appoint a barrister to act as his deputy during such illness or unavoidable absence, provided (a) that the fact of appointment and name of the deputy shall be forthwith communicated to the Lord Chancellor; (b) that no deputy so appointed shall be entitled to act for more than fourteen days unless with the approval of the Lord Chancellor. Thus far I see nothing in the words of this section to suggest that the power to appoint a deputy is confined to the appointment of a deputy to exercise the jurisdiction of a county court judge as distinguished from the jurisdiction of a county court judge as the judge of a district. On the contrary, I think that the words "unavoidable absence" point to the absence of the judge from the district court. Secondly, it is provided that it shall also be lawful for any judge, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, to appoint a barrister as his deputy for any time or times not exceeding in the whole two months in any consecutive period of twelve months. And that every deputy appointed under this section during the time for which he shall be so appointed shall have all the powers and privileges and perform all the duties of the judge for whom he shall have been so appointed. Now the appointment of these deputies by Judge Stonor undoubtedly was an appointment under the last-mentioned part of section 18; that is to say, an appointment for two months, and it is said that, as under this appointment the deputy is to have all the powers and privileges and perform all the duties of the judge for whom he shall have been so appointed, this appointment necessarily is an appointment by a county court judge to perform all his duties as a county court judge within all the districts in which he has been appointed to act or which he may by section 9 of the Act or any other section be empowered to exercise outside the districts in which he has been directed to act as county court judge. It will be observed, however, that these latter words of the section apply to every appointment of a deputy, whether the appointment be under the first words of the section or under the later words. Section 21, so far as the words "and he" (i.e., the deputy) "shall continue to act in all the courts to which he was appointed" are concerned, point to section 18, empowering the appointment of a deputy for each district court, but the words of this section, which provide that any such deputy shall receive after the death or resignation of the judge a rateable proportion of the salary attached to the office, point certainly the other way. But in my opinion it is plain, taking all the sections of the Act of Parliament into consideration, that it is a possible construction of section 18 to hold that it authorizes the appointment by a county court judge of a deputy to act for him in one of his district courts, and inasmuch as to hold otherwise would cause great practical inconvenience, and county court judges have, we have ascertained, for the last twenty-five years, and probably ever since the passing of the Act of 1846, appointed deputies, with the approval of the successive Lord Chancellors, for the performance of the duties of the county court judge at one of his courts or in one of his districts, I think we ought to put that construction on the Act of Parliament. The result is that these appeals will be dismissed with costs.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, L.J.—I entirely agree with the judgment that has been delivered.

MOULTON, L.J.—Although in my opinion the statutory provisions on this subject might be made clearer, I do not dissent from the conclusion arrived at by the other members of the court. The delegation of judicial powers is such an exceptional privilege of an office, and so important, that I consider the conditions under which it may be exercised should be laid down by the Legislature so as to admit of no doubt, especially when it is remembered that county court judges now administer justice to a vast mass of his Majesty's subjects. If the matter had been res integra I do not think I should have taken the same view of the County Courts Act, 1888, as my learned brothers. The county court system of England is thoroughly well understood. England and Wales are divided into separate county court districts, each of which has its own jurisdiction and powers. Section 13 of the Act gives the Lord Chancellor power to group two or more districts together and to place those combined districts under the jurisdiction of a particular judge. In such a case the only nexus between the different districts so grouped together is the personality of the judge himself, and when the judge dies or resigns, or circumstances require that there should be a different grouping, the Lord Chancellor has power to alter the grouping. Then come the sections of the Act which permit the judge to delegate his powers. Delegation of judicial functions is the exception, and not the rule. A judge of the High Court has no power of delegation. A county court judge necessarily deals with numerous local matters in his own district or districts, and in order to prevent delay and interruption to the continuity of the administration of justice, large powers of delegation were conferred upon him. Section 18 gives him power to delegate. That section deals with two different cases—first, a delegation occasioned by the illness or unavoidable absence of the judge; and, secondly, a delegation for a certain time. In the first case, the judge has only to inform the Lord Chancellor of the appointment of the deputy; in the second case, the approval of the Lord Chancellor to the appointment was required. In both cases the section speaks of the deputy as the deputy of the judge. It did not, however, define his powers and functions in any way. Reading the first part of the section, I should be disposed to come to the conclusion that the judge had only power to create a substitute, who became for the time a judge, just as the county court judge himself was. Reading the last clause of the section, I feel still greater difficulty in construing the section otherwise. "Every deputy appointed under this section, during the time for which he shall be so appointed, shall have all the privileges and perform all the duties of the judge for whom he shall have been so appointed." Sections 19 and 20 are not material upon this question, as they do not carry the matter further than section 18. Passing now to section 21. Curiously enough, both sides relied upon the wording of that section. The section relates to the position of a deputy after the death or resignation of the judge. Naturally, upon such an event happening, the delegation came to an end. But that there might be no interruption in the administration of justice, the section provides that the appointment of the deputy should not be vacated by that event, and that he should continue to act until the Lord Chancellor should otherwise order, or a successor to the judge should be appointed. But inasmuch as the section was dealing with the case where the judge was either dead or had resigned, and was, therefore, no longer receiving remuneration, and inasmuch as the deputy was in that case no longer employed by the judge, but by the country, the deputy's remuneration had to be provided for, and accordingly the section provides that "such deputy shall receive as remuneration for the period that he may act as deputy after the death or resignation of the judge a rateable proportion of the salary and travelling allowances attached to the office so vacant during any vacancy." Now, "a rateable proportion" meant a proportion which is determined by a simple rule of three sum. Obviously it means that, if the yearly salary of the judge was so much and the deputy acted, say, for a quarter of a year, he was to have a rateable proportion—namely, one-fourth of that yearly salary. That carries out the idea that the deputy filled the whole position which the judge had filled. But the respondents to the rules also found words in the section which they said supported their contention, because the section said that the deputy was to "continue to act in all the courts to which he was appointed." They said that that pointed to this, that the appointment of the deputy might be to some, and not all, of the courts within the county court judge's jurisdiction. Those words seem to be consistent with the respondents' contention, but they also seem to be equally consistent with the appellants' contention. As I have already said, the courts were linked together by the nexus of the judge—that is to say, they were within what might be called the circuit of the judge. The words of the section receive their full interpretation if they are read as meaning that the grouping of the districts should continue, though the nexus was gone, until the Lord Chancellor should otherwise provide, and that the courts should remain courts in that collection of districts which had been presided over by the judge.

If that be the right view, then I see no difficulty in the contention that the deputy filled the whole place of the judge in all his districts. On the other hand, looking at the opposite view, I do not see that any public inconvenience would be caused if they regarded the position of the judge as being a collocation of several offices, and in my opinion there are no grounds of public convenience why section 18 should bear the restrictive interpretation which its language pointed to. That, of course, was not sufficient to justify the court in flinching from giving the language its strict interpretation, for it must be remembered that the power of delegation is not given by common law, but by statute. But side by side with the fact that no public inconvenience would arise from the appointment of separate deputies for separate districts, there is this important fact which induces me not to dissent from the judgment of my learned brothers. Both by admission at the bar and from inquiries which have been subsequently made, it appeared that there had been an unbroken practice for at least twenty-five years, beginning long anterior to the County Courts Act, 1888, of allowing a county court judge to appoint separate deputies for his different courts. That practice had not been adopted without, I will not say judicial sanction, but administrative sanction under the highest judicial authority—namely, the Lord Chancellor. It must be taken, therefore, that section 18 might have been enacted by the Legislature as laying down that a county court judge was appointed for a particular district, though it is inexplicable to me that the Legislature did not introduce words showing expressly that they were considering the judge as having been appointed as a judge of each district. That being so, I pity the judge or tribunal which has to settle the proper salary payable to the deputy after the death or resignation of the judge where the deputy was appointed only for one of the judge's courts. That problem, however, I suppose, had been solved before.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, R. W. Beckwith.

Solicitor for the county court judge, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for Solman, Oswald Hanson & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } April 4.

STACKEMANN v. PATON. (a.)

Copyright — Photograph — Infringement — Photograph "made for or on behalf of any other person for a good or a valuable consideration"—Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68), s. 1.

Where a person, without being under an obligation to make any payment, gives permission to a photographer to enter his house in order to take photographs thereof upon the chance of obtaining orders, there is a good consideration within the meaning of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, s. 1, so that the photographer cannot make use of the photographs so obtained without the consent of the person who permitted the photographs to be taken.

Witness action.

This was an action, brought to obtain an injunction, and to recover damages and penalties, in respect of the alleged infringement of the copyright in two photographs which had been taken by the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs, father and son, carried on business in partnership at Turnham Green, under the style of the Photographic Tourists' Association, as photographers and printers, and an important part of their business consisted in photographing schools.

The defendants were publishers carrying on business in Cannon-street, London, under the style of J. & J. Paton, and in 1905 they produced a publication known as Paton's List of Schools and Tutors, which contained reproductions of two photographs of schools which had been taken by the plaintiffs, and which publication they sold at 1s. 6d. per copy.

The facts with regard to one of the photographs were as follows:

In the year 1904, a traveller in the employ of the Photographic Tourists' Association called upon a Mr. Price, the head master of a school for boys, at Harrow-on-the-Hill, and requested that the association might be allowed to send a representative to take photographs of the school, intimating at the same time that the association took the photographs at their own risk, and on the chance of obtaining orders if the photographs were successful, and also that Mr. Price would not be under any obligation to pay anything.

(a.) Reported by P. W. PEGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Price, who was anxious to have some photographs taken of the school, gave his permission, and in or about the month of June, 1904, the younger plaintiff attended at the school with his photographic apparatus, and was allowed to enter and take a number of photographs, including one of the exterior of the school, the reproduction of which was complained of in this action; Mr. Price in each case directing what he wanted to be photographed. On this occasion nothing appeared to have been settled as to terms of payment.

On the 25th of July, 1904, proofs of the photographs taken were forwarded to Mr. Price by the Photographic Tourists' Association, and he ultimately purchased a number of photographs, for which he paid £15 1s. 6d.

The facts with regard to the other photograph, although not strictly proved, appeared to be that, in the year 1904, a traveller of the association called upon a Miss Cruse, the head-mistress of a school for girls at Weston-super-Mare, and made the same request as in the previous case and on similar terms, and the younger plaintiff attended at the school and was allowed to enter and take a number of photographs, including one of the dining-room, the reproduction of which was complained of in this action. Miss Cruse ultimately purchased some photographs, for which she paid 15s.

Early in the year 1905, the defendants, who were preparing their list of schools, communicated with both Mr. Price and Miss Cruse, who gave orders for the advertisement of their respective schools therein, and at the request of the defendants they respectively forwarded the photographs in question for reproduction, together with the advertisement.

The plaintiffs becoming aware of the reproduction of the photographs as aforesaid, the younger plaintiff, who had taken the photographs, registered himself as proprietor of the copyright in the photographs, on the 8th of November, 1905, and on the 10th of the same month purchased a copy of their list of schools from the defendants, which contained reproductions of the photographs complained of.

Eventually the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action, claiming damages for the alleged infringement of copyright, an injunction, and penalties.

MacSwinney, for the plaintiffs, after reading sections 1, 4, 6 and 11 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, contended that the author is the taker of the photographs: Nottage v. Jackson, 32 W. R. 106, 11 Q. B. D. 627, and Boucas v. Cooke, 52 W. R. 99, [1903] 2 K. B. 227. The sale after registration of the copies made before registration was an infringement: Tuck v. Priester, 36 W. R. 93, 19 Q. B. D. 629.

Counsel also referred to Fishburn v. Hollingshead, [1891] 2 Ch. 371, 39 W. R. Dig. 62.

Upjohn, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the defendants, contended that the plaintiffs could not sell copies of the photographs without permission obtained from Mr. Price and Miss Cruse respectively: Pollard v. Photographic Co., 37 W. R. 266, 40 Ch. D. 345. So far as regards section 1, it is a question of fact; the burden lies on the plaintiffs to show that the photographs were taken under such circumstances as to leave in the photographer the right of multiplying copies. A contract to buy copies, if they shall be good, is a contract for a good and valuable consideration. If a man comes into your house upon the terms of you allowing him to take photographs thereof, and that if they are good you will purchase, but otherwise you will not, it is an implied term of the contract on which you allow him to enter that he shall take the photographs for you, that the copyright shall be yours, and that he shall not be at liberty to multiply copies except for you: Ellis v. Marshall, 64 L. J. Q. B. 757. The copyright must be inferred to be in Mr. Price and Miss Cruse respectively. They clearly did not contemplate copies of the photographs being sold without their permission.

MacSwinney, in reply.—The onus of proof must be on the persons who attempt to take themselves out of section 1 of the above Act.

FARWELL, J., after stating certain of the facts, said that, with regard to the photograph taken of the school conducted by Miss Cruse, there is really no evidence of the arrangement under which it was taken. With regard to the photograph of the school conducted by Mr. Price, it appears that the traveller for the plaintiffs asked for permission to take some photographs, and said something to the effect that it would be at the plaintiffs' own risk. Mr. Price gave his permission, and subsequently the younger plaintiff was allowed to enter and go over the house, and take some photographs, Mr. Price telling him what he wished to have taken. In both the case of Mr. Price and of Miss Cruse certain photographs were supplied by the Photographic Tourists' Association and paid for. With regard to Miss Cruse the plaintiffs must have got less than they hoped for, as 15s. would not meet expenses. [His lordship then read section 1 of the above Act and the proviso to the section.] What is the true meaning of section 1? I think the younger plaintiff was the author of the photograph.

The question is: Were these negatives made or executed for Mr. Price and Miss Cruse respectively for a good or a valuable consideration? Now a good consideration will do as well as a valuable one. Having regard to the circumstances of Mr. Price and Miss Cruse, was it not a good consideration to allow the photographer to go over the house and take the photographs? I think that there was a good consideration. I do not think that the fact of the traveller informing Mr. Price that he would not have to take to any of the photographs or be under any obligation to pay anything makes any difference. I do not think that the case of Ellis v. Marshall is against what I have said. [His lordship then referred to the judgment of Collins, M.R., in the case of Boucas v. Cooke, in which he approved of a passage, on p. 193, of Scrutton on Copyright (4th ed.).] But it is not necessary that the customer should pay anything in order to bring himself within the benefit of section 1 of the above Act.

There may be a good, as well as a valuable consideration, and a good consideration is sufficient. I do not think the request of the photographer, for permission to take the photograph, makes any difference, but a request is not the same thing as a solicitation of orders—the question must really depend on the facts of each case. When a schoolmaster at the request of a photographer allows him to enter a school in order to take photographs thereof, there is a good consideration, so that the photographer cannot make use of the photographs so obtained without the consent of the person, who directed the photographs to be taken. I therefore dismiss the action with costs.

Solicitors, T. F. Peacock, Fisher, & Chavasse; Martin & Watkins.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } May 1.

In re MELSON & CO. (LIMITED) (a.).

Company—Winding up—Assets covered by debentures—Business of company carried on by debenture-holders—Petition to wind up—Just and equitable—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 79.

The business of a company was being carried on by the debenture-holders. A receiver had not been appointed. All the assets were charged by the debentures. The balance-sheet showed a surplus available for unsecured creditors. A judgment creditor presented a petition to have the company wound up by the court compulsorily.

Held, that, assuming that the assets were insufficient to satisfy the claims of the debenture-holders, the court was entitled to exercise the discretion vested in it under section 79 of the Companies Act, 1862, and wind up a company so conducted. The court, however, was not satisfied on the evidence that the order would be barren, and ordered the company to be wound up.

This was a petition to wind up the above company presented by the Bradford Dyers' Association (Limited), who had recovered judgment against the company for £98 15s. 3d. in an action for goods sold and delivered in December, 1905.

The company was incorporated in 1897 with a nominal capital of £10,000; the paid-up capital, according to the last balance-sheet, was £2,507.

In 1897 the company created £3,000 first debentures which were charged upon the undertaking of the company and all its property both present and future, and were further secured by a debenture trust deed. Of the above sum of £3,000 an amount of £300 was paid off, and in 1901 the balance of £2,700 was transferred to F. Baring Gould, who at the same time received from the company a third debenture for £300 by way of premium.

In the same year second debentures for £2,500 were issued to A. Melson, the vendor to the company. These contained a similar charge, and the second and third debentures were further secured by another trust deed. The £2,500 secured by the second debentures were in fact provided as to £1,100 by F. Baring Gould and as to £1,400 by S. S. Seal, the solicitor to the company.

In March, 1906 prior lien debentures were granted to F. Baring Gould and H. K. Paxton to secure the sum of £1,000 and at the date of the petition the amount of £6,500, irrespective of interest, was outstanding on the debentures.

On threatening to issue execution the petitioners discovered that the business of the company was being carried on in the name of the company by the debenture-holders, who were in possession of all its assets. A receiver had not been appointed.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the petitioner.—If the figures in the balance-sheet of 1905 can be relied on there should be a surplus available for the payment of the unsecured creditors, and in that case there is no answer to the petition. Assuming, however, that the assets are insufficient to pay the debenture-holders in full, there can be no answer where the company is being kept on foot, not for the purpose of carrying on the business for which it was constituted, but solely in the interests of the debenture-holders. In this state of facts it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up: In re Chic (Limited), 53 W. R. 659, [1905] 2 Ch. 345.

Kirby, for the company.—It is in the interest of everybody concerned that the business should be carried on for a further period; for some time to come the debenture-holders only will reap the benefit. Ultimately there may be some advantage to the ordinary creditors, who can receive nothing if a winding-up order is made, as the debentures more than exhaust the assets.

BUCKLEY, J.—This is a company which has a paid-up capital of £2,507, and a debt on debentures constituting a charge on all the assets of the company to the amount of £6,500. The petitioners are judgment creditors in respect of a sum of £98 15s. 3d., recovered by them in an action in December, 1905. Of the debenture debt £1,000 was borrowed on the security of prior lien debentures in March, 1906—that is to say, after the date on which the judgment had been obtained. The company say that all the assets are charged by the debentures, and are not sufficient to pay them, and that if an order is made there will be no assets to administer in the winding up. If that is so, the company are not really and in substance carrying on business at all. It is the debenture-holders who are carrying on the business of the company and using its credit for that purpose. In doing so they are placing themselves in such a position that by ordering goods in the name of the company and incurring debts for which the company are liable they are able to avail themselves of the law to which I drew attention in In re London Pressed Hinge Co. (Limited), Campbell v. The Company, 53 W. R. 407, [1905] 1 Ch. 576. By the appointment of a receiver they can sweep away all the assets of the company. This seems to me to be a state of things which ought not to be allowed. In the earlier cases, In re St. Thomas' Dock Co., 24 W. R. 544, 2 Ch. D. 116, and In re Chapel House Colliery Co., 31 W. R. 933, 24 Ch D 659, the principle had been adopted that a creditor who applied for a winding-up order, where other creditors opposed, must show that there was some expectation of obtaining payment. Those cases, however, were decided long before debentures had reached their modern development. It has never been laid down that the court was obliged to refuse the order in cases where other creditors did not oppose, but merely that the petitioning creditor is not entitled to an order ex debito justitiæ. The court has a discretion in dealing with the matter, and may under section 91 of the Companies Act, 1862, have regard to the wishes of the other creditors and can refuse the order although the creditor is unpaid. I do not think there exists in those cases anything which obliges me to say that the court is bound to exercise that discretion by refusing, at the instance of the company, to make the order on the ground that there would be nothing for the unsecured creditors. I think I am entitled to say under section 79 of the Companies Act, 1862, that a company conducted under such circumstances ought not to go on, and that there ought to be a winding-up order.

It is said that the company has no surplus assets. On the facts put forward by the company I am not satisfied that they represent the true position of affairs. The balance-sheet of 1905 shows a surplus of assets over liabilities of nearly £3,000, and unless the "overdraft of A. Melson, £3,787" is bad, as to which I have no evidence, there would on that balance-sheet be assets for the payment of something beyond what is due to the debenture-holders for principal and interest. I am therefore not satisfied that the order would be barren.

I ought to add this with regard to the holding of the debentures. Mr. Baring Gould holds £2,700 first debentures, £1,100 second debentures, £300 third debentures, and £500 prior lien debentures. £500 prior lien debentures are held by Mr. Paxton and

(a.) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£1,400 second debentures by Mr. Seal. It is therefore obvious that the persons substantially carrying on the business are not the company, but a limited number of individuals. In that state of facts I think I ought to make the usual compulsory winding-up order.

Petition allowed.

Solicitors for the petitioners, Wynne-Baxter & Keeble, for Banks, Newell, & Hammond, Bradford.

Solicitor for the company, S. S. Seal.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) Dec. 19, 1905.

TYLER (Appellant) v. FERRIS (Respondent). (a.)

Weights and measures — Prosecution by inspector — "Consent" of local authority — General consent — Weights and Measures Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 28), s. 14.

It is not necessary under section 14 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1904, which provides that an inspector of weights and measures may, with the consent of the local authority, prosecute before a court of summary jurisdiction any information, complaint, or proceeding arising under that Act, that a separate consent be given by the local authority in each particular case; a general consent to their inspector to prosecute in such cases being sufficient.

Case stated by justices.

An information was preferred by the appellant, an inspector of weights and measures for the county of Middlesex, under section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, against the respondent, a butcher carrying on business at Chiswick, for having on the 8th of February, 1905, in his possession for use for trade a two pound weight which was unjust.

The case stated that the appellant had the consent of the local authority to prosecute generally before a court of summary jurisdiction or justice any information, complaint, or proceeding arising under the Weights and Measures Acts, but the local authority did not specifically direct the prosecution, that such consent was contained in a resolution of the Middlesex County Council passed on the 23rd of February, 1905, which was as follows: "That the county council do hereby consent to Mr. Walter Tyler, the inspector of weights and measures for the western district of the county of Middlesex, prosecuting before a court of summary jurisdiction or justices any information, complaint, or proceeding arising under the Weights and Measures Acts, or in the discharge of his duty as such inspector."

It was contended on behalf the respondent that under section 14 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1904, a special consent must be obtained by an inspector for every separate information, complaint, or proceeding prosecuted by him under the Weights and Measures Acts, and that the general consent produced by the appellant was not sufficient.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the consent produced by the appellant was a sufficient consent within the meaning of the section, and that there was no obligation to obtain a separate consent for each separate prosecution.

The justices found that the respondent had committed an offence under section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, but they were of opinion that the consent produced was not in law a sufficient consent within the meaning of section 14 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1904, and that under that section an inspector must obtain a special consent for each separate prosecution. They accordingly dismissed the information.

The inspector appealed.

Eustace Hills, for the appellant, having read the case, the court called on Clarke Hall, for the respondent.—In all previous statutes enabling officials of public bodies to conduct prosecutions before justices it has been provided that the person so enabled shall do so with the direct authority of, or be authorized by, the body employing him: Isle of Wight Ferry Co. v. Ryde Commissioners, 25 J. P. 454. In the Weights and Measures Act of 1904 the word "consent" is used, whereas in all previous Acts the word used is "authorized" or "empowered": see for example section 68 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict c. 101), section 259 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), and section 120 of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1901. The limited power to prosecute delegated by the word "consent" must refer to a particular consent given in a particular case. It has a restrictive meaning. In Reg. v. Turner, 58 J. P. 320, the difference between "consent" and "authority" was considered, and it was held by Cave and Wright, JJ., that in prosecutions for taking game without a licence the supervisor of the Inland Revenue for the district had a right to conduct the case, a general authority given to him by the commissioners being a sufficient compliance with 53 & 54 Vict c. 21, s. 27. If this section 14 was not intended to be restrictive, but was merely permissive, the section was unnecessary. It is suggested that it was inserted in the Act to protect local authorities from unnecessary proceedings being instituted by over-zealous officials.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case an ingenious argument has been raised by counsel for the respondent founded upon the use of the word "consent" in section 14 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1904, which directs than an inspector of weights and measures may, with the consent of the local authority, prosecute before a court of summary jurisdiction or justices any information, complaint, or proceeding arising under the Act or in the discharge of his duties as such inspector. There have been several Acts of Parliament allowing local authorities and other public bodies to authorize their officials to take proceedings before justices, and it was argued that because in this Act it is provided that the inspector may take proceedings "with the consent of the local authority" the use of the word "consent" instead of "authority" shows that the consent must be specially given in each particular case. I do not agree with that argument. In my opinion section 14 provides that an inspector is a person who may conduct prosecutions if the local authority consent to his doing so. As my brother Ridley, J., has pointed out, if such a substantial change had been contemplated clearer words in explanation would no doubt have been used. The case must go back to the justices for them to convict.

LAWRANCE and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Sir Richard Nicholson.

Solicitor for the respondent, W. T. Ricketts.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K. B. Div.
(Ridley and Darling, JJ.) } Dec. 14.

GREAT CENTRAL RAILWAY CO. v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF BANBURY UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Railway—Rateable value—Interest on cost of construction—Competitive value.

The appellants (the Great Central Railway Co.) constructed a railway about eight miles in length connecting their line with the Great Western Railway Co. in pursuance of an arrangement entered into with that company. The cost of constructing the line was £280,000, and that sum was advanced to the appellants by the Great Western Railway Co. at 3 per cent. interest per annum. There were no stations or sidings on the line, nor does the line itself originate any traffic. The whole traffic on the line consists of through traffic passing from the appellants' line to that of the Great Western Railway Co., and it was admitted that persons other than the two above-mentioned railway companies could not be found to acquire the line.

Held, that, in ascertaining the rateable value, interest on the cost of construction was not an element which could be taken into account.

A case stated by the quarter sessions for Oxfordshire on an appeal against a poor rate made on the 19th of May, 1904, for the parish of Wardington, in which that part of the appellants' line of railway which lay in the said parish was rated at £1,390 gross estimated rental and £795 rateable value.

The total length of the line, which runs from the parish of Eydon, in the county of Northampton, to the parish of Warkworth, in the county of Oxford, is eight miles eighteen chains, of which one mile forty-seven chains are in the parish of Wardington. This line of eight miles eighteen chains is connected at the northern end with the appellants' line at Woodford, and at the southern end with the line of the Great Western Railway Co. at Banbury, thus forming a main line route from the north to the south and west of England.

The line was constructed by the appellants in accordance with an arrangement made with the Great Western Railway Co. for the more convenient interchange of traffic, and under the powers of the Great Central Railway Act, 1897, and was opened for traffic in 1900.

The cost of constructing the line was approximately £280,000; and in pursuance of the said arrangement, and under the provisions of the said Act, the Great Western Railway Co. advanced to the appellants the sum of £280,000, at the rate of interest of 3½ per cent. per annum.

It was not suggested that there had been any change in the conditions affecting the two companies since the passing of the Act.

There are no stations or sidings on the line, nor does the line itself originate any traffic.

The whole traffic on the line consists of through traffic passing from the appellants' system to that of the Great Western Railway Co., and vice versâ.

It was admitted that persons or companies other than the appellants and the Great Western Railway could not be found to acquire the line.

It was not disputed that the only advantage or use of the line to the appellants and the Great Western Railway Co. arises during the existence of an agreement for the mutual interchange of traffic, and that in the absence of such an agreement the line would be of no value, and could not be let to either the appellants or the Great Western Railway Co.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

For the appellants it was contended that inasmuch as the line is an integral portion of the undertaking of the appellants its rateable value in the parish of Wardington must depend on the actual net earnings of the line within the parish, such earnings being obtained owing to the mutual agreement for interchange of traffic above mentioned, and that to ascertain such net earnings there must be allocated to the line in the parish a mileague proportion of all rates and fares received by the appellants and the Great Western Railway Co. for the whole journey in respect of all traffic passing over the line, and from the receipts so ascertained there must be deducted the usual and proper allowances for working expenses, Government duty, rental of stations separately assessed, trade profits, interest on tenants' capital, and the statutory deductions for maintenance and renewal. Assessed on this principle the agreed rateable value of the line was £64 per mile, and the rateable value of the line within the parish of Wardington was £102.

For the respondents it was contended that the assessment committee in ascertaining the rateable value of this property were entitled to take into account the 3½ per cent. interest paid by the appellants to the Great Western Railway Co. on the sum of £280,000 advanced by the latter to the appellants for the purpose of constructing the line in question in accordance with the Great Central Railway Act, 1897, and that the interest might properly be regarded as evidence of the rent which either the appellants or the Great Western Railway Co. were prepared to pay for the line, and that as such it was uncontradicted, and that the interest, being at the rate of far more than £1,000 per mile, was evidence that the appellants would be willing to give a rent for the line in the parish sufficient to support the rate appealed against, and that the geographical position of the said line indicated that it had a value apart from the actual net earnings on the line, and in the alternative that the line might reasonably be expected to let to the appellants or to the Great Western Railway Co. at such a percentage of the gross receipts of the traffic carried upon it as would justify the assessment appealed against.

The court of quarter sessions overruled the contention of the appellants that the mileage proportion of receipts should be the sole basis of valuation, and held that interest on the cost of construction of the line was a matter which they were entitled to take into account as an element of calculation in ascertaining the rateable value, and having so taken it into account, they determined that the property would properly be assessed at £1,390 gross estimated rental and £795 rateable value.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the appellants were right in their contention or whether in the particular circumstances the interest on the cost of construction of the line was an element which might properly be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value.

It was agreed that if the court should be of opinion that the appellants were right in their contention the appeal should be allowed, and the assessment of the line within the parish reduced to £593 gross estimated rental and £102 rateable value.

Balfour Browne, K.C. (Sir E. Boyle, K.C., and Snagge with him), for the appellants.—The quarter sessions have adopted a wrong principle. They were not entitled to take into account the cost of construction. The proper test was, what would a hypothetical tenant pay from year to year for the line?

He cited North and South-West Junction Railway v. Brentford Union Assessment Committee, 13 App. Cas.

592, and London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Irthlingborough Churchwardens, 33 L. T. 327.

Ryde (Cecil Walsh with him), for the respondent.—This line has a competitive value as providing an alternative through route, and that cannot be left out of account in determining the rateable value: London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Cannock Churchwardens, 9 L. T. 325. The quarter sessions were entitled to consider the interest on cost of construction as rent: Reg v. Eastern Counties Railway Co., 2 W. R. 160, 23 L. J. M. C. 90*n*, and South-Eastern Railway v. Dorking Overseers, 3 E. & B. 491.

Balfour Browne, K.C., replied.

LAWRANCE, J.—In this case my judgment must be for the appellants. The case appears to me to be a very simple one. The two companies, the Great Western Railway Co. and the Great Central Railway Co., were the only two companies concerned in the line; no third company could by any possibility work it or have any interest in it. To find the capital for making the line it was agreed between these two companies that the Great Western should advance £280,000 at 3½ per cent. The Great Western Co. were thus interested in the matter. That having been done, what is the proper principle upon which this piece of line is to be assessed? It is said by the appellants that the rateable value must depend upon the actual net earnings of the line in the parish. On the other hand it is said that as the Great Central paid 3½ per cent. upon £280,000, that is a rent which must be taken into consideration in arriving at the value of the line. In my judgment the latter contention cannot be sustained. It seems to me that wherever it can be done we must ascertain what rent would be given for the line by a hypothetical tenant from year to year who was in a position to work it. A hypothetical tenant would say: "What can I make out of it? What are the earnings? I do not care what the line may have cost; that makes no difference to me and does not affect my power of making a profit out of it." There is nothing in the case to show that the line was worth more than it was earning. I can imagine a case where a line might be more valuable than its earnings. There might be a competition for it. In most of the cases cited for the respondents there were competitors who were anxious to buy the line. Here there is no such competition, as the two companies do not compete with each other, and the moment they cease acting together the value of the line is gone. The question, as I have said, is, what would a hypothetical tenant give for the line? As it seems to me, such a tenant would be guided simply and solely by what he might hope to get out of it. I therefore think that the conclusion arrived at by the quarter sessions was wrong, and that the appellants' contention is right.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. I am satisfied by the argument on behalf of the appellants that, taking the basis for which they contend, no advantages have been omitted to be taken into consideration in ascertaining the net earnings of this line. I therefore think that, if we come to the conclusion that the principle of assessment which the appellants contend for is right, they have correctly stated how the amount of rate should be arrived at. As to the respondents' contention that the interest paid on the £280,000 should be taken into account, I am satisfied that that is wrong. I entirely agree with the reasons given by my brother Lawrance on that point. The cases cited by the respondents do not seem to me to support their contention. In South-Eastern Railway v. Dorking Overseers, a railway having been constructed between Reading and Reigate, the South-Eastern Railway obtained a lease for a thousand years at a rent equal to £5 10s. per cent. on the capital raised by the company which constructed the line. Some years later a different arrangement was made, by which the South-Eastern Co. bought of the other company upon the terms of paying to the shareholders of the absorbed company certain perpetual annuities. The court decided that neither the rent under the lease nor the annuities payable under the amalgamating Act was necessarily the criterion of the rateable value; that the rateable value depended upon the present annual value of the line, and might be more or less than the sum which the parties had agreed to give for it. The interest in itself had nothing to do with the rateable value. In Reg. v. Bedford Union Assessment Committee there was evidence that the competing companies would be willing to acquire the line upon the same terms as it was held by the North-Western Co., and the court said that this must be taken into account in determining the rent at which the line might be expected to let from year to year. In London and North-Western Railway v. Irthlingborough Co. Blackburn, J., expressly said that the cost of construction was quite irrelevant to the question of rating, which depended only upon what a hypothetical tenant would pay from year to year.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, D. H. Davies.

Solicitors for the respondents, Hopwood & Sons, for E. Lamley Fisher, Banbury.

K. B. Div. (Channell, J.) — Nov. 1, 2.

SMAILES & SON v. HANS DESSEN & CO. (a.)

Ship — Charter-party — Demurrage — Discharging in customary manner—Discharging subject to lien—Time when such discharge can take place—Barry Port—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 493, 494.

A charter-party provided for the discharge of a vessel to be "in the manner and at the rate customary at each port during the customary working hours, and if the ship be further detained through the fault of the charterers, ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at twenty pounds per day." Until it is clear that the ship cannot be discharged within the time allowed, the shipowner cannot insist on landing the cargo, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, subject to a lien.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs' claim was for £160 for eight days' demurrage of the steamship Mutual, for a declaration that they were entitled to a lien on the cargo shipped on the steamship Mutual, and upon £160 deposited in respect of the said demurrage and payment of that deposit; and for damages for breach of contract contained in a bill of lading.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Mutual.

The defendants were taken to be the indorsees of a bill of lading referring to goods carried on the said vessel.

Messrs. Capper, Alexander, & Co., were the charterers of the vessel, and they had sold a quantity of pit-props to the shipper, one Schaumann.

The bill of lading was as follows: "Jakobstad,

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 15th, 1904.—Shipped in good order and condition by W. Schaumann . . . upon the steamship Mutual . . . now lying in the port of Jakobstad and bound for Barry, 765 cubic fathoms pit-props . . . to be delivered in the like good order and condition at . . . Barry (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation of whatsoever nature or kind excepted) unto order he or they paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions according to the charter-party, London, May 4th, 1904 . . . quantity and quality unknown."

The charter-party was as follows: "London, May 4th, 1904, . . . agreed between Messrs. Smailes & Son, owners of the steamship Mutual . . . and Capper, Alexander, & Co., agents for merchants, that the said steamship . . . shall . . . proceed to Jackobstad . . . and there load . . . a full and complete cargo of usual short pit-props . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to one of the destinations hereinafter mentioned at charterer's option . . . and there deliver the same, at such wharf or in such dock or berth as ordered always afloat, freight to be paid as follows: Cardiff, Barry, Newport, or Port Talbot, one port only, at 25s. all per cubic fathom delivered as ascertained in the customary manner at place of discharge in full of all port charges and pilotages as customary . . . The cargo to be supplied to and received from the steamer in the manner and at the rate customary at each port during customary working hours, and if the ship be further detained through the fault of the charterers, ten days of demurrage, over and above the said laying days at twenty pounds per day . . . Owners to have an absolute lien on cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage in consideration whereof charterer's liability to cease on shipment of cargo. . . . "

The steamship Mutual loaded her cargo and arrived at Barry on the 26th of June, 1904.

Owing to certain disputes it was not until the 4th of July that orders were given for berthing the vessel. The next day (the 5th of July), there being an advance of part of the freight, the discharge was commenced to the Barry Railway Co. At Barry the Barry Railway Co. do the discharging.

The discharge was stopped on the 7th of July because the balance of the freight had not been paid.

On the 8th of July the defendants were appointed agents for the shipper.

The balance of freight remained unpaid on the 13th of July, and under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, ss. 493, 494, notice was given by the plaintiffs to the Barry Dock Railway Co. to discharge the cargo subject to lien for freight and demurrage.

The discharge subject to lien commenced on the 15th of July and was completed on the 21st of July. The discharge could have been completed on the 13th of July in the ordinary course of events.

In order to prevent a sale of the goods (after the expiration of ninety days after the discharge subject to lien, under section 497 of the Act of 1894) the defendants deposited £160 with the Barry Railway Co. and received the goods, the freight having been paid.

The claim (iv.) for damages for breach of the contract in the bill of lading referred to the delay in commencing to unload the vessel on her arrival, and for the purposes of this report has not been dealt with.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 493 (1): "Where the owner of any goods imported in any ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom fails to make entry thereof, or having made entry thereof to land the same or take delivery thereof, and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed, by the times severally hereinafter mentioned, the shipowner may make entry of and land or unship the goods at the following times: (a) If a time for the delivery of the goods is expressed in the charter-party, bill of lading, or agreement, then at any time after the time so expressed. (b) If no time for the delivery of the goods is expressed in the charter-party, bill of lading, or agreement, then at any time after the expiration of seventy-two hours, exclusive of a Sunday or holiday, from the time of the report of the ship."

Section 494: "If at the time when any goods are landed from any ship and placed in the custody of any person as wharfinger or warehouseman, the shipowner gives to the wharfinger or warehouseman notice in writing that the goods are to remain subject to a lien for freight or other charges payable to the shipowner to an amount mentioned in the notice, the goods so landed shall, in the hands of the wharfinger or warehouseman, continue subject to the same lien, if any, for such charges as they were subject to before the landing thereof; and the wharfinger or warehouseman receiving those goods shall retain them until the lien is discharged as hereinafter mentioned, and shall, if he fails so to do, make good to the shipowner any loss thereby occasioned to him."

Scrutton, K.C., Adair Roche, and H. L. Tebbs, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs were landing the cargo from the 5th of July to the 7th of July in the customary manner, through the Barry Railway Co., as agents for the shipper. The cargo was landed at the earliest time allowed by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and could not have been landed subject to lien, under that Act, between the 7th of July and the 13th of July. Under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the shipowner cannot insist upon landing the goods subject to lien for freight until the time has arrived when it is clear that the owner of the goods cannot take them within the demurrage days. The plaintiffs acted reasonably: Hick v. Raymond & Reid, 41 W. R. 384, [1893] App. Cas. 22.

Robson, K.C., and Bailhache, for the defendants.—The discharge should not have been stopped on the 7th of July. The plaintiffs should have landed the cargo subject to lien under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. That would have diminished the damages. The vessel should not have been used as a warehouse: Lyle Shipping Co v. Corporation of Cardiff, 49 W. R. 85, [1900] 2 K. B. 638; Modesto Pineiro & Co. v. Du Pré & Co., 7 Com. Cas. 105; Moller v. Young, 4 W. R. 149, 24 L. J. Q. B. 217.

CHANNELL, J.—The claim is for a contract demurrage under the terms of the charter-party, and the point in dispute arises in consequence of the stoppage of the discharge after it had once begun. The shipper's agent started to take the discharge. Then, having started to take it, the shipowner, through his agent, having got an advance of freight, said nothing about the payment of freight when the first quantities of the timber were being delivered, but when he had delivered a quantity upon which he thought the freight would not be covered by the advance he then began to ask for his freight, and to threaten, if he was not paid, to exercise a lien for it. He was not paid, and he stopped the discharge. Now, the principal point is whether he could, and, if he could, whether he ought then to have acted on the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, and have got his lien preserved for him by the dock company instead of turning his ship into a warehouse, as the expression is, and keeping the goods there in exercise of his lien. Now as to that, assuming that he could have done it, I think the cases are quite clear that it is a question whether or not it was reasonable for him to do it. The ordinary principles of the law in reference to damages apply—that a man may not increase damages by unreasonable conduct. He is bound to act not only in his own interests, but in the interests of the party who would have to pay the damages, and keep down the damages, so far as it is reasonable and proper, by acting reasonably in the matter. That is the general rule with reference to damages, and this seems to be only one illustration of it. The provisions in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, of course, have been enacted for the very purposes of preventing large damage arising from the detention of a vessel, which often is an extremely expensive matter, and to give a means of securing the shipowner for his freight, or anything else that he has a lien for, without incurring the large expenses of detaining the vessel. That is the very object with which the enactment was made. Therefore, if he can do it, and if there is nothing to make it unreasonable for him to do it, I think, as Bigham, J., and Kennedy, J., seem to have said, that under these circumstances he would not be able to recover the large amount which the damage would probably reach. It is a case in which it would go in mitigation of damages. I do not think there is anything in the case of Moller v. Young to the contrary. But one has two propositions to consider: First of all, whether the shipowner was in a position to exercise his rights under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; and, secondly, if he was, whether it was reasonable or unreasonable to do it; and the general circumstances show whether his conduct was reasonable or unreasonable. Now I certainly thought, at first, reading section 491 of the Act of 1894, that "if at the time when any goods are landed" would cover the time when any goods have been landed, and that in this case as the landing in point of fact was going on, that it might have been continued, and that instead of stopping the discharge the shipowner might have given to the dock company a notice that as to any goods landed after that date they were to be held by them subject to his lien. These words cannot refer to goods which have been landed, when you consider it, because as to them the lien would have gone when the possession was parted with; and so they must mean when goods are being landed the shipowner gives a notice in writing that the goods which are to be landed subsequent to that are to be subject to the lien. I cannot therefore say that these goods were at the time of the stoppage of the discharge "landed" within the meaning of section 494, and the only question is as to the right to land them.

Section 493 of the Act of 1894 gives the shipowner power to land them when there has been a default by the owner of the goods; and for the purpose of seeing whether he has a right to land them you have to see whether there has been a default. Now in this case when you come to look at it there was not at the time when the discharge was stopped any default by the owner of the goods. He was still within the time. He was not taking them at the moment because he was not paying the freight, the payment of which, concurrently with the delivery of the goods, was a thing entitling him to have them delivered, so that unless he had his money for the freight he was not getting the goods, but he had still a certain number of days within which to pay and take them, because the contract gives the customary time plus so many days of demurrage. On the whole, therefore, although at first I certainly thought the contrary, I think that the position was that the shipowner could not insist upon landing the goods subject to a lien for freight until the time had arrived when it was clear that the owner of the goods could not take them within his demurrage days. I do not think it is to the end of the demurrage days, but a time so near to the end of the demurrage days that it would be impracticable to take delivery of them within the time. Then he would be in a position to say the owner is in default under section 493, and then he would be able to exercise the power of section 493, and exercising the power contained in section 493 he could then give the notice that the goods were to remain on his lien for freight. That being so, at this particular time the thing could not have been done except possibly by the consent of the parties. I am not dealing with what could have been done by consent, but what there was an absolute right to do. If I had to decide it on the ground of reasonableness I think there is a good deal to be said about it. I am quite clear that if they had been landed there would have been ninety days before the shipowner could have insisted upon the goods being sold, because that is what it is. I am not at all sure whether that would of itself have made the thing unreasonable. The ninety days are given by the statute because the case contemplated is where there is some real difficulty about the ownership of the goods, where a consignee cannot be found, and there is nobody there, and it is necessary of course to give a considerable time before the goods are sold in order to clear up the dispute which is supposed to exist. I do not feel quite sure that that in itself is enough; on the other hand, there is something in the argument that when, as in the present case, the shipowner has reason to think that if he stands firm and says, "Now I am going to stand upon my lien, and there will be demurrage to my ship; you had much better pay," he has reason to think the thing is so near being settled that it is likely to be settled to-morrow, which, I think, was the present case or getting near enough to it. I think one would be inclined on the whole to find, and I think a jury most likely would find, that his conduct was reasonable. However I think in this case my decision is based not so much on a finding of fact that his conduct was reasonable. I do not find it to be unreasonable, but I am not quite clear about that point. I think when you come to look at the thing the real truth is that he was not in a position to do it. On the whole I think the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

There will be a declaration under (i.), (ii.), (iii.) of the claim that the plaintiffs are entitled to a lien for £160 demurrage and judgment for that amount.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Botterell & Roche.

Solicitors for the defendants, Trinder, Capron, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 9, 12, 13; March 8.

VILLAR v. GILBEY. (a.)

Will—Construction—Devise to children born in the testator's lifetime—Divesting clause—Child en ventre sa mère.

Primâ facie, in the absence of sufficiently weighty considerations to the contrary, for the purposes of devolu- tion of property in connection with intestacies or wills, no distinction ought to be drawn between a child born at a particular time and a child en ventre sa mère at that time and subsequently born alive. This rule applies generally and not merely in cases where it is for the benefit of the child.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

Blasson v. Blasson, 13 W. R. 113, is overruled on this point, and cannot be supported except on the ground that the language of the particular will there in question prevented the application of the general principle above stated.

Decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (53 W. R. 508, [1905] 2 Ch. 301), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (reported 53 W. R. 658, [1905] 2 Ch. 301).

George William Rush, the testator in the action, by his will dated the 22nd of June, 1854, devised his real estate to his brother Alfred for life, with remainder to Alfred's eldest son, Alfred George Anderson Rush, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail, with remainder to his daughters in tail, with remainder to Alfred's second son, George Acland Gordon Rush, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail, with remainder to his daughters in tail. "And in default of such issue the testator gave and devised the same estates unto the third, fourth, and every other son and sons of the body of the testator's said brother Alfred Rush severally, successively, and in remainder one after another according to priority of birth and to the heirs of the body and bodies of such son and sons lawfully issuing, the elder of such son and sons and the heirs of his body being always preferred before a younger son and sons, but the testator declared his intention to be that any third or other son or sons of his said brother born in the testator's lifetime should not take a larger interest in the said estates than for life only, with remainder to his issue in tail male, and then in tail female in all respects as near as might be as was thereinbefore declared with respect to his said two nephews then living and their issue in tail, with divers remainders over."

The testator died on the 18th of September, 1854. His brother Alfred Rush had six children, of whom the two eldest were the sons named in the will. A third son, William Beaumorice Rush, was born on the 9th of October, 1854, within one month of the testator's death, and a fourth son was born about two years afterwards.

Alfred George Anderson Rush died on the 2nd of May, 1879, without ever having had issue.

William Beaumorice Rush was adjudicated bankrupt on the 1st of December, 1882.

On the 1st of August, 1883, his trustee in bankruptcy conveyed to H. D. Bishop the life interest of William Beaumorice Rush under the testator's will, and on the 12th of June, 1884, H. D. Bishop conveyed all his interest under the said indenture of the 1st of August, 1883, to the plaintiff.

The bankruptcy was closed by order of the court on the 23rd of February, 1895, and the official receiver thereupon became trustee of the estate of William Beaumorice Rush.

George Acland Gordon Rush died on the 2nd of November, 1903, without ever having had issue.

By an indenture dated the 2nd of February, 1905, and enrolled as a disentailing deed, the official receiver conveyed the estates devised to William Beaumorice Rush to the plaintiff in fee simple.

The plaintiff brought the present action to obtain a declaration that the estate taken by William Beaumorice Rush under the testator's will was an estate tail and not an estate for life.

The defendant was the purchaser from Alfred Rush's fourth son of the estate tail given him by the will.

In all dealings prior to the disentailing deed it had been assumed that the estate taken by William Beaumorice Rush under the will was an estate for life only.

Swinfen Eady, J., held that the words "born in my lifetime" must be taken in their natural sense, and the third son's estate was not cut down to an estate for life.

The defendant appealed.

Warmington, K.C., Micklem, K.C., and Wace, for the appellant.—The child en ventre sa mère must be considered as living at the testator's death for all purposes: Doe d., Lancashire v. Lancashire, 5 T. R. 49; Doe v. Clarke, 2 H. Bl. 399; Trower v. Butts, 1 Sim. & S. 181; In re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows, 43 W. R. 683, [1895] 2 Ch. 497; In re Wilmer's Trusts, 51 W. R. 395, [1903] 2 Ch. 411. The will does not contain the gift of an estate tail and then a subsequent cutting down of that gift to a life estate but the words must be all read together and in the events that have happened there is only one gift, and that is of a life estate: Pearce v. Carrington, 21 W. R. 729, L. R. 8 Ch. 969.

Eve, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the respondent—The rule is that a child en ventre sa mere is only to be reckoned as living if it will be for the child's own benefit: Blasson v. Blasson, 13 W. R. 113, 2 De G. J. & S. 655. This is not a case of alternative gift It is a cutting down clause in a form well known to conveyancers.

Micklem, K.C., replied.

Long v. Blackall, 7 T. R. 100; Goodtitle v. Wood, Willis 211; Thelluson v. Woodford, 7 Ves. 227; Reev v. Long, 1 Salk. 227; Richards v. Richards, Johns 754. 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 23; Clarke v. Blake, 2 Bro. C. C. 319 note; Beale v. Beale, 1 P. Wms. 244, were also cited.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following written judgment was first delivered by ROMER, L.J.—A long series of cases has established that, for purposes of succession to property on an intestacy and for many purposes connected with wills and their construction, a child en ventre sa mère at a particular time, who is subsequently born alive, is to be considered as "living" or "born" at that time. The following are examples: If the owner of an estate in fee simple dies intestate and there is a child en ventre sa mère at the date of the death who, if then born, would be heir, and that child is subseqently born alive, that child succeeds as heir; although in that particular case, owing to the exigencies of the common law requiring a tenant to the præcipe, the child would not be entitled to the rents of the estate between the death of the intestate and the birth: Richards v. Richards. In the case of intestacy as to personal estate, a child en ventre sa mère, subsequently born alive, shares as if living at the date of the death of the intestate: Wallis v. Hodson, 2 Atk. 113. In case of a will, in the absence of any context negativing that view, under a gift to the children of A. "living" at a particular time (Doe v. Clarke), or "born" at such time (Trower v. Butts), a child of A., en ventre sa mère at that time, and subsequently born alive, shares; and views to the contrary that had been expressed by some judges (and in particular by Kenyon, M.R.) are unsound. The reason was pithily put by Leach, V.C., in Trower v. Butts thus—"because the potential existence of such a child places it plainly within the reason and motive of the gift," a reason which may well be applied to the provision in the will in the present case on which the question before us turns. Nor is the rule limited to cases where the gift is for the benefit of the child itself: see Pearce v. Carrington and In re Burrows. In Doe d. Lancashire it was decided under the old law that marriage and the birth of a posthumous child revoked a will made before marriage. Again, it has long been held, with regard to questions of perpetuity under a will, that a child en ventre sa mère at the time of the testator's death, who is subsequently born alive, must be treated as having been alive at the testator's death: see In re Wilmer's Trusts, [1903] 2 Ch. 411, and cases there cited: In addition to these cases I may refer to what was said by Buller, J., with reference to the recognition by the law of a child en ventre sa mère in Thellusson v. Woodford: "He may be vouched to a recovery, though it is for the purpose of making him answer over in value. He may be an executor. He may take under the Statute of Distributions. He may take by devise. He may be entitled under a charge for raising portions. He may have an injunction; and he may have a guardian." And in the Thellusson Act the Legislature was careful with regard to accumulation by will from the death of the testator during minority, to provide that it might be during minority of any person "living en ventre sa mère" at the death of the testator.

The question now arises what conclusion ought to be drawn from the very varied circumstances pointed out above in which a child en ventre sa mère at a given time and subsequently born alive has been treated as if born at that time. Are these varied circumstances to be treated as having given rise to decisions only establishing several isolated and different rules governed by no common principle; or is there not some general underlying principle to account for the varied decisions? It appears to me impossible to suppose that there is no such general underlying principle. It cannot be said that the principle is limited to cases in which the benefit of the child is concerned. The modern authorities are opposed to that limitation, and, indeed, so are some of the older authorities. For example, I take it that the decisions establishing that a will is revoked by marriage and the birth of a posthumous child would be applicable even if the person benefited by the revocation were the widow and not the child, as might be the case. What, then, is the general underlying principle? The full extent of it may be matter of doubt. But I am driven to the conclusion, from a consideration of the many varied circumstances I have referred to above, that the principle at any rate goes to this extent—that primâ facie, in the absence of sufficiently weighty considerations to the contrary, for the purposes of devolution of property in connection with intestacies or wills, no distinction ought to be drawn between a child born at a particular time and a child at that time en ventre sa mère and subsequently born alive. In particular, I think, with regard to wills, that they ought to be construed and given effect to without making any such distinction, unless the context requires a distinction to be made. The only case which appears to militate against this view is that of Blasson v. Blasson, a decision of Westbury, L.C. That decision, amongst modern cases, stands alone and opposed to the general current of authority in drawing the distinction I have been dealing with, unless the judgment be founded on the special governing words in the will of the testatrix there dealt with, those words being "children . . . born and living at the time of my decease." It may be—and as to this I need not express any opinion—that those words draw a distinction between "born" and "living," and required a child not only to be "living" in the sense of being en ventre sa mère at the testatrix's death, but also required the child to be then "born." But unless that view be taken of the case, I think it is not binding upon us and ought not to be allowed. For not only is it opposed in principle to the general current of authority, as I have pointed out, but Lord Westbury bases his decision on the ground that "the fiction or indulgence of the law which treats the unborn child as actually born applies only for the purpose of enabling the unborn child to take a benefit which, if born, it would be entitled to." That ground, as the authorities show, is unsound. The "indulgence of the law" is not so limited. I may add that Lord Westbury's decision was generally regarded as having unsettled previously settled law. This appears from several of the recognized text-books of authority. Take, for example, Jarman on Wills. Prior to Blasson v. Blasson, it was stated in editions of that work that "for all purposes of construction a child en ventre sa mère is considered as a child in esse. But after Lord Westbury's decision these words had to be added in brackets in the subsequent editions, "[if it will be for its own benefit to be so considered]"—see the fourth edition, vol. 2, p. 185. That being so, it appears to me that the principle I have indicated affecting the construction and effect of wills ought to be applied in the present case, unless there is something in the will, taken as a whole, to negative its application. Not only do I not find in the will now in question anything to negative the application of the principle, but it appears to me that not to apply the principle would be to refuse to carry out the object of the testator to be gathered from his will, which appears to me to have been to settle his lands as strictly as the law would permit him. I cannot attach weight to the argument of the respondent's counsel founded on the difficulty that might arise in some cases of proving the time of conception of a child. The difficulty existed in most of the numerous cases to which I have called attention. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—The question in this case is whether upon the true construction of the will of George William Rush his nephew William Beaumorice Rush took an estate tail or a life interest only. [His lordship stated the provisions of the will, and continued:] The testator died on the 18th of September, 1854. The limitations in favour of the first and second sons of Alfred Rush and their issue have failed. William Beaumorice Rush, the third son of Alfred Rush, was born on the 9th of October, 1854—that is to say, within one month after the testator's death and the question is whether he is to be considered as being "born in the testator's lifetime" for the purpose of the construction of the will. Swinfen Eady, J., has answered this question in the negative, and has held that he took an estate tail.

Now it is perfectly settled law that for many purposes a child en ventre sa mère is deemed to be in the same position as if actually born. For example, such a child takes real estate as heir-at-law, although for reasons connected with feudal tenure he is not entitled to the rents and profits until his actual birth. He takes personal property under the Statute of Distributions as a child. At common law he might be vouched in a common recovery: Wallis v. Hodson. In equity a bill might be filed on his behalf, and Sir Orlando Bridgeman granted an injunction to restrain waste in such a case: Lutterel's case, cited in Hale v. Hale, 1 Ch. 50. He can take by devise or bequest. It was held more than 200 years ago in Hale v. Hale that under a trust for such child or children of A. as shall be living at A.'s death a posthumous child was entitled. The same doctrine was applied in Trower v. Butts, where the words were born in A.'s lifetime. In short, it cannot now be questioned that under a devise or bequest to the child of X., or to children of X., as a class living or born at a particular time, a child en ventre sa mère at the time and afterwards born alive, is a child entitled under the devise or bequest.

There was at one time a view that this doctine only applied where it would be for the benefit of the child himself that he should be considered a child in esse. That was the doctrine of the civil law, but I think it is now settled by authority which binds us that this limitation can no longer be maintained: Pearce v. Carrington, In re Burrows, In re Wilmer's Trusts. Indeed the contrary was scarcely contended for by counsel for the respondent.

There is not, so far as I am aware, any modern decision adverse to this view, unless it be Blasson v. Blasson, where Lord Westbury spoke of "this peculiar rule of construction which is limited to cases where such construction of the word born is necessary for the benefit of the unborn child." That case may possibly be supported on the ground that the words there were "who shall have been born and living at the time of my decease," such words possibly indicating a sufficient contrary intention to take the case out of the general rule. Unless it can be supported on that ground, I think that case ought not to be followed.

It has been argued that this doctrine or rule of law ought to be limited to the particular cases which have been decided, although those cases are very numerous and cover almost every conceivable state of circumstances. I cannot assent to this argument. I think that as a general rule of construction the words child living at or born at a particular date include a posthumous child, in the absence of any context indicating a contrary intention, and I desire to base my judgment in favour of the appellant on that broad principle.

The clause under which the question arises is commonly found in wills settling real estate, and if there were any proof of a general opinion on the part of conveyancers adverse to the view I have expressed, I should attach great weight to it. But the precedents referred to by Mr. Micklem satisfy me that the opinion of conveyancers has been and is that a posthumous child is included in a clause of this nature unless words are added expressly to exclude him.

I am not sure that in this particular will the same conclusion might not be reached on somewhat narrower grounds. The will shows an intention to tie up the property as far as the law allows. Moreover, it is not the case of a vested estate tail with a subsequent clause of defeasance. The nephew took, as from the testator's death, either an indefeasible estate tail, or an estate for life. And in the event which happened, the alternative second gift took effect, in accordance with established authorities to which I have referred.

The result is that in my opinion this appeal must be allowed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I agree with the judgments which have been delivered by the Lords Justices.

Solicitors, Baileys, Shaw, & Gillett; Reed & Reed, for Reed & Co., Taunton.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Dec. 18, 19; Feb. 21.

BETTS (LIMITED) v. PICKFORDS (LIMITED). (a.)

Lessor and lessee—Grant of land for specific purpose—Light—External or party-wall—Trespass—Derogation from grant—Authority of architect—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 213), s. 5, sub-section 16.

The defendants, who owned some land, which was covered with buildings, leased a portion of that land to the plaintiffs for the purpose of erecting a warehouse and showrooms, for which purpose a large amount of light would be necessary, the plans which were approved by the defendants showed that there were to be windows in the external wall of the new buildings adjacent to the land retained by the plaintiffs. By another agreement the defendants undertook to demolish the buildings on the demised land. Some rafters and purlins of the buildings on the defendants' land were left projecting a few inches over the land leased to the plaintiffs, and they were supported by stanchions which stood partly on the plaintiffs' land. These purlins and rafters were, with the consent of the plaintiffs' architect, but without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs themselves, built into the external wall of the plaintiffs, which was built entirely on the plaintiffs' land. The stanchions were also grouted in to the wall, the plaintiffs' wall and the defendants' building being in fact connected. The local authority took proceedings against the plaintiffs to close the windows in that external wall, which they alleged had become a party-wall through the acts of the defendants. The plaintiffs brought this action to restrain the defendants from using their wall and to compel them to remove the rafters and purlins from the wall.

Held, that the use by the defendants of the plaintiffs' wall which had led to the local authority's demand was a trespass and amounted to a derogation from their grant, and the injunction asked for was accordingly granted.

Held, also, that it was not within the scope of the plaintiffs' architect's authority to sanction the rafters and purlins being built into the plaintiffs' wall, and that the plaintiffs were not bound by it.

Witness action.

This action was brought to restrain the defendants trespassing upon a certain wall so as to convert it into a party-wall.

The plaintiffs, F. Betts & Co. (Limited), who were builders' merchants, being desirous of erecting a warehouse, offices, and showrooms, in 1903, entered into negotiations with the defendants, Messrs. Pickford & Co. (Limited), for the acquisition of a plot of ground which belonged to the defendants in Long-lane, Bermondsey, which was at that time covered with old buildings.

The plaintiffs' architect submitted to the defendants plans of the warehouse which they proposed to erect, and which was to consist of a ground floor and three upper floors. Each of these upper floors were to have three windows in the south or back wall of the warehouse. The first floor was one large room and was intended to be used as a showroom.

The defendants at first raised some objections to these plans on the ground that certain premises belonging to the defendants which adjoined the proposed new buildings would be overlooked by the proposed windows in the south wall, but eventually the defendants gave their consent, as the plaintiffs insisted that these windows were absolutely necessary for their business.

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In accordance with these arrangements the defendants demised by an indenture of lease dated the 28th of October, 1903, a portion of their property in Long-lane to the plaintiffs for a term of 62 years. The plaintiffs covenanted to well and sufficiently fence off the premises from the adjoining property and also to build a warehouse upon the demised property within seven calendar months from the date of the lease in accordance with the plans and specifications to be approved by the surveyor of the defendants. The defendants entered into the usual covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The plaintiffs erected the warehouse, which was entirely upon the demised premises, in accordance with the approved plans.

Another agreement was entered into at the same time under which the old buildings that were on the premises were demolished by the defendants. In the course of demolition some roof timbers of that portion of the shed which remained upon the defendants' adjoining property were cut off, and about four inches of them were left projecting over the southern side of the premises demised to the plaintiffs, and they were supported by iron stanchions which stood for an inch or two upon the demised premises.

These timbers and stanchions were built into the southern wall of the plaintiffs' warehouse without their knowledge, but with the knowledge and consent of their architect. A cement fillet was also laid between the edge of the roof of the shed and the southern wall of the plaintiffs' warehouse, so that in fact the defendants' shed and the wall of the plaintiffs' warehouse were connected. The roof of the defendants' shed was about level with the sills of the first floor windows in the plaintiffs' warehouse, touching the two eastern windows.

The defendants also erected a building, which was used as stables, up against the eastern wall of the plaintiffs' warehouse without erecting any boundary wall of their own; this also was done without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs.

On the 31st of October, 1904, the plaintiffs were summoned by the local authority for an alleged infringement of the London Building Act, 1894, by making the southern wall of their warehouse a party-wall within section 5 (16) without complying with requirements of the Act as to a party-wall, as two of the windows in the wall were openings which were not allowed by the statute.

The magistrate held that the southern wall of the plaintiffs' warehouse was a party-wall within the meaning of the Act, but postponed making an order to close the windows in order to give the plaintiffs an opportunity to bring the present action against the defendants, and adjourned the summons until after the hearing of this action.

Section 5 (16) of the London Building Act, 1894, provides that "party-wall" means (a) a wall forming part of a building and used or constructed to be used for separation of adjoining buildings belonging to different owners, or occupied or constructed or adapted to be occupied by different persons.

The plaintiffs alleged that the southern wall of their warehouse was an external wall built upon their own premises, and that if it were a party-wall within the meaning of the London Building Act it had been converted into one by the trespass of the defendants and in derogation of their grant to the plaintiffs, and they accordingly asked for an injunction to restrain the defendants from committing any trespass so as to convert their wall into a party-wall, and for an order compelling the defendants to disconnect their shed and stables from the plaintiffs' wall, and for damages.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs' wall was built as an external wall and not as a party-wall and no party-wall notices were given in respect of it. The use of this wall by the defendants constituted a trespass, which was committed without the plaintiffs' knowledge or consent. The plaintiffs' architect had no authority to allow the defendants to build the purlins and rafters into the plaintiffs' wall. If he had authority it only amounted to a revocable license, and there was no consideration for it. It only amounted to a parol agreement to grant an easement, and an easement could only be granted by deed. The defendants could not use this wall so as to derogate from their own grant and cause the windows which they had expressly sanctioned to be closed. Alden v. Latimer, Clark, Muirhead, & Co., 42 W. R. 553, [1894] 2 Ch. 437: "Where a landlord demises part of his property for carrying on a particular business he is bound to abstain from doing anything on the remaining portion which would render the demised premises unfit for carrying on such business in the way in which it is ordinarily carried on," per Stirling, J. When a grantor had made a grant of land, and it was in the contemplation of the parties that a building would be erected with windows looking out on the land retained by the grantor, he was under an obligation not to use his land in any way so as to interfere with that grant: Bailey v. Icke, 64 L. T. 789. The Court of Appeal held in Davis v. Town Properties Investment Corporation (Limited), 51 W. R. 417, [1903] 1 Ch. 797, that unless there were special words the covenant for quiet enjoyment did not enlarge the grant. The defendants ought to be restrained from using the plaintiffs' external wall and so converting it in to a party-wall.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Leverson, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs erected the wall intending that it should be used as a party-wall, and therefore the defendants were relieved from all the consequences of its being a party-wall In the circumstances under which the wall was built both parties knew that the wall must be a separating wall. The plaintiffs have got all the easement they were entitled to. A grant made expressly for the purpose of the grantees building a house created a legal easement over the adjoining land retained by the grantor to such an extent as might be strictly necessary for enabling the grantee to build the house and to enjoy it when built: Robinson v. Grave, 21 W. R. 223. There was no express grant of an easement of light, and when the question was as to an implied grant regard must be had to all the circumstances under which the implied grant was said to arise: Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross, 36 W. R. 914, 38 Ch. D 295. There was no contract by the defendants that the windows should be kept open or that the wall should not be a party-wall. There was no derogation from their grant on the part of the defendants. Derogation implied some act of the grantor which lessened the value of the grant, but the defendants had done nothing, as the purlins and rafters were built into the wall by the plaintiffs' agent. This was done by the permission of the plaintiffs' architect acting in the ordinary course of his authority, therefore the license was not revocable. Even if a trespass was committed, if it was done by the license of a duly authorized person, such license could not be revoked: Taylor v. Waters, 7 Taunt. 373. The plaintiffs could have cut these purlins and rafters off instead of building them into the wall, but having built them in the defendants could not now be called upon to remove, because to do so they would have to interfere with the plaintiffs' wall: Powell v. Aiken, 4 K. & J. 343. It was doubtful whether anything but a direct interference with the enjoyment of land could constitute a breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment: Davies v. Town Properties Investment Corporation (Limited).

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—There is no occasion to go at length into the facts of this case, but a brief statement as to how the question arises is perhaps necessary.

The plaintiffs are lessees of the defendants under a deed of the 28th of October, 1903, which is a lease of land so described with reference to a plan which indicates that it had at that time some buildings on it, and that lease contains a covenant by the lessees to erect buildings of a certain description according to approved plans, those plans being in existence and there being no doubt about what they are. Those plans show a certain number of windows. We know from the evidence that the plaintiffs stipulated for those windows, and that they stipulated for them for a certain purpose, and that the defendants knew why that stipulation was made. But I put that aside because it is sufficient for me to know, at least so it seems to me, that as a matter of fact the bargain between the two parties was that the plaintiffs should erect buildings containing certain windows. Windows were an essential part of the approved plans, and therefore I think the purpose for which the windows were required, I mean the special purpose, becomes immaterial.

Now it is said that the defendants have acted in derogation of that grant, and especially as regards the grant of the windows and of the right to open those windows and the privilege of having light coming through them, by what they have done. What they are said to have done is this: They have by their acts, so the plaintiffs say, converted or made what ought to have been an external wall into a party wall within the meaning of section 5, subsection 16, of the London Building Act, 1894, and the result of that is that the local authority is competent to demand, and does demand, that these windows shall be shut up, and that they must come out of the plan. It is unnecessary to go into the question as to what is the foundation of the local authority's demand, except that they say, and apparently with some justification, that if this wall which I am going to mention is used as a party-wall, these windows cannot be allowed to remain, and it is further said that that is a derogation from the defendants' grant.

Now the defendants' main answer shall be postponed for a moment; but assuming that what the defendants have done—that is to say, that they have really used or constructed a party-wall where a party-wall ought not to be—then they have led directly to the local authority's demand, which must be complied with, and so in that way they seem to me to have acted in derogation of their own grant.

There are many authorities on this point, but I will take the general law as stated by Stirling, J., in his judgment in the case of Alden v. Latimer, Clark, Muirhead, & Co., 42 W. R. 553, [1894] 2 Ch. 437. He says: "The result of these judgments appear to me to be that where a landlord demises part of his property for carrying on a particular business he is bound to abstain from doing anything on the remaining portion which would render the demised premises unfit for carrying on such business in the way in which it is ordinarily carried on." I have already indicated that there is evidence to show that here a particular business was in contemplation and that the windows were required for that purpose, to the knowledge of the defendants; but again, I do not go upon that, because I think that the language of Stirling, J., may be read as applying directly to this case. He says: "Where a landlord demises part of his property for carrying on a particular business, he is bound to abstain from doing anything on the remaining portion which would render the demised premises unfit for carrying on such business." I can only apply the principle of that language to the present case.

There is more than one answer to that on the part of the defendants. The first is that you must regard any alleged derogation from the grant with reference to all the circumstances under which that grant was made; and for that purpose reference is made to the case of the Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross, 36 W. R. 914, 38 Ch. D. 295, which I need not mention further. It does establish the proposition that you must look into all the circumstances at the time of the grant. What the defendants say is this: The plaintiffs accepted this lease with the obligation to build according to the plans, knowing that they were bound to build a wall separating the demised premises from the adjoining premises retained by the lessors. They must be taken to have known that there would be necessarily this external wall which might be, at any rate, if it was not a matter of course, a party-wall. They knew that there were to be buildings on the other side, and if there were buildings at the time, though they were to be interfered with by the plaintiffs' buildings, they must have known that other buildings were to be erected there and that the separating wall, the dividing wall, would, at any rate, in all probability, if not necessarily, become a party-wall. They must have contemplated that it would become a party-wall, and therefore they must be taken to have made this grant, or entered into this implied obligation which is derived from the lease, with the knowledge that there might be, and probably would be, a party-wall, and that, if there were a party-wall, the consequences would follow that the windows which they had, so to say, guaranteed, could not be erected.

It seems to me that that is pressing the doctrine for which the case of Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross is an authority a great deal too far. In the first place, I am not sure that the plaintiffs ought to be treated as contemplating the existence of a party-wall. All they knew was that they were going to build a wall containing their own premises. They might have also contemplated, and I will take it that they did contemplate, that the defendants would erect buildings in the place of those then standing with or without alteration, but I see no reason for concluding that the plaintiffs knew or reasonably contemplated that the defendants' buildings would have their containing wall the same as the containing wall of the plaintiffs so as to make it a party-wall. But even if that were so, and if they ought to be regarded as having had that in contemplation, it does not seem to me to follow that they ought to have reasoned thus: There may be, and probably will be, a party-wall. If there is, all our plans will be upset; the windows for which we have stipulated will have to come down, because in the London Building Act there is a provision that enables the local authority to shut up windows in a party-wall. It seems to me that is carrying the doctrine of obligation construed by circumstances a great deal too far.

Then the other defence on the part of the defendants is this: "We have done nothing, the principle which the learned judge in the case of Alden v. Latimer, Clark, Muirhead, & Co. enunciates is, that you must do nothing in derogation of your grant—that is, the ordinary form of expressing it, borne out by his language; we have done nothing at all, but what happened was this: There was a contemporaneous agreement, but not included in the lease, by which we agreed to clear the ground, and when we came to clear the ground we cleared it for the purpose of building, but there were overhanging the demised ground some beams and purlins which belonged to our main building, a building which had been to some extent pulled down in order to clear the ground, and there they were; they were strutted up and they were wanted for the buildings which we were going to complete. For the moment they were safe and we have done nothing with them, we did not bring them there, we simply left them there, we did not clear them away, and with the consent of the plaintiffs' architect we allowed them to be built into their wall; we were content that they should remain." The same is true of certain stanchions which formerly supported part of the defendants' wall, but which were left on the ground just at this dividing point, but on the plaintiffs' side—that is to say, on the site of their wall. The defendants say: "We were willing, if they had made no objection, to allow them to be built into the wall; we did not care very much whether they were there or not but we did not want to remove them; we allowed them to be built into the wall; we have done nothing, and therefore we cannot be treated as trespassers, because a trespasser is one who comes on another man's ground, cuts down a tree, or does something like that; but we have done nothing at all." The answer to that, in my view, is, "You have done, and are doing, a great deal; you are using the plaintiffs' property—whether you cared about it or not, or whether there was any consideration for it or not, is immaterial; you are as a matter of fact using the property which is demised to the plaintiffs, and occupying it with your stanchions and purlins, and you have no right to do that." That seems to me to be quite as much an act as if they had brought these things on the land. I am not speaking, for the moment, of their not having removed them, which they ought to have done, of course, under the collateral agreement; but they have used, and are using, the plaintiffs' property for unauthorized purposes, and that seems to me to be a trespass which the court can remedy. Then it is said "If we did do it, we did it with authority." All that is quoted in support of that view is what the plaintiffs' architect states. I am not finding fault with him, because he thought, no doubt, that he was acting within his authority; he was the architect of the plaintiffs, and it does not matter whether the defendants' architect asked him or whether he asked the defendants' architect, but between them they agreed that these purlins and stanchions should be built into the wall, and he, purporting to act on behalf of the plaintiffs, allowed it to be done. It is clear upon the evidence that he did not communicate it to the plaintiffs and they did not find it out until some time afterwards. He allowed it to be done. Was that within the scope of an architect's authority? It seems to me it clearly was not. What is within the scope of an architect's authority I am not called upon to say; but I will say this much, that I apprehend his authority is strictly limited by the nature of his employment—that is to say, as defined by any letters or agreement constituting his employment So far as I know in this case he was simply employed to superintend the erection of the buildings. That, I take it, he has done. He did superintend; but that cannot possibly give him any implied authority to allow these stanchions and purlins to be built into the wall. He could not even have allowed, according to the constitution of the employment as it is before me, the slightest deviation from the plans. All he had to do was to superintend the erection of the buildings according to the plans which had been approved, and it does not go beyond that. Of course we know that, in many cases, the architect has generally certain powers given him in verifying the builders' work and certifying the result, and you may find that all that comes within his authority; and indeed there may be, and probably are, many details which would be implied in those provisions; but beyond that, it is impossible to say that an architect has any more authority than any other person who is employed to superintend work. His duty, to sum it up in a word, is to superintend and nothing more.

There is one other important question remaining. This wall, which has been spoken of, and conveniently so, in the argument, as being divided into two parts, but is really one wall with a turn, has been trespassed on, as I have held, by the including in it and building into it certain purlins and stanchions, and that makes it, so I apprehend, a party-wall. It is therefore used as a party-wall within the Act. That is the case of the local authority into which I am not going at all. I am assuming that the local authority is perfectly right, and are entitled to insist upon the shutting up of the windows if the wall is used as a party-wall; but it has also been used as a party-wall in a different way. So far we have dealt with it above the ground, but down below the ground, in the basement, it constitutes or is still the separating or external wall of the plaintiffs—that is to say, the wall separating the demised premises from the premises retained by the lessor. But down below the ground, on the other side of the wall, there are stables used by the defendants, and they have no other wall on that side, the south side of their stables, but this, and they have used this as the wall between their stables and the plaintiffs' premises, the wall being still entirely on the plaintiffs' ground. That may or may not (again I am not deciding that) make it a party-wall, and if it is a party-wall down there, it may or may not be a party-wall up above in consequence. I am not dealing with that question at all, but I will assume that in using it in that way it is used as a party-wall. Then what right had the defendant to use that as a party-wall? It is the external wall built by the plaintiffs on their own ground. If the defendants desire to use the adjoining premises for stables or for any other purpose, they can erect their own containing wall; they have no business to use the wall of the plaintiffs, and it seems to me they are doing that; and there again they are using as a party-wall what they have no business to use as a party-wall. The only answer to that is that it always has been a party-wall from the first brick that was laid until now. That is quite possible, and I think it is very likely; but they have not brought home to the plaintiffs any knowledge of that; and as soon as the plaintiffs knew it, so far as I am aware, they protested and said that it must not be used in that way. So that whether it was used from first to last or not seems to me to be immaterial.

Then there is a question raised about the breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment in the lease. I do not see myself that there has been any breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment; but I need not say more about that because if I give the plaintiffs what they ask on the other ground, that, no doubt, will suffice.

So far as there are any damages there must be an inquiry. I am not in a position to say how far damages have been occasioned—there may be some, but if the plaintiffs think it worth while to take an inquiry as to damages, reserving the costs, I think they are entitled to that. There will therefore be an injunction restraining the defendants from using this wall and an order to remove the rafter and purlins.

Solicitors, Peake, Bird, Collins, & Co.; Upton & Co.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } March 16; April 5; May 3.

In re CARY-ELWES' CONTRACT. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Compulsory purchase—Purchaser compelled to take a conveyance—Form of conveyance—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict c. 118), ss. 75, 81, 82—Finance Act, 1895 (58 Vict. c. 16), s. 12.

A local authority had under a compulsory purchase paid the purchase-money into court, accepted title and taken possession, but refused to take a conveyance.

Held, on summons by vendor, that they were compelled to take a conveyance to be settled in case of difference by the court.

In re Pigott and Great Western Railway Co., 29 W. R. 727, 15 Ch. D. 146; Harding v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 20 W. R. 321, 7 Ch. 154; and Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 16 Eq. 439, 22 W. R. Dig. 118, followed.

Summons.

This was a summons by the vendor under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, under the following circumstances:

The Scunthorpe Urban District Council under their special Water Act, 1903, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts and the Waterworks Clauses Acts, had compulsorily acquired from the vendor, a tenant for life of settled land, two plots of ground and an easement to run pipes over a strip of land not acquired. After the notice to treat had been given objection was taken on behalf of the vendor that the easements required by the council were in excess of those authorized to be taken by the special Act. This resulted in an agreement being made between the parties that the notice to treat should be regarded as amended, and the amendments were introduced into the copy of the notice to treat annexed to the award.

Before the arbitration proceedings there was correspondence between the parties with a view to reduce the area of land over which easements were to be acquired.

The solicitors for the council wrote agreeing to this, and sent an amended plan showing the strip over which easements were to be acquired reduced to fifteen feet in width.

In answer, the vendor's solicitors wrote: "On examining the proposed amended plans we find that the old boundardy lines remain in black ink, with the words, 'limits of deviation on deposited plans' inserted. These words must be omitted . . . if inserted they might give rise to questions of doubt." The solicitors to the council replied that they could not eliminate the lines of deviation without considerable expense, but undertook that in the conveyance they would not ask that these lines should be shown on the plan to the deed. The council subsequently took up the position that they objected to the expense of a conveyance as being unnecessary, at any rate for the present, and that in consequence they did not propose to take a conveyance, but to rest their title upon the special Act, the notice to treat and the award.

The vendor, who wished for the proper definition of the easements granted, in order to avoid prejudice to his surrounding land, issued this summons claiming (1) a declaration that the contract constituted by the special notice Act to treat and award ought to be completed by some proper deed of conveyance, covenant, or assurance, containing a proper description and definition of the lands and easements agreed to be sold, and containing all proper covenants and provisions for the protection of the vendor and the purchaser; (2) an order that such deed in default of agreement might be settled by the court.

C. H. Sargant, for the vendor.

H. Fellows, for the purchasers, in reliance on the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, ss. 75, 81, 82, contended that the council were entitled to require a conveyance from the vendor if they chose, but could not be compelled to accept a conveyance against their will; in any case that the form of conveyance was a matter to be settled by the purchasers and not by the court on dispute or by conveyancing counsel to the court at the instance of the vendor.

Cur. adv. vult.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in a considered judgment, stated the above facts, and continued: It is well settled that in cases of compulsory purchase, after notice to treat and ascertainment of the price, a contract is established, enforceable in a court of equity, and with regard to which both vendor and purchaser can enforce specific performance: Adams v. London and Blackwall Railway Co., 2 M. & G. 118; Regent's Canal Co. v. Ware, 5 W. R. 617, 23 Beav. 575. Following these decisions, it was held by Jessel, M.R., in In re Pigott and Great Western Railway Co., 29 W. R. 727, 18 Ch. D. 146, that as specific performance of the contract, as a contract of purchase and sale, or sale and purchase, may be enforced, all the ordinary rules apply, unless you find some statutory enactment in the way. In that case the Master of the Rolls applied the rule, stated in Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (5th ed.), pp. 629-630, that where the vendor has shown his title the purchaser pays interest from the time at which he might prudently have taken possession, supposing it to have been offered him—that is, the time when a good title was shown. That is the ordinary rule. The reason why equity interfered to enforce a statutory contract, after notice to treat and ascertainment of the price, is stated by Wood, V.C., in Mason v. Stokes Bay Pier and Railway Co., 11 W. R. 80, 32 L. J. Ch. 110. It was because a court of law would be unable to do complete justice between the parties, having no machinery either for investigating the title or settling the conveyance. In that case, which was a suit to compel specific performance of a compulsory purchase of freeholds, he made a decree against the company, and said that the Master of the Rolls had put the matter on the right grounds in Regent's Canal Co. v. Ware; that after notice given and the price fixed, the relation of the parties, as vendor and purchaser, was as fully constituted as in the case of a formal and regular agreement. And in a subsequent case of Harding v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 20 W. R. 321, 7 Ch. 154, the same learned judge, when Lord Chancellor, overruled the Master of the Rolls and compelled the railway company, against their will, to take an assignment of leasehold premises which they had purchased compulsorily and had already paid for. The principle is fully established that when land is purchased compulsorily, after the price has been ascertained, the purchaser is in the same position with regard to the landowner as an ordinary purchaser, and will be compelled by a court of equity to complete the purchase. It is an implied term of every contract for the sale of real property, if not expressed, that the contract shall be followed by a deed of conveyance conveying the property to a purchaser, and this may be enforced by a suit for specific performance. In Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 16 Eq., at p. 439, Lord Selborne said:

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"The common expression 'specific performance,' as applied to suits known by that name, presupposes an executory as distinct from an executed agreement, something remaining to be done, such as the execution of a deed or a conveyance, in order to put the parties in the position relative to each other in which by the preliminary agreement they were intended to be placed." The intention of the parties in an ordinary contract for the sale and purchase of real property is that the purchaser shall pay the purchase-money and that the property shall be conveyed by a duly executed deed to the purchaser. Equity looks upon things agreed to be done as actually performed; consequently, when a contract is made for sale of an estate, equity considers the vendor as a trustee for the purchaser of the estate sold, and the purchaser as a trustee of the purchase-money for the vendor: Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers (14th ed.), p. 175, ch. 5, section 1 (1). It is not, however, in the contemplation of the parties that the vendor shall remain a trustee for the purchaser for an indefinite period; the intention is that in due course the property shall be conveyed to the purchaser, and the vendor divested of all estate and interest in it, legal and equitable. In my opinion the position is the same under a statutory purchase and sale, and a conveyance must be executed, except, of course, in those cases in which the Act of Parliament itself operates as a conveyance. This position is recognized by the Finance Act, 1895, s. 12 (58 Vict. c. 16). This section provides that where by virtue of any Act any property is vested by way of sale in any person, such person shall within three months after the passing of the Act, or the date of vesting, whichever is later, produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a copy of the Act, or some instrument relating to the vesting duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of the property; and where any person by virtue of any Act is authorized to purchase property (which is the present case) such person shall within three months after the completion of the purchase produce to the commissioners an instrument of conveyance of the property duly stamped. In my judgment the respondents are bound, as in the case of an ordinary purchase, to take a conveyance, and there must be an order in the terms of the summons—the conveyance in case of disagreement to be settled under the direction of the court. The respondents must pay the costs of the application.

Solicitors, Tamplin, Tayler, & Joseph; Collyer-Bristow & Co., for Freer, Hett, & Hett, Brigg.

Chan. Div. }
Warrington, J. } Feb. 24.

In re BLEW.
GUNNER v. BLEW. (a.)

Will—Discretionary trust—Remoteness.

A testator gave property to his trustees and directed them to apply the annual income, or any part thereof, "in such proportions and generally in such manner as to my said trustees in their absolute discretion should seem best for the support of my son A. B. and his wife and children, or any of them," or to accumulate the same in their like discretion for the benefit of the children of his son who should become entitled to the capital of the property under the trust thereinafter contained, and, subject to the discretionary trust, he directed his trustees to pay the income to his son and his son's widow, and after their deaths to stand possessed of the capital for the son's children, as therein mentioned.

Held, that if the discretionary trust was not limited to the lifetime of the son, it was void as infringing the rule against perpetuities.

But, held, that upon the true construction of the will the trust was limited to the lifetime of the son.

In re Wise, 44 W. R 310, [1896] 1 Ch. 281, not followed; Gooding v. Read, 4 De G. M. & G. 510, explained; In re Watson, W. N. 1892, p. 192, considered.

John William Blew, by his will, after appointing trustees and executors, gave and bequeathed to his trustees a freehold messuage and the goodwill of a business carried on therein called "Bayleys," a warehouse, and the stock, furniture, and contents of the premises, upon trust, in their discretion to carry on the business so long as they thought well, with power to sell the property. And the testator then directed as follows: "And I hereby direct my said trustees to apply the said net annual income of 'Bayleys' aforesaid, and the dividends or annual income of the securities for the time being representing the proceeds of sale thereof, or of any part thereof, in such proportions and generally in such manner as to my said trustees in their absolute discretion shall seem best, for the support of my son William Charles Arlington Blew, and his wife, and children, or any of them, or to accumulate the same or any part thereof at their like discretion for the benefit of the children of my said son, who shall become entitled to the capital of 'Bayleys' under the trust hereinafter contained; and subject to such discretionary trust I direct my said trustees to pay the said net annual income, and the dividends or annual income aforesaid, to my said son during his life, and from and after his decease to his widow (if any) during her life, and so long as she shall remain his widow, and from and after the death of the survivor of them or the re-marriage of his widow, I declare that my said trustees shall stand possessed of 'Bayleys' aforesaid, and of the securities and investments by which the proceeds of sale, or any part thereof, may for the time being be represented, as well the capital as the income, upon trust for the child or children of my said son who, being sons, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being daughters, attain that age or marry under it; if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common."

The testator died in December, 1894. His son, W. C. A. Blew, died in June, 1904, leaving only one child, the plaintiff W. Walter H. Blew, who attained the age of twenty-one years in September, 1904.

The property comprised in the above gift and devise, except the messuage, had been sold, and the proceeds of sale invested in stocks and securities.

The widow of W. C. A. Blew and his son, W. Walter H. Blew, now claimed to be the sole beneficiaries of the trust property and funds, and to have them transferred as they directed; and they took out this summons asking for an order to that effect, the trustees being unwilling to hand over the property without the sanction of the court.

Norton, K.C., and Van Neck, for the plaintiffs.—On the true construction of the clause the discretionary trust is confined to the lifetime of the testator's son. It is therefore now at an end, and the plaintiffs are absolutely entitled to the whole fund. If that is not the true construction the result is the same, as the discretionary trust in that case is void for remoteness. It would be exercisable during a period which might be more than the period of a life in being and twenty-one years afterwards. The case of In re Wise, 44 W. R. 310, [1896] 1 Ch. 281, seems opposed to this view, but in that case the question was not argued. Gooding v. Read, 4 De G. M. & G. 510, is not an authority to the contrary, although from the head-note, which is incorrect, it would seem so. In re Watson, W. N. 1892, p. 192, is so shortly reported as to be inconclusive.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rowden, K.C., and G. Fellowes, for the trustees.—We think it is better that the discretionary trust should continue. The trust is not confined by the will to the lifetime of the testator's son, but continues during the lives of the plaintiffs. Nor is it void for offending the rule against perpetuities. In re Wise and In re Watson are decisions to the contrary. Moreover it may be considered as a power, and as such is valid if exercised in favour of persons within the period allowed: see Farwell on Powers, pp. 114, 115. The trustees are therefore bound to retain the property.

W. Howland Jackson, for mortgagees.

Norton, in reply.—If it were a power it would still offend the rule against perpetuities and be void, as the persons, in whose favour it might be exercised, might not be born within a life in being and twenty-one years.

WARRINGTON, J.—The question is whether a certain discretionary trust contained in the will of John William Blew is still exercisable or not. It is contended that the trust is limited to the life of W. C. A. Blew, as the use of the word "wife" shows that the power was only to be exercised during his life, and not after his death, when the object of the trust could not be properly so described. And the use of the term "widow," when the testator speaks of her after the death of his son, gives support to this view. I think, then, that on the construction of the will the trust is limited to the life of W. C. A. Blew. It has, however, been contended that if that view is not correct, and if the trust was not so limited, it is void for remoteness. I think it is desirable to see if this is so or not. First, if the trust is to continue beyond the life of W. C. A. Blew, for how long is it to continue? It must plainly continue during the lives of all his children and the life of the survivor of them. If so, the trust would be exercisable so long as any child is alive; that is, during the life of a child whose life might last more than twenty-one years after the death of W. C. A. Blew. That being so, the shares in which the fund should be distributed, and the persons for whose benefit the trust should be exercised, might not be ascertained or be ascertainable until more than twenty-one years after the death of W. C. A. Blew. If, then, the trust is not confined to the life of W. C. A. Blew it would seem to infringe the rule against perpetuities So far I have dealt with the matter independently of authority. But I am referred to In re Wise, which is an authority directly in point, and which is against this view. In that case it was contended that the trust for maintenance was separable from the trust of the capital, and for that contention the case of Gooding v. Read was cited. That was the only point dealt with by North, J., in his judgment. The question whether, if separable, the trust was or was not nevertheless void for remoteness was not discussed. Finding that the trust for maintenance was separable the learned judge said that in his opinion the trust was good. I cannot help thinking that the learned judge was misled by the head-note of Gooding v. Read. From that head-note it appeared that the trust for maintenance was the same as that which we have here, but when we look at the will itself as quoted in the body of the report it appears that the trust for maintenance was to pay and apply the rents, issues, and profits equally for the benefit of the children of the daughter living at her decease until the youngest attained twenty-five years. That was, therefore, simply a gift of life interests to each of the children in equal shares until the youngest attained twenty-five years. There was no discretion given as to the application of the fund, and there was obviously nothing infringing the rule against perpetuities. The Lords Justices gave no reasons for their judgments. I cannot help thinking that North, J., read the head-note, and had not his attention called to the fact that the question of infringement of the rule against perpetuities did not arise there. The case of In re Watson is unsatisfactory, because no reasons are given in the judgment, nor do we know what provisions there may have been in the will other than that stated in the note. I do not think that either In re Wise or In re Watson is a satisfactory case to rely upon. I must therefore follow my own view, which is that the discretionary trust is void for remoteness, and consequently not now exercisable, and that the widow and son take the property absolutely.

Solicitors, Wingfield & Blew; Mundy & Nevile; Fladgate & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Jan. 17.

REX v. LICENSING JUSTICES OF CHESHIRE.
Ex parte KAY'S ATLAS BREWERY (LIMITED). (a.)

Licensing law—Justices—Bias—Reference of renewal of licence to quarter sessions—Licensing justice subsequently appointed to sit on compensation committee—Renewal of licence refused — Validity of order—Licensing Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 23), s. 1, sub-section 2; s. 5, sub-section 5.

When the justices of a licensing district acting under section 1, sub-section 2, of the Licensing Act, 1904, refer the matter of the renewal, with their report thereon, to quarter sessions, the reference to quarter sessions is not in the nature of an appeal. Therefore although in a particular case a justice might have taken such an active part as a member of the licensing committee as to be ineligible, on the ground of bias, to sit at quarter sessions, there is nothing in the Act to prevent him taking part in the subsequent proceedings, since the report to quarter sessions is in the nature of a motion rather than a decision.

Rule nisi calling upon the justices of the Cheshire County Licensing Committee (sitting as the compensation authority under the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1904) to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up and quash an order made by them whereby the licence of the Grapes Inn, Hyde, had been refused.

Kay's Atlas Brewery (Limited) the applicants, were owners of the Grapes Inn, which was an ante-1869 beerhouse and was also licensed for the sale of wine. The facts shortly were that on the 2nd of March, 1905, the licensing justices of Hyde referred the question of the renewal of the licence of the Grapes Inn to the quarter sessions, and at this meeting a Mr. Blackwell, presided. On the 9th of June, 1905, the licensing committee of the quarter sessions appointed under section 5 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1904 (the compensation authority), met on the 9th of June, and, subject to the payment of compensation, refused the renewal of the licence. At this meeting Mr. Blackwell, who was also one of the licensing committee of the quarter sessions, left the court when they retired to consider their decision, and returned into court with them when they gave it. He had been appointed under section 5 (5) of the Licensing Act, 1904, an additional member of the licensing committee.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Before the case was opened before the compensation committee, counsel for the brewery company objected to any justice who had sat on the licensing committee at the meeting held on the 2nd of March sitting and adjudicating on the question of the renewal of the licence of the Grapes Inn but the objection was overruled. The case was then fully argued and the renewal refused.

The licensing justices were duly represented by counsel, but Mr. Blackwell made an affidavit that he had taken no part in instructing him.

This rule was then obtained on the ground that the licensing committee was improperly constituted by reason of Mr. Blackwell's being disqualified from sitting and adjudicating on the question of the renewal of the licence of the Grapes Inn.

Danckwerts, K.C., and R. M. Montgomery, against the rule.—The report of the licensing committee is in no sense a judicial act; it is not a decision, and the proceedings before the compensation committee are not an appeal. Mr. Blackwell took no part in instructing counsel to oppose this renewal. The licensing justices of Hyde directed their clerk to instruct counsel, thus making themselves respondents, and it seemed to have been assumed that Mr. Blackwell himself was a respondent, and was, therefore, disqualified from sitting, whereas his affidavit showed that he took no part in the instructing of counsel to oppose. The proceedings created by the Licensing Act, 1904, are entirely novel: Rex v. Tolhurst, 53 W. R. 619, [1905] 2 K. B. 478, and the cases where the question has been raised of the propriety of justices sitting at quarter sessions to review their own decisions have no application. In the old courts in banc and in the House of Lords, for instance, there are reported cases where judges have taken part in appeals from their own decisions.

Trevor Lloyd (S. S. Kay with him), in support of the rule.—The principle that a judge cannot sit to hear an appeal from his own decision applies here to a justice who has taken part in the preliminary proceedings under section 1, sub-section 2; and Mr. Blackwell must be taken to have concurred in the action of his brother justices in instructing counsel to appear. It is submitted that a reference to quarter sessions is in the nature of an appeal in judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings. But if it be regarded only as an expression of opinion that the question of renewal should be considered on grounds other than those with which they (the licensing justices) can deal, a justice who has been a party to the reference is debarred from sitting at quarter sessions, because by section 1, sub-section 2, he is an interested person, and as such can appear by counsel to oppose the renewal. All the justices were respondents to this appeal; all were represented by counsel to oppose, although any one of them might have taken no part in instructing him. There ought to be no suspicion of bias, and the fact that Mr. Blackwell presided at a meeting of the licensing justices when it was decided that the house was not necessary for the requirements of the neighbourhood suggests that he was strongly biassed against the renewal and decided to be present when the matter came up before the compensation committee: Reg. v. Justices of Hertfordshire, [1845] 6 Q. B. 753; Allinson v. General Council of Medical Education, 42 W. R. 289, [1894] 1 Q. B. 750.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—To my mind this case presents very considerable difficulty, and though I think the rule ought to be discharged, I am by no means satisfied that the case is so plain as Mr. Danckwerts' argument would imply. Apart from the special provisions of the Act there is a good deal which might properly be urged in favour of the view that a gentleman who had been party to the decision come to by the licensing authority to refer by way of report the question of the renewal of a particular licence to the quarter sessions ought not to sit when the question of that report whether the licence should be renewed or not was considered.

Quite apart from any question of instructing counsel, the position of Mr. Blackwell in this case was very nearly that of those justices referred to by Mr. Lloyd who could not sit at quarter sessions. My doubts in the case are strengthened by Mr. Danckwerts' admission, that if he had taken any part in instructing counsel he ought not to have sat. If this was or ought to be regarded as in the nature of an appeal, I think I should come to the conclusion that he ought not to sit. But when the statute is looked at I cannot think that if this objection was intended to operate in a case like the present one, that the Act would have been framed as it was. [His lordship read section 1 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1904.] The words are "requires consideration on grounds other than those on which the renewal of an existing on-licence can be refused by them." As I have pointed out in Tolhurst's case, section 1, sub-section 2, excludes the grounds on which the justices may act judicially as members of the licensing authority and refuse a renewal. The repeated references to that case seem to show that the reasons given for that judgment were confirmed by the subsequent discussion—namely, that where a question is raised on an application for a renewal, the licensing justices must act—as they had to previously—on sworn evidence; but it was pointed out that the amount of evidence which might be sufficient for the purpose of enabling the justices to form an opinion, might be very different from the amount necessary if they had to decide judicially whether or not a particular licence should be renewed or refused. It was pointed out that evidence of the character of the district, the locality of the public-house, and the number of houses might be sufficient to justify making a report. I only mention this to show why these proceedings ought not to be regarded as an appeal. This is a procedure of a novel kind, a preliminary step taken by the licensing judges acting, as I still think, in a judicial capacity, but still only embodying their own view in a report which enables the quarter sessions to act. Then comes section 5 (5). [His lordship read the section.] Now, it seems to me that if it had been intended to prevent the members of the licensing justices from being members of the compensating authority, the section ought to have gone on to add, "not being a member of the licensing committee of the justices," or words to that effect. I was impressed by an observation of my brother Darling, who appreciated the point early in the case, that the borough would be deprived of the advantage of sending to quarter sessions a justice who had considerable personal knowledge of the particular case. I cannot help thinking that the connection between the licensing justices and the compensating authority was intended by the Legislature to be very close, because by rule 11 there was to be a meeting between the two bodies; but if all the members of the renewal authority were members of the compensating authority there need not be this preliminary meeting at all. It is quite plain, therefore, that the compensating authority is not to exclude knowledge it has acquired as members of the licensing authority. That does not bear directly on the appointment of a particular justice, but it supports the view that this preliminary report was put before quarter sessions in the nature of a motion, and not in the nature of a decision in the sense that the reference to quarter sessions was an appeal from that decision. There was another point which Mr. Lloyd prayed in aid—namely, that this gentleman being represented by counsel as one of the respondent justices could not therefore sit to adjudicate on the report. I think that would have been a good objection if he had so appeared only as a member of the committee which decided to report. In my opinion the words "including the justices of the licensing district" merely mean that those justices should have a locus standi to appear. The fact that this gentleman was a member of the committee, if he in fact took no part in appointing counsel to appear—if he did not in fact appear himself to oppose—would, in my opinion, not be sufficient to disqualify him. At the same time I have felt the difficulty pressed by Mr. Lloyd, that this gentleman could have been one who appeared, and was one of the body who did appear. On the whole I have come to the conclusion that this does not constitute a valid objection to his sitting and acting as he did, and therefore the rule must be discharged.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that I do not feel pressed with the difficulties which the Lord Chief Justice has referred to. The action of the justices under section 1 (2) is not such a decision against anyone as to disentitle one of the justices who was a party to it from appearing when the matter came before the compensating committee, since the proceedings before them were not in the nature of an appeal.

DARLING, J.—I agree. I too have less difficulty than had the Lord Chief Justice in coming to the conclusion that his decision is the right one in this case.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for the justices, Philpot & Morrell.

Solicitors for the brewery company, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for Frederick Knowles, Hyde.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) — Jan. 17.

REX v. JUSTICES OF SOUTHAMPTON.
Ex parte CARDY. (a.)

Licensing law—Justices—Renewal of licence—Report—Proceedings before compensation committee—Judicial proceedings—Jurisdiction to state a case—Licensing Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 23), ss. 1 (2), 5 (2).

Where the question of the renewal of a licence is referred to quarter sessions under section 1 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1904, the proceedings before quarter sessions or before the committee appointed by the quarter sessions under section 5 (2) of the Act are judicial proceedings, and the justices have power to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Morgan v. Aylesford Justices, [1906] 1 K. B. 437, explained.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained calling upon the justices of the county of Southampton, acting as a committee duly appointed under the Licensing Act, 1904, and the rules made thereunder, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to hear and determine the matter of an application by one Cardy to state a special case.

The following facts appeared from an affidavit of the applicant's solicitor:

On the 27th of February, 1905, application was made to the licensing justices of the Southampton division of the county on behalf of Cardy, the tenant of the Yew Tree Inn, for the renewal of his "on" beer licence. The application was referred by the justices to quarter sessions under the Licensing Act, 1904, s. 1. The only ground of objection was one served by the clerk to the justices of the Southampton Petty Sessional Division, which stated that the renewal would be opposed "on the ground of redundancy."

It was contended before quarter sessions on behalf of the applicant that this ground was unintelligible and bad for uncertainty, and did not constitute a valid or legal objection; but the quarter sessions held that the objection was sufficient in point of law. At quarter sessions general evidence was given as to the population, and the number of licensed houses and their position, but it was contended that there was not sufficient evidence to differentiate the Yew Tree Inn from other licensed houses in the district, in accordance with Riven v. Southampton Justices, 52 W. R. 574, [1903] 1 K. B. 430, and that they were therefore not entitled to deprive the applicant of his licence.

Counsel for the applicant thereupon applied for a special case on the point that the ground of objection was unintelligible and bad for uncertainty, but the quarter sessions refused the application for a special case, holding that they had no power to grant it.

This rule was then obtained.

Duke, K.C. (J. A. Simon with him), showed cause.—A survey of the jurisdiction vested in local justices from the earliest times shows that under the various commissions of the peace the justices were not invested with judicial authority. Nor has subsequent legislation increased their jurisdiction, and justices still under the powers vested in them by the Act of 1904 cannot exercise judicial functions, and therefore cannot state a special case: Reg. v. Sutton Coldfield, L. R. 9 Q. B., at p. 155; Reg. v. Chantrell, 23 W. R. 706, L. R. 10. Q. B. 587; Walsall Overseers v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 27 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas., at p. 39; Boulter v. Kent Justices, 46 W. R. 114, [1897] A. C. 556.

Pickford, K.C. (Temple Cooke with him), in support of the rule.—Quarter sessions has now the same power to state a case when it is sitting as the compensation authority as when it is sitting as an appeal court, because the compensation committee stand in the position of the quarter sessions, and the new jurisdiction must be exercised in accordance with the general powers which belong to the quarter sessions: Dale's case, 6 Q. B. D., at pp. 450, 451. Quarter sessions has jurisdiction to state a special case, and this court in Morgan v. Aylesford Justices, [1906] 1 K. B. 437, considered a special case stated by those justices, but the question of jurisdiction was not raised. [He was stopped.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I express no opinion as to the circumstances in which the quarter sessions ought to state a special case, but the justices have decided that they could not entertain the application made to them to do so here simply on the ground that they had no jurisdiction. The question, therefore, is whether such tribunal, when it is dealing with the question of renewal under the Licensing Act, 1904, possesses the power to state a case. I think, assuming that the body which acted was acting judicially, the matter scarcely admits of argument, for it has long been recognized that if an order is made which is a "speaking" order and a final order, then the King's Bench Division can look at the whole of the order and say whether it ought to stand or ought to be quashed, though, since Reg. v. Sutton Coldfield, which was decided as long ago as 1873, it has never been doubted that the King's Bench Division would not entertain special cases where there would not be a final result and order, depending on the view the court took of the special case. We have, therefore, to decide whether the committee of quarter sessions, acting under the Act of 1904, is giving a judicial decision or not. It was said that they were in the position of licensing justices, and therefore the reasoning in Boulter's case applied, and their decision ought not to be regarded as the proceeding of a court or a judicial proceeding. For myself, I think that view is too narrow. The Act of 1904 limits the grounds on which the licensing justices can refuse to renew to certain specified grounds, but it provides that where they are of opinion that the question of the renewal of a particular licence required consideration on other grounds, they should refer the matter to quarter sessions. I think that shows that the proceedings before the quarter sessions are in the nature of a judicial proceeding. The matter is to be entertained by quarter sessions, and although I do not attach great importance to a definition section, it is clear that the body referred to by the Act as "the quarter sessions" is the court of quarter sessions (section 9 (4) of the Act). That is not conclusive, because there might have been in the Act other language showing that the quarter sessions were not acting in a judicial capacity. Section 5, however, seems to show that the committee are exercising the powers of quarter sessions, and the conclusion I have come to is that upon such an inquiry it is a case of new jurisdiction given to a court to act through a committee of the members, and the principle laid down by Lord Justice James in Dale's case, at pp. 450, 451, that where a new jurisdiction is given to an existing court it is to be exercised in accordance with its general rules and powers, is one to which effect ought to be given. It follows, therefore, that, subject to the exercise of their discretion—a discretion with which this court would not interfere—they have power to state a special case or to frame their order stating such facts as would make it a "speaking" order, and thus enable this court to look into it and see whether it was a good or a bad order.

The rule must be made absolute.

RIDLEY, J., concurred.

DARLING, J., gave judgment to the same effect.

Rule made absolute.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I wish to say a word about the case of Morgan v. Aylesford Justices. The point that no special case could be stated was not raised in that case, and of course, so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned, this decision governs that, but it may be that in that case there was no final order. I do not know how that was, but it must not be taken that in Morgan v. Aylesford Justices we meant to decide any point inconsistent with the general rule, that we do not entertain a special case where there is not a final order. We did not in any way intend to depart from that practice which was recognized in the Sutton Coldfield case. The fact is we gave judgment on the assumption that there was one. I do not say whether there was or was not.

Solicitors for the prosecutor, Speechly & Co., for Charles Lamport, Southampton.

Solicitors against the rule, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for H. Barber, Winchester.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). March 20.

WILLIAMS v. NORTHS' NAVIGATION COLLIERIES (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Wages—Deductions—Set-off—Sum payable under magistrate's order—Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), s. 3.

Section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, prohibits an employer deducting from the wages earned by a workman any sum of money (other than medical attendance, &c., under sections 23 and 24), even if such money is due and payable to the employer under an order of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 52 W. R. 564, [1904] 2 K. B. 44, reversed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) (reported 52 W. R. 564, [1904] 2 K. B. 44), reversing that of Bucknill, J.

The appellants were six workmen who were in the employment of the respondent colliery company.

In December, 1903, the appellants, in breach of their contract of employment, absented themselves from work without leave and without having given notice.

The respondent company thereupon proceeded against them under section 4 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, and on the 16th of January, 1904, an order was made on each of the appellants to pay to the respondents 30s., the money to be payable in three fortnightly instalments of 10s. each, and on the dates of the fortnightly colliery pay days. In paying the appellants their wages the company deducted the sum of 10s. in each case.

The workmen brought this action to recover the sums of 10s. so deducted, and claimed a declaration that such deduction was illegal under the Truck Act, 1831, and an injunction as to future deductions.

An application was made at chambers for an injunction to restrain the respondent company from making any similar deductions until the trial of the action.

Bucknill, J., granted an interim injunction.

The company appealed, and it was agreed to treat the application as the trial of the action, and a declaration was alone sought.

The Court of Appeal considered the colliery company were justified in deducting the 10s.

The workmen appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Bailhache (J. Sankey with them), for the appellants.—The deduction was a violation of section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831. There is no authority against the appellants for a deduction such as this. Bowen, L.J., in Hewlett v. Allen,

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

41 W. R. 197, [1892] 2 Q. B. 662, said: "Payment on account will not do." In Chawner v. Cummins, 8 Q. B. 311, and Archer v. James, 10 W. R. 489, 2 B. & S. 61, deductions (which have since been disallowed by statute) were permitted, but it was a necessary method for ascertaining what the wages were. Certain deductions are allowed by section 23, but they do not apply in the present case; and must be the subject of a written contract: Pillar v. Llynvi Coal and Iron Co., 17 W. R. 1123, L. R. 4 C. P. 752; Ex parte Cooper, 26 Ch. D. 693, 33 W. R. Dig. 23; Lamb v. Great Northern Railway, 39 W. R. 475, [1891] 2 Q. B. 281; Smith v. Walton, 3 C. P. D. 109, 26 W. R. Dig. 140; Willis v. Thorp, 23 W. R. 730, L. R. 10 Q. B. 383—a case under the Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Act, 1874.

Bankes, K.C., and Lush, K.C. (A. J. Ashton with them), for the respondents.—The Truck Act, 1831, and the amending Acts deal only with the mode of payment. The Act requires that when the wages are ascertained they shall be paid in coin. The words of Bowen, L.J., quoted for the appellants are not adverse to the respondents. This is a case of lawful set-off. In Hewlett v. Allen in the House of Lords both the Lord Herschell, L.C., and Lord Watson declare set-off—when not expressly prohibited by the statute—to be lawful (42 W. R. 670, [1894] A. C. 383). In an action for wages the respondents would be successful in a counter-claim for these deductions.

S. T. Evans, K.C., replied.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Lord LOREBURN, L.C.—I do not propose to enter upon a consideration of the authorities that were cited to us in the course of the argument, or dealt with in the Court of Appeal, as I understand that my noble and learned friend Lord Davey intends to refer to them; but I have come to the conclusion that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed, and a declaration given in the sense asked for by the plaintiffs. The facts of this case lie in the narrowest compass.

Certain workmen in the service of the defendant company were entitled to wages payable on the 30th of January, 1904. A fortnight earlier each of them had been ordered by magistrates in petty sessions to pay a fine to the defendant company, of which 10s. was due on the 30th of January. On that date the defendant company made out an account with each of them, in which, apart from other items which were not complained of, the sum of 10s. for the fines was deducted from the wages, and the balance alone was paid. In the case of the plaintiff Jacob Williams, whose case is typical of the rest, he had earned £3 13s. 2d., and received £3 2s., the difference consisted of an agreed deduction of 1s. 2d. for doctor and the 10s. fine, which was not agreed.

Upon this the workmen commenced an action for damages and an injunction and a declaration that the deduction of the 10s. was illegal. After some discussion it was agreed in the Court of Appeal that the relief sought should be limited to a declaration, and on that footing the case came here.

The question is whether the employers, when they paid the wages on the 30th of January, were in law bound to pay in coin the total sum due for wages, or were entitled in law to deduct 10s. due from the workmen to the employers, and pay merely the balance in coin.

This turns upon the true construction of section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831. Now I find in that section an explicit enactment that "the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to a workman" shall be "actually paid" to him in the current coin of this realm, "and not otherwise." The section does not say when it is to be paid, for the common law will settle that as soon as the agreement of service is ascertained. The section does say that when paid it shall be paid in coin of the realm, and not otherwise. I cannot think this means that it shall be paid as to part in coin and as to the remainder in account.

Our attention was directed in argument to the word "payable"; we were invited to hold that the obligation to pay in coin applied only to the entire amount of wages payable after deducting cross-claims. In this case it was argued only £3 2s. was payable, because, on striking an account, that was the balance due.

A reference to section 23 shews conclusively to my mind that this would be a wrong interpretation even if the language of the Act admitted of it.

Section 23 provides, with elaborate care, and under strict safeguards, the cases in which debts due from the workman may be deducted from the wages due to the workman when the employer is paying the wages. These provisions would be wholly unnecessary if an employer were already authorized by section 3 to deduct anything that the workman owed him and to pay him in coin merely his balance.

The word "payable" may have been inserted because otherwise the law could have been evaded by making wages payable in advance, before they had been earned. Or it may have been inserted because there might be deductions authorized by section 23 which would not diminish the wages earned, but would diminish the sum payable for wages. However that may be, it appears to me clear that an obligation rests upon the employer under the Truck Act, 1831, s. 3, to pay in coin (for we are not concerned with bank-notes in this case) all the money payable as wages; and that in ascertaining how much is payable as wages he can subtract nothing except the deductions expressly sanctioned by section 23. The deduction of 10s. for fines was therefore in the present case illegal.

Mr. Lush argued that this construction would be very anomalous. He urged that if the employer did not pay the wages at all, and were sued, he would be entitled then to set off in the action anything due to him except such sums as fall within the prohibition of section 5. It would be strange, said Mr. Lush, if an employer could, by breaking his contract and forcing litigation, obtain an advantage denied to him if he fulfilled his contract. No doubt this would be an anomaly, as are the Truck Acts themselves and some of the Acts which interfere in a limited degree with freedom of contract. It is necessary to distinguish between the clauses of the Act relating to set-off in an action and that relating to stoppage or deduction when the wages are paid. Possibly the Legislature thought a court might be trusted to strike a balance in the rare cases where the dispute came into court, but that the vast multitude of weekly or other payments which never come near a court ought to be regulated by a simple and wholesome rule—namely, that they should be paid wholly in coin save for certain carefully specified exceptions. This is, however, a mere conjecture. It is enough to say that, assuming the Act of Parliament has so provided, the fact that the provision is anomalous does not permit us to disregard the plain meaning of the words used.

Accordingly I advise your Lordships to reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and to restore that of Mr. Justice Bucknill.

Lord MACNAGHTEN said that he had had the opportunity of reading the Lord Chancellor's judgment, and entirely agreed with it.

Lord DAVEY.—I agree with the judgment of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, and with the reasons which he has given for his judgment. The learned judges in the Court of Appeal rested their decision mainly on the ground that it was neither an offence, nor a violation of the statute, to give effect to a legal right of set-off. Set-off in an action I understand. It is a right given by statute to a man who is sued for a sum of money to defend himself by claiming a debt due to himself from the plaintiff in satisfaction or reduction of the debt for which he is sued. But a set-off outside the court means nothing more than a claim of deduction and retention, and the question comes to be whether the deduction of a cross-debt which might be the subject of a set-off in an action is a legitimate deduction, or whether the express enactment that the entire amount of the wages shall be actually paid in current coin can be so qualified. I agree with my noble and learned friend that there can be but one answer to that question. By section 23 certain deductions are permitted to be made, or, to use the language of the marginal note, "particular exceptions to the generality of the law" are made under strictly defined conditions, and no other deductions or particular exceptions are, in my opinion, authorized.

The learned counsel for the respondents argued that the employer was not bound by the Act to pay in full, and that non-payment was not an offence under the Act. Be it so; but this was not a case of non-payment or repudiation by the master of his debt, but of retention of a part of the workman's admitted wages in payment of a debt to the master, and was intended to be payment or satisfaction pro tanto of the workman's wages. Bowen, L.J., stated the exact point in Hewlett v. Allen, when, commenting on the third section, he said that payment on account would not do, and that the employer cannot for the purpose of compliance with the statute be both payer and payee; while, on the other hand, he held that set-off in an action was only prohibited in the cases mentioned in section 5. It is sufficient to look at the account printed on p. 10 of the appendix, which was handed to one of the appellants, to see that this is nothing more than payment on account, which I agree with the Lord Justice will not do. I will only add that I can see very good reasons why the Legislature should not allow a deduction to be made by the employer himself, although it might be the subject of set-off in an action, where the amount and propriety of it could be impartially investigated.

Mr. Lush boldly said that there was a clear and consistent course of authority in favour of the respondents, and it was too late for this House to revert to the views of the appellants. The exact contrary of this statement appears to me to be nearer the truth. Not a single one of the numerous cases which were cited, in my opinion, supports the argument of the respondents, and a good deal is to be found in the judgments of the learned judges which is against them. In Chawner v. Cummins the plaintiff was presumed to have contracted upon the usual and well-known terms in the trade, and certain customary deductions which had been made from his nominal wages were held not to be in the nature of payment at all, but the mode of calculating and ascertaining the actual amount of his wages. Archer v. James was a similar case, and was decided in the first instance on the authority of Chawner v. Cummins. In the Exchequer Chamber three judges held that Chawner v. Cummins was wrongly decided; and three other judges, on the other hand, approved the decision, and held that the deductions in question in the case before them were in the same category, and were an element only in calculating the true amount of the workman's wages. But there is not a word in any of the judgments which supports the contention that, where the amount of the wages is ascertained, the employer can discharge himself by set-off or payment on account. In Pillar v. Llynvi Coal and Iron Co. it was only decided that deductions of the character authorized by section 23 could not be made unless there was a contract in writing as required by the section. In Smith v. Walton, the workman having damaged a piece of cloth through negligent workmanship, the employer delivered to him the damaged cloth and deducted from his wages the value placed by the employer on the cloth. The question arose on an information against the employer for making an illegal payment. The court reversed the decision of the magistrates, who refused to convict, Lindley, L.J., saying that, whether there was a payment in goods or a set-off, the respondent had infringed the Act. The decision in Ex parte Cooper, has no bearing on the case before the House. Lamb v. Great Northern Railway was a decision on the amending Act, 1887, but the judgment of A. L. Smith, J., contains dicta on the construction of sections 2, 3, 4, and 23 of the Truck Act of 1831, which are in the appellants' favour. The judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Hewlett v. Allen has already been referred to. That case, however, was decided on the ground that the plaintiff had authorized and directed certain payments to be made by the employer on her behalf, and the decision was confirmed in this House on the same ground.

The writ in this action claimed payment to each of the appellants of the sum of 10s. deducted by the respondents. In the court of appeal, by some arrangement between the parties, the appellants confined their claim to a declaration that such deduction was illegal. The Master of the Rolls expressed some doubt whether the Court ought to entertain a suit for a declaration not ancillary to the putting in suit of any legal right. I share that doubt; but as the case has been fully argued and both parties appear to desire the decision of the House upon it, I am not disposed to say more. I am of opinion that the order appealed from should be reversed, and, the appellants and respondents having consented to the hearing in the Court of Appeal being taken as the trial of the action, that it be declared that the deduction by the respondents on the 30th of January, 1904, of the sum of 10s. from the wages due to the appellants respectively from the respondents at that date, was unauthorized and illegal, and that it be ordered that the respondents pay to the plaintiffs their costs of this suit, including the costs of the appeal to the Court of Appeal, and also the costs of this appeal.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I concur in the judgment about to be delivered by Lord Atkinson, which I have had the opportunity of reading.

Lord ATKINSON.—In this case, in which by the agreement of the parties, arrived at in the Court of Appeal, the relief claimed is limited to a declaration that a sum of 10s. was improperly deducted by the defendants from the wages of certain workmen employed in their service, the question for decision turns upon the construction of the third section of the Truck Act of 1831. The case of Jacob Williams, the plaintiff, is typical of the others.

It is admitted that he had, on the 23rd of January, in respect of the fortnight ending on that day, earned wages amounting to £3 13s. 2d. This sum, according to the practice prevailing in the defendants' colliery, would be payable on the 30th of January, 1904. On the 22nd of December, 1903, the plaintiff had wrongfully absented himself from his duty, and in respect of that misconduct had, on the 16th of January, 1904, been fined 30s., payable in three instalments of 10s. each, on the 30th of January, and on the 13th and 27th of February respectively. The defendants claim the right to deduct the sum of 10s., the instalment payable on the 30th of January, 1904, from the aforesaid sum of £3 13s. 2d. The plaintiff disputes that right.

The 3rd section of the Truck Act of 1831, as printed in the revised edition of the statutes, runs as follows: "The entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer in respect of any labour by him done, shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of the realm, and not otherwise, and every payment made to any such artificer by his employer of or in respect of such wages by the delivery to him of goods, or otherwise than in current coin aforesaid, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be, and is hereby declared illegal, null, and void."

Some comment was made on the use in this section of the word "or payable to such artificer."

I think these words are introduced for the purpose of meeting a case where some deduction or stoppage authorized by sections 23 and 24 of the statute has, in fact, been made, and the workman is only entitled to receive the balance of his wages remaining due after such deduction. It has been urged on behalf of the appellant that such a deduction as this does not come within the mischief aimed at by the Truck Acts; that those statutes were merely designed to prevent the payment of workmen's wages in equivalents for cash as distinguished from cash itself.

It may well be that this was the main object and purpose of this legislation, and that in this section the Legislature has used language which extends beyond the mischief aimed at, and reaches harmless transactions or practices not within its spirit. Still there is no ambiguity in the words used in the section. They are precise and clear, and require that the entire amount of the wages earned shall be "actually paid in the current coin of the realm and not otherwise."

It cannot, I think, be contended that the withholding by the master from the workman of a portion of the wages earned by the latter against his consent is, or could be held to be, a payment by the master to the workman of that very same portion. It is, in fact, the very opposite of payment. It is a refusal to to pay, for the not unnatural reason that an equivalent sum is due to the master by the workman. The requirements of the statute have therefore not been observed in this case. The wages earned have not been paid. The drawback, or stoppage, or deduction, or whatever it may be termed, is not one of those authorized by sections 23 or 24, yet it is sought to justify the course taken on this ground—that, inasmuch as in any action brought by the workman to recover his wages the master would be entitled to set off the debt due to him in reduction of the workman's claim, it is absurd and anomalous to hold that the master cannot before action brought make a deduction in respect of the claim which, after action brought, he can successfully rely upon by way of set-off. No doubt, at first sight, there would seem to be much force in this argument, but a little consideration will show that there may be good reason even for this anomaly. The whole principle upon which this legislation is based is that the workman requires protection, that if not protected he may be over-reached; and it is quite consistent with that principle to hold that in any such action brought by him to recover his wages he may be liable to have the sum, found on investigation before the legal tribunal to be due to him by his master, diminished by the sum found by the same tribunal on the same occasion to be due by him to his master, and yet at the same time to prohibit the master from, as it were, substituting himself for the legal tribunal, investigating his own claim against his workman in his own office, and deciding in his own favour. In this particular case no doubt the sum sought to be deducted is the amount of a judgment debt, and the danger referred to could not arise; but the argument as to the anomaly which I have mentioned dealt with the general scheme and machinery of the statute, and it was in respect of its general application that I consider it open to criticism.

The several authorities cited appear to me to support rather than refute the contention of the appellants. They may, I think, be roughly divided into two classes—namely, those cases like Chawner v. Cummins, in which charges were made by the employer for the use of the instrument by which the workman did his work and earned his wage; and those like Hewlett v. Allen, in which payments were in effect made by the master out of the wages by the authority of the workman for certain purposes not prohibited by the Truck Acts. In none of these cases was it contended that the master had the right to deduct here relied upon. On the contrary, the effort of the master in each of these cases was to justify the drawback on grounds entirely different from, and inconsistent with, those relied upon in this case.

In the first class of cases it was successfully contended that the charges made by the master were not deductions properly so-called from sums due for wages earned, but were sums to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of wages actually earned; and in the second class of cases the so-called drawbacks or deductions were justified on the grounds that these sums in truth and in fact represented portions of the wages earned, paid in current coin of the realm at the request of the workman to his duly appointed agent.

All the reasoning upon which the several tribunals in the cases cited based their respective decisions would have been unnecessary, and indeed beside the point, if the Truck Act had conferred upon the master the right here contended for—namely, the right to deduct from the workman's wages whatever the master could set off in a suit brought by the workman against him to recover those wages.

It may well be that the appellant has no merits—that a decision in his favour will enable him to violate his duty with impunity and evade the payment of his just and legally established liabilities; but, if that be so, the fault must lie on that "tutelary shelter," to use Lord Bowen's words, which the Legislature has thrown around him, without taking sufficient care so to mould and fashion it that it could not be open to abuse.

I think this appeal must be allowed, and the judgment of Bucknill, J., restored.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Smith, Rundell, & Dods, for Walter Morgan, Bruce, & Nicholas, Pontypridd.

Solicitors for the respondents, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for C. & W. Kenshole, Aberdare.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) — May 3.

PALETHORPE v. THE HOME BREWERY (LIMITED). (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant—Lease of public-house—Covenant to keep and conduct the house in a regular and proper manner—Knowingly do or suffer any act whereby renewal of licence refused—Act of sub-lessee.

By a lease of a beerhouse the lessee covenanted that he would at all times during his term keep and conduct the house in a regular and proper manner in every respect, and would not knowingly or willingly do or suffer any act whereby the licence might become indorsed, forfeited, or the renewal thereof refused, and would not commit any offence against the licensing laws for the time being in force. The lessee sublet the house, and the sub-lessee was convicted of permitting drunkenness on the premises, and the renewal of the licence was in consequence refused. In an action by the lessor against the lessee to recover damages for breach of covenant,

Held, that the first part of the covenant was an absolute covenant to keep and conduct the house in a regular and proper manner, and was not qualified by the subsequent part, and that there had been a breach of it entitling the lessor to damages.

Bryant v. Hancock & Co., [1899] A. C. 442, 48 W. R. Dig. 88, distinguished.

Appeal from a judgment of Farwell, J.

By a lease, dated the 1st of June, 1897, of a licensed beerhouse for the term of seven years from the 25th of March, 1897, at the yearly rent of £80, the defendants, who were the lessees, covenanted with the plaintiff, who was the lessor, that they "will not at any time during the continuance of the said term, without the consent of the lessor first had and obtained, convert the said demised premises into a shop, warehouse, or place of sale for goods or merchandize, or into a private dwelling-house, or open or use, or suffer the same to be opened or used, for any other purpose than a beerhouse, and also will at all times during the said term keep and conduct the same in a regular and proper manner in every respect, and will apply for and use their best endeavours when required to obtain a renewal of the existing licences or permission of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the vending of wines, ale, beer, and tobacco on the said demised premises, and shall not knowingly or willingly do or suffer any act whereby the same may become indorsed, forfeited, or the renewal thereof refused, and will not commit any offence against the licensing laws for the time being in force."

The defendants sublet the house and premises to a tenant from year to year, who agreed to conduct the house and premises in a regular and proper manner; but he was subsequently convicted of having permitted drunkenness on the premises, and the renewal of the licence was in consequence refused. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the defendants to recover damages for breach of the above covenant.

Farwell, J., held that the covenant to keep and conduct the house in a regular and proper manner in every respect was an absolute covenant by the defendants, and was not qualified by the subsequent part of the covenant, and that there had been a breach of it, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff for damages.

The defendants appealed.

Hugo Young, K.C., and Wood Hill, for the defendants.—The construction placed by the learned judge on the first part of the covenant—namely, that the lessees will at all times keep and conduct the house in a regular and proper manner in every respect—renders the subsequent part of the covenant superfluous. In construing the covenant the court ought to give due effect to each part of it, and to read it as a whole. It is wrong to read the first and subsequent parts of the covenant as covering the same thing: Bryant v. Hancock & Co., [1899] A. C. 442, 48 W. R. Dig. 88. The only way in which the various parts of the covenant can be consistently read together is by construing the first part as referring to the ordinary conduct of the house apart from offences against the licensing laws, which are dealt with by the later parts. The later parts of the covenant are clearly qualified, and hit at an act done by the lessees themselves, and not at an act of their assignees or underlessees: Wilson v. Twamley, 52 W. R. 529, [1904] 2 K. B. 99. Secondly, even if the first part of the covenant applies to offences against the licensing laws, upon its true construction it is limited to acts done by the lessees and does not include acts by their assignees or underlessees. There was therefore no breach of covenant by the defendants.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Arthur Houston, for the plaintiff.—In Bryant v. Hancock & Co. the whole question turned upon the meaning of the word "discontinuing" a licence—whether it meant refusing to renew or forfeiting. The House of Lords, upon the particular words of that covenant, held that it was directed to forfeiture, because otherwise the two parts of the covenant would cover the same thing. Here there is no qualification in the first part of this covenant. It is an absolute unqualified covenant to keep and conduct the house in a regular and proper manner in every respect. That covenant has been broken by the defendants.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We have heard an argument with reference to the application of the decision of the House of Lords in Bryant v. Hancock & Co. to the present case, but I do not think that we need really trouble ourselves with that at all, because there is in this case a covenant of which there has been a complete breach quite irrespective of the considerations which had necessarily to be gone into in Bryant v. Hancock & Co. Here there is a covenant by the defendants that they "will at all times during the said term keep and conduct the same in a regular and proper manner in every respect." It is said, and I think rightly said, that that is a positive covenant by the defendants that they will keep and conduct the house in a regular and proper manner in every respect, and that as a matter of fact in the events which have happened they have ceased to do so. They have in fact broken their positive covenant. In these circumstances we need not enter into the topics discussed by the House of Lords in Bryant v. Hancock & Co. In Wilson v. Twamley Collins, M.R., speaking of that case said: "The covenant in that case consisted of two parts, the first part being absolute in its terms, and the second being qualified by the introduction of the word 'wilfully.' The second part of the covenant applied to a matter which might also, in the ordinary use of language, be said to be described by the language of the first part; a matter which, if the word 'wilfully' had not been used in the second part, would come equally well within the terms of either part. The difficulty was as to whether, upon the construction of the covenant, the matter in question might be treated as coming within the first part, which was wide enough to cover it and was not qualified by the word 'wilfully'; and it was held that, because the covenant was divided into two parts, one so qualified and the other unqualified in its terms, the subject-matter of the first part must be limited, so as to give effect to the qualification imported by the word 'wilfully' in the second part." If we adopt, as we must do, the construction of the covenant pressed upon us by the learned counsel for the defendants, no such difficulty arises here as arose in that case, inasmuch as there is here a positive covenant by the lessees to keep and conduct the house in a regular and proper manner in every respect. It is quite immaterial why the house came to be not so kept. In truth and in fact the house came to be closed as a licensed house, and that was a breach of the covenant. The appeal must be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING and MOULTON, L.JJ., agreed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Warren & Allen, Nottingham.

Solicitors for the defendants, Dawes & Sons.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } March 23.
Swinfen Eady, J. }

GRIFFITHS v. VESEY. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Failure of purchaser to complete—Specific performance—Forfeiture of deposit—Practice—Costs—Form of order.

A defaulting purchaser failed to comply with a decree of specific performance, and further failed to pay the purchase-money and costs certified to be due from him to the vendors on the day fixed for payment thereof by the court on a motion of the vendors. The vendors, by a further motion, asked for a declaration that the deposit money was forfeited, and that they were at liberty to proceed to another sale, and for an order that the defaulting purchaser should pay the certified costs and also the costs of the previous motion.

The Court declined to make any order as to the costs of the previous motion, but otherwise made the order as asked.

Motion.

In this action the plaintiffs, as trustees of the will of a testatrix who died in January, 1904, contracted with the defendant to sell to him a house at the price of £2,400. On the signing of the contract the purchaser paid to the auctioneer a deposit.

The contract was entered into by the parties subject to and on the basis of certain conditions of sale, which had governed the sale by auction. Amongst these conditions of sale there was a condition in the usual form providing for forfeiture of the depos t money in the event of default on the part of the purchaser, and empowering the vendors in such a case to resell, the purchaser making good any loss which might thus be incurred. The 31st of December, 1904, was the date fixed for completion, but the purchaser failed to complete on that date, and the vendors accordingly commenced an action for specific performance.

On the 28th of June, 1905, judgment was given decreeing specific performance in default of appearance by the purchaser. This judgment directed the amount of purchase-money, interest, and costs to be computed, and an account taken of rents and profits received by the vendors since the date of completion. The plaintiffs, upon executing a conveyance which in the event of the parties differing was to be settled by the judge, and delivering to the defendant the title-deeds, were to be paid the certified balance produced by deducting the rents and profits from the purchase-money, interest, and costs.

On the 9th of August, 1905, the master certified the whole balance due to the plaintiffs to be £2,424 8s. 9d., and, on a motion of the plaintiffs, the court made an order, on the 17th of November, 1905, appointing a definite time and place for the payment of such balance, at which time and place the plaintiffs were to deliver the conveyance to the defendant. The defendant was ordered to pay the taxed costs of that motion.

On the appointed day the defendant failed to pay the certified balance to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs now moved for a declaration that the deposit money was forfeited to them, and that they were at liberty to proceed to another sale, the defendant making good any loss so occasioned, and paying the expenses of the same, and for an order that the defendant should pay the costs included in the master's certificate, together with the plaintiffs' taxed costs of the motion of the 17th of November, 1905.

Eve, K. C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the plaintiffs.—We do not desire rescission of the contract, because in that case we might not be entitled to retain the deposit money. We are not in this case asking for the usual order as appearing in Seton's Forms of Judgments and Orders, vol. 3, p. 2288. If the contract is not rescinded, the plaintiffs are clearly entitled to retain the deposit money: Jackson v. De Kadich, W. N. 1904, 168.

The defendant did not appear.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—I will make the order as asked in the notice of motion, except that I cannot make an order for payment of the costs of the motion of the 17th of November, 1905, as there is an order outstanding as to those costs. All proceedings in the action are to be stayed, except those necessary for enforcing payment of the costs directed to be taxed by the order on the motion of the 17th of November, 1905, or for giving effect to the present order.

Solicitors, Dubois & Co.

Chan. Div. } March 13, 20.
Warrington, J. }

In re AFRICAN FARMS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding-up—Statutory affidavit—Petitioner abroad—Power of attorney—Affidavit of attorney—Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903.

It is not a fatal objection to a petition to wind up a company that the affidavit verifying it has been made by some one other than the petitioner, rule 29 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903, being merely directory in this respect; and the court can accept any affidavit sufficient according to the ordinary practice as sufficient for the purpose. Therefore where the petitioner was resident in the Transvaal Colony, and the affidavit was made by a person resident in this country who knew the facts of the case better than the petitioner, and who was acting under a power of attorney for the petitioner, the affidavit was accepted.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In re Chartered Stores and Trading Co., 49 W. R. 75, [1900] 2 Ch. 870, not followed.

Petition.

This was a petition to have the above company wound up by the court.

The company was incorporated in 1902 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, and their registered office was in London. They owned farms in the Transvaal Colony.

The petitioner, Harry Blashfield Ramsey, was in the employment of the company, and managed one of their farms in the Transvaal, where he resided. He had executed a power of attorney appointing Arthur Walter Ramsey, who lived in the county of Kent in this country, to be his attorney and agent, with power (among other things) to ask, demand, sue for, and recover such sums of money as were owing to the petitioner, and to prosecute any action in any court in his name, and to manage and transact his affairs in Great Britain.

The statutory affidavit verifying the petition according to Form 9 of the rules of 1903 was made by the atterney, A. W. Ramsey, who described himself in the affidavit as the attorney of the petitioner. At the hearing of the petition a preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the company that the affidavit verifying the petition did not comply with the rules, and ought not to be accepted.

A. F. Peterson, for the company.—Rule 29 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903, requires the petition to be verified by the affidavit of the petitioner. It is not sufficient if made by his attorney: In re Charterland Stores and Trading Co., 49 W. R. 75, [1900] 2 Ch. 870.

He also referred to In re The Brandy Distillers Co., 17 Times L R. 272, and In re Carrara Marble Co., W. N. 1896, 87.

J. M. Gover, for the petitioner.—In re Charterland Stores and Trading Co. is the only case where a similar affidavit has not been allowed; and that case is in fact distinguishable.

WARRINGTON, J.—I think that I need not trouble you further, Mr. Gover. It is plain that the affidavit of the attorney in this case, who knows the facts of the case, is of more value than that of the petitioner, who is residing in South Africa. I should therefore have had no hesitation in accepting his affidavit if it had not been for the decision of Wright, J., in In re Charterland Stores and Trading Co., where a similar objection to that taken here was taken, and where Wright, J., refused to accept the affidavit considering that he had no power to dispense with the affidavit of the petitioner. I have looked into the practice upon the matter and have found that there have been a number of cases (some of them unreported) where an affidavit other than that of the petitioner has been accepted. I have also consulted Buckley, J., to whom, with myself, the business of company winding up is assigned, and he has pointed out, and I desire to point out, that rule 29 does not state what is the consequence of the affidavit being made by a different person. It does not state that the petition shall fail. The rule is, I think, merely directory as to the kind of affidavit which should be accepted as evidence of the facts stated in the petition. That leaves it open to the court to accept any affidavit which according to the ordinary practice of the court would be accepted as sufficient. I have already said that in this case the attorney's affidavit is of more value than that of the petitioner, and, therefore, upon the principle I have stated, I accept it as primâ facie evidence of the facts of the petition.

Objection overruled.

Solicitors, F. Kimber, Bull, & Duncan; Whitehouse & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) — May 1.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS FOR ENGLAND v. DURHAM RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.
WILLIAMSON v. DURHAM RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Sewer—Drain—Nuisance—Highway Board—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 95—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict c. 73), s. 25.

Public Health Act, 1875, s. 4: "'Sewer' includes sewers and drains of every description . . . except drains in or under the control of any authority having the management of roads and not being a local authority under this Act." Local Government Act, 1894, s. 25 (1): "As from the appointed day, there shall be transferred to the district council of every rural district all the powers, duties, liabilities . . . of any highway authority in the district, and highway boards shall cease to exist and rural district councils shall be the successors . . . of the highway authority."

Held, that a drain formerly under the control of a highway board did not become a "sewer" after the coming into operation of section 25 of the Local Government Act, 1894, although but for section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it would have been a "sewer" within the meaning of that Act.

Case stated by the justices of Durham.

Complaints were preferred by the respondents against the appellants under section 95 of the Public Health Act. 1875, whereby it was alleged that in or on land in the village of Old Quarrington, situate within the district of the respondents, there was a nuisance arising from a collection of foul sewage which was standing in a disused pond, and that the said nuisance was caused by the act or default of the appellants, the owners of said premises, and that notices had been served on the appellants requiring them to abate the said nuisance and to execute certain works and do certain things necessary for that purpose, to wit, to cause the whole of the stagnant water and foul sewage to be drained from the disused pond, the latter to be cleaned out, and the whole of the foul matter to be removed so that the same should no longer be a nuisance or injurious to health as aforesaid; and that the appellants had made default in complying with the notices aforesaid.

The following facts were either proved or admitted at the hearing of said complaints: The appellants were the owners of the farmhouse marked A in the plan which accompanies the case. The nuisance consists of a large collection of foul sewage standing in a disused pond in the middle of the village green at Old Quarrington, and has been caused by sewage coming from the premises, A, of the appellants, who admitted the existence of the nuisance.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Neither the land between the west side of the public highway and the pond, nor the pond, is the property of the appellants. . . . Formerly a stone conduit at the same point as the existing gully passed under the highway, and drains stated by the appellants to have been constructed by them about twenty years ago carried the sewage from the said premises into a hole where the gully now stands, and thence through the conduit under and to the west of the road into an open ditch on the other side of the road, which ditch emptied itself into the pond. A 4in. drain was stated to have been put in by the appellants about eighteen years ago to drain the water from certain spouts. About twelve years ago the old conduit was taken out by the Durham and Chester-le-Street Highway Board and the present gully, with 9in. pipe under the road and short 4in. drain, were substituted by the said highway board for the purposes of carrying off the surface water from the road and conveying it to the pond, the work being carried out under the superintendence of their surveyor, and the highway board connected the drains conveying the sewage from the appellants' premises with the gully. Neither the appellants nor the highway board gave notice as required by the regulations of the respondents of their intention to connect the drains from the appellants' premises with the gully, &c., constructed by the said highway board twelve years ago. On the Local Government Act, 1894, coming into operation the Durham and Chester-le-Street Highway Board ceased to exist, and its power, duties, and liabilities were transferred to the respondents, whose servants have since periodically cleared out the 9in. pipe and gully. The respondents have never in any way repaired the said gully or open channel.

The justices were of opinion that the nuisance existing in the said pond was caused by the act of the appellants, and made an order for the same to be abated, but stated this case for the opinion of the court.

The facts in respect to the second case were, for the purposes of the judgments below, identical.

Meynell, for the appellants.—For the purposes of this case I will admit that the appellants might clear out the pond without committing a trespass, although as a matter of fact they are not the owners. It is clear that this 9in. pipe is a sewer as it drains the sewage of more than one house, and that being so the case of Wilkinson v. Llandaff Rural Council, 52 W. R. 50, [1903] 2 Ch. 695, is an authority of the Court of Appeal directly in favour of the appellants. The duty of effectually draining is upon the local authority: Fordham v. Parsons, [1894] 2 Q. B. 780. If it is suggested that this sewer was a drain because under the control of a highway authority, vide section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the answer would be that by section 25 of the Local Government Act, 1894, the drain became vested in a local authority and thereby became a sewer.

Macpherson, for the respondents.—This 9in. pipe was admittedly a drain prior to 1894. It did not alter its character by operation of the 1894 Act, but became vested in the local authority as a drain. Secondly, it is only the duty of the local authority to supply a proper system of drainage, it is not obliged to provide sewers for a couple of isolated farms: Wincanton Rural Council v. Parsons, [1905] 2 K. B. 34, 53 W. R. Dig. 93. It is not sufficient to create liability, for the appellants merely to say that somehow they have got their sewage into the respondents' sewer: Brown v. Russell, 16 W. R. 511, L. R. 3 Q. B. 251; Kinson Pottery Co. v. Corporation of Poole, 47 W. R. 607, [1899] 2 Q. B. 41. Thirdly, in this case the respondents did not themselves make the drain, and would not be liable: see Attorney-General v. Guardians, &c., of Dorking, 30 W. R. 579, 20 Ch. D. 595. They only permit to remain what they find in being when they take over the drains: see per Cotton, L.J., in Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board, 28 W. R. 111, 12 Ch. D. 102, at p. 125.

Meynell replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case an order has been made against the appellants to abate the nuisance. [His lordship stated the facts.] As the case originally stood I do not think the order could stand. The order was to clear out the stuff in the pond, and if it were true that the appellants, not being the owners, could not obey the order without trespassing, it would be fatal to the order; but very wisely Mr. Meynell has consented to argue the case on the footing that both the appellants might clear out the pond without trespassing. What are the rights of the appellants in regard to the 9in. pipe under the road? To a large extent this case depends on the broad facts. It appears before the Act of 1894, about 1892, the highway authority put in the 9in. pipe in lieu of the conduit for the purpose of the protection of the road. They put in also a 4in. pipe, and they connected up the pipes which carried down the sewage from the farmhouse with the 9in. pipe. It cannot be contended that they purported to construct sewers. The work was quite different to what could have been done had a sewage system been in contemplation. No one would call that pipe a sewer in fact. The reason of the work being done, I come to the conclusion, was to protect the road. Was it a sewer under the Public Health Act, 1875? That turns on section 4 [which his lordship read]. One has only to read those words to see that up to the year 1894 it was not a sewer. Now I come to section 25 of the Act of 1894. [His lordship read it.] It seems to me, unless the language be clear, it could not be intended by that transfer of duties from the highway authority to the district council to alter the status of the physical thing then in existence. Therefore this pipe which was substituted for the conduit passed to the rural district authority as successors of the highway authority as a drain, and not as a sewer into which anyone might pour their sewage. Mr. Meynell argued that the pipe having vested in the local authority it became a sewer and was taken out of the exception of section 4. That seems to me to be going too far. Had it been otherwise, speaking for myself, I do think the Llandaff case is a distinct authority in Mr. Meynell's favour, where it was held that the local authority should be the party to prevent the nuisance. [His lordship read the head-note.] We should be bound, I think, by that judgment but that the pipe was excepted from being a sewer by section 4, which exception was not destroyed by the transfer of powers and duties effected by section 25 of the 1894 Act. For these reasons I think the order against these appellants was the right order. The appeal must be dismissed.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. But for the exception clause (section 4 of the Act of 1875) I think our judgment would have been in favour of Mr. Meynell. Until 1894 it cannot be disputed that it was not a sewer, because it was under the control of an authority having the management of roads. In 1894 the Local Government Act was passed, of which section 25 is material. [His lordship read it.] It may be said that the exception ceased to exist because the highway authority ceased to exist. But it seems to me if that was intended to be the operation of the Act of 1894, the Legislature should have clearly stated it. There must have been some reason for excepting channels under the management of highway authorities from being classed as sewers. That reason still remains why such channels should not be treated as other channels are treated where under the control of the local authority. I am, however, troubled by the fact that we are leaving in existence the distinction between a highway authority and a local authority, whereas the Legislature has made the bodies the same.

DARLING, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Crump & Co., for Aynsley Smith, Durham.

Solicitors for respondents, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for J. Chambers, Durham.

K. B. Div.
(Ridley, Darling, and Bray, JJ.) April 7.

WALKER v. MAYOR, &c., OF YORK. (a.)

Highway—Diversion of highway—Persons aggrieved—Public interest—Questions left to jury—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 89.

Section 89 of the Highway Act, 1835, provides: "In case of such appeal the justices at the next quarter sessions shall . . . impannel a jury of twelve disinterested men out of the persons returned to serve as jurymen at such quarter sessions, and if after hearing the evidence produced before them the said jury shall return a verdict that the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious to the public 'or' that the party appealing would not be injured or aggrieved, then the said court of quarter sessions shall dismiss such appeal . . . but if the said jury shall return a verdict that the proposed new highway is not nearer or not more commodious to the public, or that the party appealing would be injured or aggrieved, then the said court of quarter sessions shall allow such appeal, and shall not make such order as aforesaid.

Held, that the word "or" must be read "and," with the result that if the jury return a verdict that the party appealing is aggrieved, the court of quarter sessions must allow the appeal notwithstanding that the jury also return a verdict that the new highway is more commodious.

Case stated by the recorder of York.

The justices having certified that the proposed diversion of a certain public footpath would be more commodious to the public than the footpath proposed to be stopped up, the appellant, on the 15th of March, 1905, gave notice of appeal to the next court of quarter sessions under section 88 of the Highway Act, 1835, as being a party aggrieved.

Upon the hearing of the appeal on the 13th of April, 1905, evidence was given on the part of the appellant that he would be deprived of the exit from his land which he then had upon the public footpath.

The recorder left two questions to the jury under section 89: (1) Whether the proposed new highway was more commodious to the public than the existing one; (2) whether the parties appealing would be injured or aggrieved if the existing highway were stopped up as proposed and a new one substituted. The jury answered both questions in the affirmative.

The recorder thereupon dismissed the appeal, but stated this case for the opinion of this court.

Jenkins.—The section is a contradiction, but it is quite evident from the concluding words of the section that "if the jury shall return a verdict . . . that the party appealing would be injured or aggrieved," the recorder should have allowed the appeal. The recorder was influenced by the case of Rex v. Justices of Essex, 5 B. & C. 431, decided upon the Act of 1815, which, however, had no such section as section 89. If the recorder were right a man might be land-locked and yet could obtain no remedy because the jury had found the new highway to be more commodious. The recorder took the view, in order to make the section intelligible, that the jury must first find that the party appealing was injured or aggrieved in order to give him a locus standi to appeal at all. The section would bear no such interpretation.

S. G. Lushington.—There can be no doubt that the section as it stands is a contradiction, and the mistake has been discovered, for in section 64 of the Inclosure Act of 1845, which is practically word for word the same as this section, the word "or" has been replaced by the word "and," and so the contradiction is removed. But the court must be careful before it deliberately turns "or" into "and." Lord Halsbury, L.C., in Mersey Dock v. Henderson, 37 W. R. 449, 13 App. Cas., at p. 603, says: "I believe it is wholly unexampled so to read it when doing so will upon one construction entirely alter the meaning of the sentence, unless some other part of the statute or the clear intention of it requires that to be done."

RIDLEY, J.—In this case we think the appeal must be allowed. The question arises under section 89 of the Highway Act, 1835. Two questions were left to the jury, and the jury found, (1) The highway was more commodious to the public; (2) the party appealing was injured or aggrieved. Upon these findings the recorder came to the conclusion that the appeal ought to be dismissed. He founded his decision upon the case of Rex v. Justices of Essex, under an older Highway Act of 1815, containing similar provisions, and came to the conclusion that the Legislature must have intended that the party appealing, in order to have a locus standi, must first prove that he is a party aggrieved, and if he succeeded, then the court would consider the question whether the new highway were more commodious. That reasoning is not satisfactory. The Act of 1815 does not contain a section of this kind. I think it is true that the words in section 89 are contradictory. [His lordship read the first part of the section.] The argument is that the jury having found the highway more commodious, the appeal must be dismissed, and you could not get out of that result if that was the end of the section. But the concluding words of the section put the converse case, "if the jury shall return a verdict that the proposed new highway is not more commodious, or that the party appealing is aggrieved," the appeal shall be allowed. We think that upon the finding that the party appealing is aggrieved the proper order to make is to allow the appeal. If there were any doubt about it, it is removed by the words of section 64 of the Inclosure Act, 1845, which Mr. Lushington has very properly pointed out to us, although it adversely affected his argument. Now, when we come to look at that section in an Act ten years later we find the Legislature has amended what we must regard as a mistake and put "and" in the place of "or."

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Clearly the two halves of section 89 are irreconcilable. It is perfectly plain that what they meant was that the appellant should not succeed if the road was commodious and if he was not aggrieved, but if the road was commodious, yet if the party appealing was aggrieved, the appeal should be allowed. That is the only way the section could be read to do justice, and that is the reading of the second half. The case comes absolutely within the words of Lord Halsbury in the Mersey case.

BRAY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and it is quite clear that in the earlier part of the section there is a mistake. Suppose the jury had found that the new highway was not more commodious, yet that the appellant was not aggrieved, the appeal must be dismissed, which would obviously be absurd.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Ridsdale & Sons, for Crombie & Sons, York.

Solicitors for the respondent, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for Holtby & Procter, York.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, Ridley, Darling, and Walton, JJ.) April 28.

REX v. LINNEKER. (a.)

Criminal law—Intent—Attempt—Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), ss. 14, 18.

The Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, s. 14: "Whosoever shall shoot at any person or shall by drawing a trigger or in any other manner attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person with intent in any of the cases aforesaid to commit murder shall, whether any bodily injury be effected or not, be guilty of felony." Section 18: "Whosoever shall maliciously shoot at any person, or by drawing a trigger or in any other manner attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person with intent in any of the cases aforesaid to do some grievous bodily harm to any person, shall be guilty of felony." To commit an offence under these sections it is not sufficient to intend to shoot or to make preparations to shoot, but there must be "an attempt," an act in a series of acts which, if not interrupted, would lead to the commission of the crime.

A. was seen to put his hand in his pocket and draw out a loaded revolver; B. caught his arm after the revolver was clear from his pocket, a struggle ensued, and finally B. wrenched the revolver from A. During the struggle A. said repeatedly to B., "You've got to die."

Held, that A. was rightly convicted of the offence of attempting to discharge loaded arms.

Case stated by Jelf, J., at the trial of James Reginald Linneker at the Derby Winter Assizes on the 3rd of March, 1906, in an indictment charging him under the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 14 and 18, in the first count with feloniously attempting to discharge a certain revolver loaded with gunpowder and leaden bullets at one John Plowright Houton with intent to murder him; in the second count the same with intent to commit murder; and in the third count the same with intent to do the said John Plowright Honton grievous bodily harm. The indictment did not contain the words "by drawing a trigger," nor did it specify any other manner in which the attempt was made, but no objection was taken to the indictment on this score, the only objection being as hereinafter mentioned, that the evidence did not bring the case within the statute. The prisoner was convicted under the third count, sentence being postponed to the next assizes, and the prisoner being admitted to bail meanwhile subject to the following case: Mr. Honton was the general manager of the Bolsover Colliery. The prisoner, a young man in the employment of the colliery owners, interviewed Mr. Honton at his office on the 16th of February on the subject of his chances of promotion in the service. There was no sort of quarrel between them. Presently, in answer to a question, Mr. Honton said, "Why do you ask me that question?" The prisoner said, "I am going to tell you why," and he at once put his right hand into his overcoat pocket and commenced to pull something out. Mr. Honton saw something glitter like silver (which turned out to be a six-barrelled revolver), and it at once struck him that there was going to be mischief. Before the prisoner got the revolver (five barrels of which were loaded) quite clear from his pocket, Mr. Honton jumped up from his chair and sprang upon the prisoner, and was able to lay hold of his arm before he could raise it up. Prisoner had got the revolver clear from his pocket and had half risen from his chair when Mr. Honton seized him. They struggled for a few minutes. Once when Mr. Honton tried to open the door prisoner nearly got his arm loose, his right hand holding the revolver. While they were struggling the prisoner said several times "You've got to die." Eventually Mr. Honton wrested the revolver from him and with the assistance of another witness took him to the police station. On the way prisoner said, "I shall very likely do time for this, but whether it is long or short I shall do for you when I come out." Mr. Honton said, "Why; what have I done to you?" and prisoner said, "I think you have kept me back." Upon the facts, it was submitted by counsel for the defence, that there was no evidence of an attempt under the statute either with intent to murder or to do grievious bodily harm. The judge overruled the objection and told the jury that if they thought the prisoner took the revolver out of his pocket for the purpose of shooting

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Honton, and that if he had not been interrupted he would have, or probably would have accomplished that purpose, they might find him guilty of an attempt to discharge the revolver at Mr. Honton with intent to murder (first and second counts), or with intent to do grievous bodily harm (third count), and they convicted him on the third count. No objection was taken to the language of the summing up, the only point being that there was no case within the statute.

The prisoner was not represented.

A. M. White, for the prosecution.—There was ample evidence of "intent," and, it is submitted, also of the "attempt," as defined by Stephen, J., in his Digest of the Criminal Law, art. 50: "An attempt to commit a crime is an act done with the intent to commit that crime and forming part of a series of acts which would constitute the actual commission if it were not interrupted." Upon almost the same facts the judges said, in Reg. v. Brown, 15 Cox 199, that there might be a conviction under section 14, although they held that there was no offence under section 15; they did not look with approval on Reg. v. St. George, 9 C. & P. 483, or Reg. v. Lewis, 9 C. & P. 523, and the former case was now directly overruled by Reg. v. Duckworth, 40 W. R. 448, [1892] 2 Q. B. 38.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the conviction should be confirmed. The prisoner was indicted, so far as is material for the purposes of this conviction, for feloniously attempting to discharge a loaded weapon. The indictment was under sections 14 and 18, but did not contain the words "by drawing a trigger or in any other manner." It seems to me that the gist of the offence is the attempt to discharge loaded arms with intent to do bodily harm, and when there is evidence of that the conviction can be supported. I think it is necessary to distinguish between the offence of attempting to discharge and that which might have been made or might be an offence under some other provision of the criminal law, which involves only the intent to discharge or the intent to shoot a pistol or preparation to shoot, having got the pistol. I think there must be an attempt to discharge the firearms. Having said that in order that it might not be supposed that our opinion goes further than what I have endeavoured to suggest, we ought to see whether in this case there is evidence of an attempt. [His lordship referred to the facts set out above.] It seems to me that there is evidence. The test laid down by Stephen, J., in his Digest, and referred to in Reg. v. Duckworth, may be applied. It seems to me that there was an attempt to discharge; at any rate the attempt to discharge began when the man draws the pistol from his pocket and holds it in his hand, struggling to get his hand free. If we were not to hold that to be an attempt, it would lead to a serious defect in the administration of the law. On authority it seems to me that this view is supported. Reg. v. St. George was directly overruled in Reg. v. Duckworth, where a man had raised a pistol towards his mother. Reg. v. Lewis does not touch this case because in that case the weapon was not in a condition to be discharged, and therefore, whatever may be the facts in that case, it does not affect this question. In Reg. v. Brown the learned judge left the case to the jury under section 15; and the judges in their judgment, doubting Reg. v. St. George and Reg. v. Lewis, while they quashed the conviction, all expressed the opinion that the case was within section 14 or 18. I think, therefore, not only for the reasons I have endeavoured to express, but also because we have the support of the opinion of the judge to which I have referred, that this conviction must be confirmed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to add this: The evidence here is sufficient to justify the jury in finding that there was an attempt to discharge. We must be very careful, as it seems to me, always to bear in mind that while a criminal attempt involves intent, a criminal intent does not involve an attempt. Even when a man may be found in possession of a weapon apparently to carry out an attempt, if would be wrong to leave to the jury on these facts whether there was an attempt, for which there must be some overt act or a series of acts as it has been put by Stephen, J.

RIDLEY, J.—In reading this section, it may be called the shooting section, it must be remembered that the Legislature is repeating the former statute of 1837. There is evidence in this case of an attempt to discharge loaded arms.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 14 requires two things to be present in order to constitute the crime aimed at. There must be an intent, and a physical factor, an attempt to discharge a pistol. If a man does all those things which a man attempting to discharge a pistol would do as far as he was not interrupted by another man holding his hand, there is evidence for the jury of an attempt to discharge the pistol. There was that evidence here. [His lordship stated briefly the facts.] It has been assumed in some of the cases there were no consummate acts in proof of intent. But here there is sufficient evidence. And as for the attempt being proved, there was evidence for the jury and the conviction was perfectly right.

WALTON, J.—The question in this case is whether there was evidence of an attempt. It is obvious that every act done for the purpose of committing a crime is not necessarily an attempt. It may be merely preparation. I agree with my brethren that there was evidence of an attempt as distinguished from mere preparation. I say nothing about the form of the indictment because that has not been raised by the case.

Conviction affirmed.

Solicitor for prosecution, M. H. Humble, of Chesterfield.

K. B. D.
(Ridley, Darling, and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.) — April 10.

WAKEFIELD AND DISTRICT LIGHT RAILWAY CO. (Appellants) v. MAYOR, &c., OF WAKEFIELD (Respondents) (a.)

Local government—Rating—Light railway—"Used only as a railway"—Light Railways Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 48), s. 12, sub-sections 1, 2—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 211, sub-section 1 (b).

Section 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which gives the power to levy district rates provides (sub-section 1 (b)) as follows: "The owner of any tithes . . . or the occupier of any land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only . . . and the occupier of any land covered with water or used 'only' as a canal or towing-path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof."

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the word "only" must be read with "railway."

Section 12, sub-section 1, of the Light Railways Act, 1896, provides: "The Clauses Acts, as defined by this Act, and the enactments mentioned in the second schedule to this Act shall not apply to a light railway authorized under the Act except so far as they are incorporated or applied by the order authorizing the railway." Sub-section 2: "Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act and to any special provisions contained in the order authorizing the railway, the general enactments relating to railways shall apply to a light railway under this Act in like manner as they apply to any other railway; and, for the purposes of these enactments and of the Clauses Acts, so far as they are incorporated or applied by the order authorizing the railway, the light railway company shall be deemed a railway company, and the order under this Act a special Act, and any provision thereof a special enactment. . . ."

A light railway was constructed under an order made in pursuance of the Light Railways Act, 1896, the following clauses of the order being material: (16) Notwithstanding anything in this order contained the company shall not acquire or be deemed to acquire any right other than that of user of any road along or across which they lay the railway. (17) Nothing in this order or in any bye-law made under this order shall take away or abridge the right of the public to pass along or across every part of any road along or across which the railway is laid with carriages not having flange wheels or wheels suitable only to run on the rails of the railway. (49) The company may use on the railway carriages with flange wheels, or wheels suitable only to run on the rails of the railway, and subject to the provisions of this order, the company shall have the exclusive use of the railway for carriages with flange wheels or other wheels suitable only to run on the rails of the railway. (50) If any person (except by agreement with the company, or otherwise as by the order provided) uses the railway, or any portion thereof, with carriages having flange wheels or other wheels suitable only to run on the rails of the railway, such person shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

Held, that the land occupied by the lines of the rails of the light railway was land used only as a railway, and that the light railway was a railway constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance within the meaning of section 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Case stated by the justices of the city of Wakefield sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction at Wakefield.

The material parts of the special case are as follows:

"This was a complaint preferred by the Mayor, &c., of Wakefield against the Wakefield and District Light Railway Co., for that they being a company duly rated and assessed to two several rates made by the said mayor and corporation . . . and in and by a rate in the nature of a general district rate . . . which had been lawfully demanded in writing, had not paid the same or any part thereof, but had refused to do so (save as hereinafter appears) for the space of fourteen days before the making of the complaint, and after hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by the appellants and respondents we did thereupon order that the said sums be paid by the appellants. . . ."

"1. At the hearing of the said complaint it was proved or admitted that the said rates were duly made and demanded of the appellants, and that the appellants were therein rated in respect of certain light railways described in the rate as lines of rails. Such rails are laid and situated in certain public streets . . . It was further proved that the appellants had tendered to the respondents in respect of the said rates the sum of £10 0s. 7d., being the total sum charged by the said rates calculated on one-fourth part only of the said net annual value, and that the respondents had refused to accept the same. It was admitted that the appellants were in occupation of the said lines of rails and the land occupied thereby.

2. The said lines of rails comprise Railways Nos. 3, 6, 7, and 8, authorized by clause 10 of the Wakefield and District Light Railway Order, 1901, and lie entirely in certain streets within the city of Wakefield . . . which are highways dedicated to the public and repairable by the inhabitants at large, and are vested in the Corporation of Wakefield as urban authority pursuant to the Public Health Act, 1875. The traffic along the said lines of rails is worked by electricity on what is commonly called the overhead system by means of electricity conveyed to the vehicles travelling along the said line of rails by wires suspended from posts placed alongside the said roads. The said vehicles are used for the conveyance of passengers and parcels, and the public are entitled to be conveyed along the said line of rails on payment of the rates and charges authorized by the said orders.

3. The said orders may be referred to and are to be deemed to form part of this case.

6. We held that the said land occupied by the said line of rails was not land used only as a railway, and that the said railways were not railways constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance within the meaning of section 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: (1) Whether the land occupied by the said line of rails is or is not land used only as a railway constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance within the meaning of section 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act, 1875. (2) Whether the said railways are or are not railways constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance within the meaning of the said sub-section. (3) Whether the occupiers of the said land occupied by the said lines of rails are or are not entitled to the benefit of the partial exemption provided for in section 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act, 1875."

Ryde (Danckwerts, K.C., with him), for the appellants.—In this court I must admit that the word "only" in section 211 (1) (b) must be also read with the word "railway": Swansea Improvements and Tramways Co. v. Swansea Urban Sanitary Authority, 40 W. R. 283, [1892] 1 Q. B. 325. The question then is: "Are these lines only used as a railway?" It is submitted they are. It is true that the public have access, vehicles may cross or run along the surface of the lines if the wheels are spaced the same breadth as the lines, but they cannot by clause 50 of the order use the grooves, and by clause 49 the company has the exclusive use of the grooves. It is in respect of these lines—the exclusive use of these lines—that the company is rateable at all, and therefore it cannot be said that the lines are not "only used" as a railway. This is strengthened by considering the use of the word "only" in connection with "land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only." It is a fact that over a large portion of such land there are sporting rights. Are the occupiers to be deprived of the exemption of the sub-section for that reason? Secondly, assuming that the land is used only as a railway, is it a "railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for any public conveyance"? Certainly tramways are not now exempt: see the Swansea case. But light railways are not tramways, but railways, within the meaning of section 211 (1) (b). This is shown by reference to section 12, sub-section 2, of the Light Railways Act, 1896, which enacts that the "general enactments" relating to railways shall apply to a light railway under the Act in like manner as they apply to any other railway, and the light railway for such purposes shall be deemed a railway company and the order a special Act. Hence section 211 (1) (b) being a "general enactment" relating to railways, it applies to a light railway which is to be deemed for that purpose a railway company and the order a special Act. "Enactment" is used, not "Act," and must include a reference to a single "section": see the use of the word later in the same sub-section, "any provision thereof a special enactment."

He referred also to Yorkshire (Woollen District) Electric Tramways Co. v. Ellis, 53 W. R. 303, [1905] 1 K. B. 396.

Clavell Salter, K.C. (Mackenzie with him), for the respondents.—The land is not "only used" as a railway. In rating cases the substance of the matter must be looked at, and in substance the land occupied by these lines is used freely by the public and by vehicles. What the appellants seek to establish is not that it is "used only as a railway" but that it is used only as a railway by the appellants. If the court is with me on the first point it is unnecessary to argue the second. This is not a "railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament." The words "general enactments" do not apply to any section in an Act dealing with railways with which the Act in other respects has nothing to do. They only refer to Acts dealing peculiarly with railways, and only in respect to such Acts is the order to be deemed a special Act. This is borne out by the "enactments" mentioned in section 12 (1) and set out in the second schedule to the Act. All these enactments are Acts or parts of Acts dealing solely with railways; it must be admitted that the Legislature certainly there uses the word "enactment" to cover individual sections, still they are sections out of Acts relating to railways solely.

RIDLEY, J.—This case on one point has been one of great difficulty, but on the other point the difficulty has not been so great The question arises in this way: [His lordship read the facts set out above.] The magistates decided that the land occupied was not used only as a railway and that the railway was not a railway constructed under an Act of Parliament within the meaning of that section. It is true, I think, that tramways are different both from light railways and from fully constituted railways. There can be no doubt, following the judgment of Wills, J., in the Swansea case, that tramways are well known, both in their origin and nature, to be something essentially different from railways, and that in the Public Health Act of 1875, where railways are spoken of, it cannot possibly be supposed that tramways are included. He declined to define either tramways or railways, and I shall follow his example. But when one deals with the distinction between a light railway and a fully constituted railway the difficulty is more substantial. The words of section 211 (1) (b) are: [His lordship read them.] I read in the word "only" in connection with the word "railway" following the decision I have spoken of. Therefore we have to ask ourselves "Is this land used only as a railway?" I suppose these words were used with reference to the usual kind of railway, where the land, enclosed between fences, was owned by the railway, and they fit into that state of circumstances without difficulty. But in this case with which we have to deal, this particular light railway is in no respects, as far as I can make out, distinguishable from a tramway so far as outward circumstances are concerned. It passes along a highway, over which other persons have the right to pass; carts and passengers can pass to and fro without committing a trespass. The only thing in respect of which the occupiers of the light railways are assessable to the poor rate is the metals which they place on the highway, or possibly a smaller thing still, viz., the opening in the railway lines to which they have the exclusive right; for other persons can pass to and fro along the metals so long as they do not use the grooves of the metals themselves, and it is not a trespass to use the metals merely because the breadth of the vehicle is identical with the gauge of the lines. Under these circumstances, is the land used only for that purpose? I had considerable doubt whether, considering the rights which the public exercise, this railway ought not to be classed with tramways, but on the whole I think that the appellants' argument is right: "I am rated only for the metals, and that is the only thing for which I am rated; I have the exclusive right, and the land is only for the railway." I think that is the right decision. Allowing, as I do, for the difference between a fully constituted railway and this railway, still they are alike in this respect, that what they have got is used for themselves only. And the difference in the case of some light railways would not be so marked because in some districts they are the owners of land in the same way as an ordinary railway. On the first point, therefore, I think Mr. Ryde is right.

On the other point I do not find so much difficulty. Was the light railway constructed under an Act of Parliament for public conveyance? Now, in the first instance it was not directly so, because it was made under an order in pursuance of the Light Railways Act, an order made in 1901. But when you look at the provisions of section 12 of the Light Railways Act, 1896, that difficulty is got over. It is a section dealing with the question how far existing legislation relating to railways is to be applied to light railways, and provides: [His lordship read the section.] It seems to me, therefore, that that section says you are to treat the light railway, although not made directly under an Act, as though made under a special Act, and that the order is to be called a special Act. That gets over the difficulty which I have mentioned, but it is not directly made under an Act of Parliament, but only indirectly. The Act of Parliament seems to say you are to treat the order as a special Act. It says the "general enactments relating to railways" shall apply to light railways. If section 211 of the Public Health Act is a "general enactment relating to railways," it seems to me that this point must be decided in favour of Mr. Ryde. Mr. Salter meets that by saying the enactments to be found in the schedule of the Light Railways Act, 1896, are in the main, if not entirely, regarding the conduct and management of railways, and he says that it is only in respect to such subject-matter that this section 12 applies. Well, I do not think that this is a very sound argument—for there ought to have been on this supposition something like this, "general enactment relating to the 'conduct or management' of railways," whereas these words are left out, and I think the natural meaning of the words is that section 211 is an enactment relating to railways. The word "enactment" is not the same as the word "Act." "Act" means the whole Act, but an "enactment" is an "Act" or a part of it, so that a section or part of an Act of Parliament might be an "enactment." In this case I think section 211 is an enactment relating to railways, and it must be applied to light railways, and I think the light railway must be deemed to have been constructed under a special Act. For these reasons I think the decision of the magistrates is wrong and that the railway is entitled to the exemption.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case is a difficult one on both points. I do not propose to say anything about the second point, but only upon the point which arises on the construction of section 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875. Now as to that my view is, these appellants may say the roads in question are shared with other persons, and in respect of them they would not be rated. But they are rateable because they have the exclusive use of some land on which they have been permitted to lay down their lines and the necessary appurtenances. That railway they alone may use as a railway and other persons are forbidden so to use it. Therefore all that land for which the appellants are rateable, all that thing, whatever it may be for which they are rateable, is used only as a railway. It is true people may cross the line of railway, and even their carts may run along upon it, although not in the same way as the appellants', because they may not use the flange, but the kind of use by others of railways where there happens to be a level crossing as in the case of level crossings over such a railway as the London and North-Western Railway, where if you were to add the level crossings together you would find they made up a large portion of the length of the railway. You must read the word "only" as "only" by a railway company. In respect of those railways which have always been regarded as entitled to the exemption, I believe the old railway Acts empower people to use their own engines on the railway lines, and it was rather contemplated that people would use the railways just as motor-cars now make use of the roads, yet the railway was used only as a railway. For these reasons it appears to me that this light railway is entitled to the exemption conferred upon railways by the Public Health Act, 1875.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the exemption of section 211 applies. [His lordship read the description of the property rated as set out in the case.] Now, is that property used only as a railway? I think it is. It is quite true that persons pass over it in the exercise of their rights, but that does not prevent the lines being used in their character of a railway by the company. For that reason of exclusive use, they become rateable. The company would have the same right as the ordinary subject; but for that exclusive right they have to pay rates. It seems to me impossible to say, on the one hand, they have the exclusive right which makes them rateable, and on the other hand to say they have not the exclusive right to use that hereditament as a railway.

On the next question, whether it is constructed under an Act of Parliament, it seems to me that the construction contended for by the appellants, that section 12 of the Act of 1896 had the effect of making this order an Act of Parliament and making this structure a railway constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament, is correct. And this section 211 is a general enactment. I am sure if the section instead of exempting had imposed a higher rate upon railways, it would have been impossible to say it was not a general enactment relating to railways. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Ashurst, Morris, & Crisp.

Solicitors for the respondent, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for W. W. Greenhalgh, Wakefield.

Privy Council.

(On Appeal from the Supreme Court of Tasmania.)
Dec. 4.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND CO. v. MARINE BOARD OF TABLE CAPE. (a.)

Evidence—Deed of grant—Construction—Circumstances under which executed—Improper rejection of evidence—Acts of user before grant.

When the obvious intention under a deed of grant is to give a title to what has been taken and retained before the actual grant, acts of user before the grant are cogent evidence of the identity of what is granted, for they lead up to and explain what was intended to be conveyed.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Tasmania.

The action was for trespass to land. The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Haldane, K.C., J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and H. B. Bompas, for appellants.

Asquith, K.C., Dobbie, K.C. (Solicitor-General of Tasmania), and Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., Lords MACNAGHTEN, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir FORD NORTH) was delivered by Earl of HALSBURY, L.C. — The action out of which these appeals arise was an action of trespass practically to try the right to a part of the foreshore of Emu Bay in Bass's Straits. Their lordships are not able to acquiesce in the suggestion that the decision of this case has so wide and important a result as some of the learned judges seem to have supposed. Nevertheless, it is of course important to the parties in its immediate result and the consequences which follow from them.

The facts which lead up to the question in debate may be shortly summarized. An Act of Parliament was passed in the sixth year of King George the Fourth (6 Geo. 4, c. 39) for the purpose of encouraging the cultivation of waste lands in what was then the penal colony of Van Diemen's Land. It contemplated the granting of a charter to certain persons, and the appellant company was accordingly incorporated by charter dated the 10th of November, 1825. Subsequent legislation (10 & 11 Vict. c. 57) having authorized the grant to the company of tracts of land, the real question now in debate is whether the locus in quo of the alleged trespass is included in a grant, dated the 27th of July, 1848, made in pursuance of that legislation.

The action was tried before Mr. Justice Clark and a jury at Launceston in Tasmania, and a verdict was found for the defendants, the present respondents. The argument appears to have wandered over a very wide field, but the direction of the learned judge to the jury, which must have had great weight with them, was that the acts of user proved to have taken place over the locus in quo were of no importance, and in fact were not evidence at all, since they were acts which were antecedent in date to any grant made by the Crown. To understand the relevancy and importance of this direction it is only necessary to observe that both the Act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 57 and the subsequent grant recite that the company had taken possession of the lands intended to be granted and incurred expense in the improvement thereof, and the grant is assumed to be of such a character that it neither expressly excludes nor expressly includes the locus in quo. It can hardly be doubted, in view of the recital to which reference has been made, that it was intended to authorize by the statute of Victoria the granting of a title to the company of lands of which they had taken possession and upon which they had expended money; neither can it be doubted that the grant itself, when made, was intended to confer a title to what the company had taken possession of, and so far from not being evidence, their lordships consider user was very cogent evidence of what was intended to be granted. It certainly was not evidence, as the learned judge points out, of possession against the Crown, neither was it evidence of a lost grant. The learned judge very satisfactorily disposes of both these suggestions, but it is difficult to understand why it was not evidence to identify the place the title of which the Crown intended to confirm to the company.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is quite true that if the language of the grant itself were absolutely plain and unambiguous, no amount of user would prevail against the plain meaning of the words: see North-Eastern Railway Co. v. Hastings, [1900] A. C. 260, 48 W. R. Dig. 161. It is, however, impossible to contend that the language of this instrument can be so represented. The language is very wide, but when one finds such a recital as this: "the company have been authorized to take possession of several portions of land, and have ever since been and now continue in possession thereof, but no grant thereof has been made to the land company," when these are the circumstances under which the grant is actually made —why is it not evidence, and cogent evidence, when the taking possession of the particular piece of land is proved, and the continuance in possession before and after the grant is proved? The time when, and the circumstances under which, an instrument is made, supply the best and surest mode of expounding it, and when the obvious intention is to give a title to what has been taken and retained before the actual grant, it is manifest that what has been so taken and retained is cogent evidence of what is granted. When evidence of this character has been practically withdrawn from the jury, it is impossible to allow the verdict thus obtained to stand.

The circumstances under which modern user may be proved to explain a written instrument are treated of with great precision by the learned judges who advised the House of Lords in Waterpark v. Fennell, 7 H. L. Cas. 650.

The learned judge stated, and stated quite correctly, that you cannot say that acts of user were acts of user under a grant when they were done before the grant existed. It does not follow that such acts were not relevant to be proved when, as in this case, they lead up to and explain what is afterwards granted.

It would be a singular application of the maxim quoted by Coke, 2 Institutes 11, contemporanea expositio est fortissima in lege, to suggest that the proof of user must be confined to ancient documents, whatever the word "ancient" may be supposed to involve. The reason why the word is relied on is because the user is supposed to have continued, and thus to have brought us back to the contemporaneous exposition of the deed.

The contemporaneous exposition is not confined to user under the deed. All circumstances which can tend to show the intentions of the parties whether before or after the execution of the deed itself may be relevant, and in this case their lordships think are very relevant to the questions in debate.

Another direction given by the learned judge to the jury and calculated to mislead them was his direction in relation to the leases of some part of the land in question. He suggested, not very obscurely, that the lease of part of the jetty which was leased and which extended over the foreshore was only evidence of an easement, and that the lessor of such a structure need not own the land over which such a structure was erected. That such a division might in point of law exist is nothing to the purpose. There was no evidence of any such severance of interest, and the effect of such an observation was well calculated to mislead the jury, who ought to have been told that such evidence was clearly evidence of seisin in the locus in quo.

Their lordships do not think it desirable, as this is to be tried again, to deal more minutely with the facts of the case, though they think it right to say that, as to the question of lost grant, or possession against the Crown, they would have been prepared to affirm the judgments under appeal; but, reluctant as they have been to order a new trial where so much time has been spent and expense incurred already, and where so much learning and care have been bestowed upon the argument, they are unable to say that the question has been properly left to the jury. They will accordingly humbly advise his Majesty that the judgments of the Supreme Court ought to be discharged, and that there should be a new trial, and that the costs in the Supreme Court ought to abide the result of the new trial, The respondents will pay to the appellants the costs of these appeals.

Solicitors for appellants, Bompas, Bischoff, Dodgson, Coxe, & Bompas.

Solicitors for respondents, Bircham & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } April 4, 5, 7.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DE WINTON. (a.)

Corporation—Municipal corporation—Borrowing powers —Ultrà vires—Interest on overdraft at bankers—Liability of borough treasurer—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 18-21, 25-28, 139-144—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 6, 189, 198, 209, 210, 233-237, 245-247, 265—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1.

A municipal corporation had overdrafts on various accounts at the bank beyond their statutory powers of borrowing. The defendant, who was the borough treasurer, and also the manager of the said bank, by the authority of the corporation, credited himself and debited the corporation with interest on such overdrafts at 4½ per cent., with quarterly rests.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to credit himself or to debit any of the borough funds with interest on any of the overdrafts appearing in the accounts theretofore put in by him as treasurer since his appointment.

Held, also, that the borough were not necessary parties to the action.

Held, further, that though the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, has provided a remedy by certiorari, or an appeal against the rate, there is nothing in the Act to deprive the Attorney-General, at the relation of a party interested, of the power of obtaining by injunction an order to restrain the payment of money being made under an order of the borough council, for which order there was no legal warrant.

(a.) Reported by P. W. PEGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tynemouth Corporation v. Attorney-General, [1899] A. C. 293, 47 W. R. Dig. 43, followed.

Witness action.

This was an action brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of C. F. E. Allen, and also by the relator, who was a burgess and town councillor of the borough of Tenby.

The defendant W. S. de Winton was the treasurer of the borough, and also the South Wales district manager of Lloyd's Bank (Limited).

The defendant was appointed treasurer on the 6th of July, 1903, the corporation at that date having an overdraft at the said bank beyond their statutory powers of borrowing, of £4,959 11s. 9d.

On the 23rd of July, 1903, the council of the said borough passed a resolution: "That Lloyd's Bank (Limited), at Haverfordwest, being the bankers of the corporation, be and they are hereby authorized to honour all cheques drawn on the treasurer, whether the account be in credit or overdrawn, signed by any three members of the town council for the time being, and countersigned by the town clerk, and to accept the indorsement of the said town clerk upon all cheques paid to the credit of the account, and that the authority be given under the common seal."

On the 18th of June, 1904, the overdraft had increased to £5,795, and at the date of the commencement of the action amounted to £3,707, but had since been discharged.

During the period between the defendant's appointment and the commencement of the action, the borough had accounts with the said bank of their borough fund under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and of their district rates, and water rates under the Public Health Act, 1875, and of harbour and pier rates under private Acts and orders; all these accounts fluctuated from time to time, but were always overdrawn to some extent, and on all of them the defendant had debited the borough and credited himself with interest at 4½ per cent., with quarterly rests, the total amount of such interest for the period from the 23rd of July, 1903, to the 30th of June, 1904, was £215 5s. 6d.

On the 26th of September, 1904, the writ in this action was issued, claiming (1) a declaration that the payment made by the defendant as such treasurer, or charged against the said borough by the defendant in his accounts as such treasurer, as and by way of interest on certain overdrafts granted to the said borough by the defendant or by Lloyd's Bank (Limited) were illegal, and to the knowledge of the defendant beyond the powers of the corporation of Tenby, and a breach of trust; and (2) an injunction to restrain the defendant from any further payments out of the funds of the corporation of any further sums by way of interest upon any of the said overdrafts.

Upjohn, K.C., and E. G. Palmer, for the relator.—No imputation is made against the defendant; the action is to determine points of law only. The corporation defrayed the interest on their overdrafts from time to time by means of pier and harbour rents, rates and tolls, and this was illegal. The statutes affecting the case are, first, the general statutes—namely, the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, ss. 18-21, 25-28, 139-144; the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 189-198, 209, 210, 233-237, 245-247, 265; and the Local Loans Act, 1875; and, secondly, the private Acts—namely, the Improvement Act, 1838 (1 Vict. c. 13); the Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 3) Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. ccxlviii.); and the Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 3) Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. cci.). A common law corporation may borrow by overdraft, but a corporation under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, cannot. [Counsel also referred to Thomas v. Devonport Corporation, 48 W. R. 89, [1900] 1 Q. B. 16; Richter v. Hughes, 2 B. & C. 499; Reg. v. Reed, 28 W. R. 787, 5 Q. B. D. 483; Smith v. Southampton Corporation, 50 W. R. 651, 87 L. T. 171; Reg. v. Saunders, 24 L. J. M. C. 45.] The treasurer is not a mere servant of the corporation, he is the custodian of the trust funds belonging to the borough. The corporation are bound to appoint him, he is a statutory officer with statutory duties. The corporation are not necessary parties: ord. 16, r. 4; Barnes v. Addy, 22 W. R. 505, L. R. 9 Ch. 244.

Macmorran, K.C., R. C. Glen and Bethune, for the defendant.—The treasurer is liable to be dismissed at any moment: Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 18. He is an officer bound under the above statute to obey the orders of the corporation; his duty is not to the burgesses, but to the corporation. Reliance is also placed on the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 265, and the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1. The corporation ought to have been added as defendants. The accounts had been audited by the borough auditors, and submitted to and passed by the council, and if the payments were in fact illegal the proper remedy was not by injunction, but by certiorari under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 141.

Counsel also referred to Lawford v. Billericay Rural District Council, 51 W. R. 630, [1903] 1 K. B. 772.

Cur. adv. vult.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This is an action by the Attorney-General on the relation of a burgess and town councillor of the borough of Tenby against the defendant, who is the treasurer of the borough, an office to which he was appointed on the 6th of July, 1903, and the object of the action is to impeach the accounts of the defendant so far as they relate to payments for interest with which the defendant has credited himself and debited the borough funds, and to restrain similar charges in the future. The facts are not in dispute. When the defendant was appointed the borough had exhausted its borrowing powers, and had, in addition, an overdraft with its bankers of over £4,959, which had increased to £5,795 by the 18th of June, 1904. The writ in this action was issued on the 26th of September, 1904. During the period between the 6th of July, 1903, and the issue of the writ the borough had accounts of their borough fund under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and of their district rates and water rates under the Public Health Act, 1875, and of harbour and pier rates under private Acts and Orders; all these accounts fluctuated from time to time, but were always overdrawn to some extent, and on all of them the defendant has debited the borough and credited himself with interest at 4½ per cent., with quarterly rests. The plaintiff does not ask for any order for payment; none of the sums have in fact been paid, but he asks for a declaration that they are improperly debited to the borough in the treasurer's account, and for an injunction to restrain similar debits in the future. The defendant takes the objection at the bar that the borough are necessary parties to the action. The suit is, no doubt, somewhat unusual, but no claim is made against the borough; they will not be bound by any decision in this action, and their interests are not likely to be prejudiced by any lack of information on the defendant's part, inasmuch as the town clerk happens to be the defendant's solicitor in the action.

If the plaintiff succeeds the borough benefits; if he fails it is no worse off than before. I therefore overrule this objection.

The defendant's next contention is that he is not personally liable, that the overdrafts and interest thereon were made and debited by the order of the borough, and that he merely acted as their servant. I am of opinion that this contention is not well founded. The question before me relates to the funds collected by and on behalf of the borough for public purposes under the Municipal Corporations Act and the Public Health Act and the private Harbour Acts, and it has been settled, at any rate since Lord Cottenham's decision in Attorney-General v. Aspinall, 2 M. & C. 613, that property held for public purposes is held upon charitable trusts, and, to quote his words at p. 618: "If the property in question be subject to any public trust, and if the appropriation complained of be not consistent with such trust, but for purposes foreign to it, and if there be not, in the Municipal Corporations Act (now the Act of 1882), any provision taking from the court its ordinary jurisdiction in such cases, then it will follow that the Attorney-General has, under the circumstances stated, a right to file the information and to pray that the fund may be recalled, secured, and applied for the public, or, in other words, charitable purposes, to which it is by the Act devoted." I have recently had to consider this case in Stevens v. Chown, 49 W. R. 460, [1901] 1 Ch. 894, and I will merely say that I remain of the opinion there expressed, and all the more so because it has been approved by Lord Lindley in Yorkshire Miners v. Howden, [1905] A. C. 256. It is plain, therefore, that this court would have jurisdiction to restrain the borough from misapplying these funds on the ground of breach of trust: Attorney-General v. Newcastle-on-Tyne, 23 Q. B. D. 492, 38 W. R. Dig. 139. But the defendant is their treasurer, and knows that the moneys which he has credited to himself are trust moneys, and he is clearly amenable to the jurisdiction of the court, and cannot escape by pleading the wrongful orders of his employers. There is no question of repaying here; but even if there were, the defendant knew that this was a trust fund, and "those who know that a fund is a trust fund cannot take possession of that fund for their private benefit except at the risk of being liable to refund it in the event of the trust being broken by the payment": per Fry, J., in Foxton v. Manchester, 44 L. T. 406. 29 W. R. Dig. 14. But the treasurer is not a mere servant of the council; he owes a duty and stands in a fiduciary relation to the burgesses as a body; he is the treasurer of the borough (section 18); all payments to and out of the borough fund must be made to and by him (section 142); he has to account to three auditors, two appointed by the burgesses and one by the mayor (section 25), and although he holds office during the pleasure of the council only (section 18), this does not enable him to plead the orders of the council as an excuse for an unlawful act. In my opinion the observations of Erle, J., in Reg. v. Saunders with relation to a county treasurer, apply with equal force to a treasurer under the Municipal Corporations Act. "If an order be made on a county treasurer to pay expenses wholly disconnected with county matters, such an order is without jurisdiction, and one which the treasurer would be bound to disobey; and if the treasurer did pay it, it would be the duty of the quarter sessions not to allow the items of such expenses in the treasurer's account."

It was next contended by the defendant's counsel that the overdrafts were not illegal on some suggested analogy to the class of contracts that may bind a corporation, although not under seal; but the borrowing powers of the borough in this case are subject to statutory conditions, restrictions, and prohibitions, and these cannot be dispensed with; as Bayley, J., says in Richter v. Hughes, "the Act of Parliament therefore gives a special power, and that power ought to be strictly followed, and as it authorizes them to borrow a certain sum of money and afterwards by rates to pay the interest of the money borrowed, they have no right to borrow beyond the specified amount, or to raise rates to pay interest upon any higher sum": see Wenlock v. River Dee Co., 10 App. Cas. 354. In the present case the borough has not merely overdrawn from time to time, but they have a normal floating debt, as appears from their resolution of the 23rd of July set out in the statement of claim, limited only by their creditors' willingness to advance. This case is to my mind indistinguishable in principle from the decision of the Divisional Court in Smith v. Southampton Corporation. In that case a borough council in their estimate for a general district rate for the borough included items which consisted of debts contracted in former years, and which had from year to year been carried to a "suspense account" opened for that purpose, and of a balance due for works executed in previous years. The council from time to time paid these old debts by money borrowed from their bank by overdrafts, but, so far as the ratepayers were concerned, the items remained unpaid so long as they appeared in the suspense account. The appellant appealed against the rate on the ground that it contained charges incurred more than six months before the making of the rate, and it was held that the rate was bad. The Lord Chief Justice, 87 L. T. Rep., at p. 175, says: "It was said by the corporation that they had borrowed from their bank, and that it was true their accounts were going from bad to worse, and that they were owing their bank more and more, but they contended that they had paid their tradesmen and had paid their principal debts, and that the whole had become a debt due to the bank, and that, therefore, it must only be assumed at the end of the given financial year that they owed the bank so much money, and that it was to meet that debt that they made this rate. It seems to me that if that argument were allowed to prevail, a public body would only have to arrange with their bankers to borrow money to pay their debts and so defeat the provisions of the Public Health Act altogether. I cannot think that argument is right." Then Channell, J., explains clearly the true ground on which a ratepayer is entitled to complain at p. 176: "The objection means that any particular ratepayer is entitled to say that the rating authority are charging him with a sum that ought to have been charged upon and paid by the ratepayers in previous years. To that extent it is a meritorious objection. The principle is that corporations and bodies of this kind are only entitled to charge present expenditure upon future ratepayers so far as they get borrowing powers through the machinery of various statutes. The effect of a borrowing power, of course, is to enable them to charge upon future ratepayers instalments or obligations arising out of their present expenditure, and the borrowing power is granted upon the supposition that the capital expenditure will benefit the future ratepayers." I can see no ground for holding the overdrafts in the present case to be lawful, still less for allowing the treasurer to credit himself at the expense of the borough funds with 4½ per cent. interest thereon with quarterly rests.

The next objection is that the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, had provided the remedy—namely, by certiorari, or there could be an appeal against the rate. This is really disposed of by the judgment in Attorney-General v. Aspinall, but the very point has been recently dealt with in the House of Lords in Tynemouth Corporation v. Attorney-General, [1899] A. C. 293, where Lord Morris says at p. 305: "It is said, however, that there is a special mode of testing the validity of all orders of the council by the provisions of section 141, sub-section 2, enabling any order to be removed into the Queen's Bench Division by certiorari, and that consequently this is the only mode of interfering with or controverting any order of the council for a payment, however illegal. I cannot adopt that view. While the Queen's Bench Division is given full authority over every order of the council, it is not enacted, or suggested in the enactment, that that is to be the sole remedy, nor is there anything to deprive the Attorney-General, at the relation of a party interested, of the power of obtaining by injunction an order to restrain the payment of money being made under an order of the council, for which order there was no legal warrant." The defendant's next contention is that the accounts have been audited under the same Act, and that the plaintiff cannot question such audit. My attention has not been called to any section making such audit finally binding and conclusive on the borough and the burgesses thereof, and it would be very unfortunate if there were any such, for the audit provided by the Municipal Corporations Act is quite ineffective. Under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 247, the Legislature provided a system of audit which gives auditors extensive powers, including powers to surcharge, but section 246 exempts urban authorities who are the council of a borough from this liability, and the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 27, merely provides that the auditors shall audit the accounts, without more. They have no power to surcharge, and even if they ought, as Lord Russell says in Thomas v. Devonport Corporation, [1900] 1 Q. B. 16, to make public any illegal payments by report to the council and the burgesses, this is a duty of imperfect obligation; there is nothing to compel them to do so, and very little to induce them, and so far as I know they have not done anything of the sort in the present case. It is difficult to understand why the Legislature in 1882 should have authorized a system of auditing which is quite illusory when they had seven years before created an efficient method. I certainly see no reason for holding that such an audit as has been put in evidence in the present case, which does not even state that the books and vouchers are correct, but merely that "there is a total overdraft of £4,510 3s. 11d. on the 31st of March, 1904," is a bar to proceedings against the treasurer to disallow some of the items which go to make up that overdraft. The defendant suggested that he might retain, the items objected to, by way of remuneration, but no evidence has been given to show that the council have ever voted him any remuneration, and the court is not asked to make any order for payment, but merely to declare that certain items charged as interest on overdrafts are wrong. There is a subsidiary point that arises on the harbour account. It is said that the overdraft has been recognized by the provisional order of 1902, and I will assume that this is so. But the order merely directs a larger rate than had been formerly lawful to be raised for the purpose of discharging the overdraft. It made no provision for the payment of interest on it. Indeed, the council failed to obtain permission of the Local Government Board to borrow the money which would have enabled them to pay interest, and this provisional order is the best permission that they could obtain instead of it. It is plain that there is nothing in this order to justify the defendant in charging interest on the deficit. It is fair to the defendant to say that no imputation of personal misconduct is made against him; the litigation and the preliminary correspondence have been conducted on courteous and even friendly terms with a view to ascertaining legal rights.

I propose to make a declaration that the defendant is not entitled to credit himself or to debit any of the borough funds with interest on any of the overdrafts appearing in the accounts heretofore put in by him as treasurer since his appointment. If the defendant will state by his counsel at the bar that he will not make any similar charges in future, I will accept his statement in lieu of granting an injunction, and give liberty to apply instead. Although by his letters before action he has, in my opinion, threatened and intended to continue to do so in such a way as to justify an injunction, I see no reason to suppose that he will not abide by the decision of the court now it has been decided, and there would be a practical inconvenience in framing an injunction, because some restriction of the generality of the words in the declaration would be necessary in providing for the future. All overdrafts are in effect borrowings (Cunliffe v. Blackburn Benefit Building Society, 33 W. R. 309, 9 App. Cas. 857); but if the borrowers obtain further powers of borrowing in the future they may be in a position to obtain overdrafts within the limits of those powers for daily necessities as pointed out by Channell, J., in Smith v. Southampton Corporation, and this would have to be provided for by way of exception from the injunction. The defendant must pay the costs of the action. I suppose the defendant is willing to say he will abide by the declaration?

R. C. Glen.—I have no doubt the defendant will give the required undertaking, but he is at present in the country. Your lordship will probably grant time for us to communicate with him.

FARWELL, J.—Yes. I thought he would probably think it less offensive, perhaps, than having an injunction. I am quite willing to accept his undertaking.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors, Smith, Rendell, & Dods, for Lort Stokes, Tenby; Baker & Co.

Chan. Div. } April 4, 5, 6, 11.
Joyce, J. }

BROOKES v. HANSEN. (a.)

Company — Prospectus — Non-disclosure — Misleading statements — Sub-purchaser — Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 10, sub-section 1 (f).

A company is not a sub-purchaser within the meaning of section 10, sub-section 1 (f), of the Companies Act, 1900, unless it has to pay purchase-money to someone other than its own vendor, and the sub-section does not require a company to state in its prospectus the amount of any consideration paid, or to be paid, by anyone other than the company.

Action.

This was an action by Henry Brookes, a shareholder in the South African Superaeration (Limited) against Viggo Hansen and the Right Honourable the Earl of Kintore, directors of the said company.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

claiming damages for loss sustained by him by reason of certain alleged untrue and misleading statements contained in the prospectus of the company and the suppression of material facts therefrom.

The company was incorporated on the 1st of June, 1901, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, with a nominal share capital of £125,000, divided into 125,000 shares of £1 each.

The prospectus of the company was issued on the 1st of June, 1901, inviting persons to subscribe for shares in the capital of the company. This prospectus stated, inter alia, that the company was formed to work and develop the superaeration system of dispensing aerated waters from bulk in Cape Colony, Natal, Orange River Colony, Transvaal, and Rhodesia, and to acquire the benefit of the applications already made for letters patent for those colonies in relation thereto, and the exclusive rights to the letters patent when granted. The prospectus also stated that these patent rights had been acquired by the company from the African Patent Rights (Limited) for a sum of £58,500 under a contract dated the 1st of June, 1901. The prospectus further mentioned a contract dated the 11th of May, 1901. This contract was in fact an agreement for the sale of these patent rights by a Mr. Wheeler to the African Patent Rights (Limited) for a sum of £15,000; the purchase-money payable under this contract was borrowed by the African Patent Rights (Limited) and was only paid to Wheeler on the 31st of May, 1901, the day before the incorporation of the company and the issue of the prospectus. None of these facts were mentioned in the prospectus. The plaintiff received a copy of the prospectus, and applied for and was allotted eighty shares in the company. These shares turned out to be worthless, and the plaintiff accordingly commenced this action. The main question to be decided was whether there had been a sufficient compliance with the requirements of section 10, sub-section 1 (f), of the Companies Act, 1900, which provides that every prospectus issued by or on behalf of a company must state "the names and addresses of the vendors of any property purchased or acquired by the company, or proposed so to be purchased or acquired, which is to be paid for wholly or partly out of the proceeds of the issue offered for subscription by the prospectus, or the purchase or acquisition of which has not been completed at the date of publication of the prospectus, and the amount payable in cash, shares, or debentures to the vendor, and where there is more than one separate vendor, or the company is a sub-purchaser, the amount so payable to each vendor."

Younger, K.C., and Ricardo, for the plaintiff.—As the money necessary to complete the contract of the 11th of May, 1901, was borrowed by the vendors, Wheeler was really paid out of the proceeds of the issue, and the company is a sub-purchaser within the meaning of the sub-section. In order, therefore, to comply with the requirements of the sub-section, the prospectus should have disclosed the amount payable to Wheeler under the contract of the 11th of May. This the prospectus failed to do. Where there is a noncompliance with the statute, as in this case, a shareholder has a right of action: Finance and Issue (Limited) v. Canadian Produce Corporation (Limited), 53 W. R. 170, [1905] 1 Ch. 37.

Hughes, K.C., and Holmes, for the defendants.—If A. sells to B., and B., after paying A., sells to C., that is not a sub-purchase, but an independent sale and purchase. A man is not a vendor under this sub-section unless some part of the purchasing company's money is going to him. It was not necessary, therefore, in this case that the prospectus should set out the amount payable to Wheeler under the contract of the 11th of May in order to comply with the requirements of the sub-section. But even if this were not so, the plaintiff must prove that when he applied for these shares his mind was affected by the nondisclosure of the terms of this contract: Macleay v. Tait, ante, p. 365, [1906] A. C. 24.

JOYCE, J., in giving a considered judgment, said: The principal ground on which the plaintiff based his action was the nondisclosure in the company's prospectus of the price paid to their vendor by the African Patents Rights (Limited), who were the vendors to the company. This depended upon the true construction of section 10, sub-section 1 (f), of the Companies Act, 1900. Now, the prospectus contained a sufficient statement of the name and address of the vendors to the company and of the full amount payable to such vendors, no consideration being payable or paid by the company to anyone else on account of or in connection with the purchase. But the property sold had been purchased by the vendors not long previously from someone else, and the purchase-money payable to him had in fact been discharged only the day before the issue of the prospectus, when completion of this prior purchase took place pursuant to the terms of the contract between the parties, and such contract was in truth completed to all intents and purposes so far as was possible, having regard to the nature of the property, being the benefit of applications for patents in South Africa not then actually granted. When a company was the purchaser of property which at law as well as in equity belonged to the vendor, the sub-section required the publication of the name and address of the vendor and the amount of the consideration. There was no suggestion of any obligation to disclose the amount of the purchase-money, however small, paid by the vendor upon his acquisition, however recent. A company was not a sub-purchaser for the purposes of this sub-section unless it had to pay purchase-money to someone other than its own vendor—e.g., the vendor or person from whom such immediate vendor purchased. The sub-section did not require a statement in a company's prospectus of the amount of any consideration, cash, shares, or debentures paid or to be paid by anyone other than the company. Upon the facts and documents in the present case it did not appear that this sub-section required any statement to be made of the amount of purchase-money actually paid and discharged by the company's vendors before the issue of the prospectus to the person or persons from whom the company's vendors had bought the property, and the fact that the company's vendors borrowed the money for the purpose of making such payment was immaterial. The company was not a sub-purchaser within the sub-section. Moreover, all the consideration payable by it was disclosed. There had been no failure in this case to comply with the provisions of this sub-section. The action therefore failed, and must be dismissed with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Joseph Davis.

Solicitors for the defendants, Ingle, Holmes, Sons, & Pott.

Chan. Div. Warrington, J. March 31; April 3.

In re EARL OF EGMONT'S SETTLED ESTATES. LEFROY v. EARL OF EGMONT. (a.)

Settled land—Scheme for improvements—Approval of trustees—Discretion of trustees—Power of tenant for life—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 25, 26.

A settlement of real estate expressly added certain works or purposes of improvements to those mentioned in section 25 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, for which capital money might be used, and expressly authorized capital money to be raised for improvements as well as for the other purposes mentioned in section 18. The trustees having already approved of schemes submitted to them by the tenant for life under section 26, which had involved outlay of money, and would involve in the future further outlay, and having been asked by the tenant for life to approve of a further scheme, applied by summons to the court for directions whether, before deciding to approve or withhold their approval from such schemes, they might properly have regard to (a) the number of previous schemes and the amount of capital already expended or liable to be called for thereunder; (b) the general connection between the improvements mentioned in the scheme proposed for their approval with improvements contained in schemes already sanctioned, or the general policy which is being pursued by the tenant for life in improving the property; (c) the proportion between the probable cost of the improvements mentioned in the proposed scheme and the probable increased annual value of the estate; (d) the amount of capital moneys in their hands and the relation between such amount and the value of the estate.

Held, that the general policy of the improvement was a matter for the tenant for life and not for the trustees to decide on; and that, there being no difficulty in obtaining capital money, having regard to the power in the settlement, the trustees might properly approve of any scheme where they were satisfied (1) that the improvement was within section 25, and (2) that the tenant for life was acting bonâ fide; and that they were not bound to take into consideration the various matters mentioned in the summons.

Originating summons.

This was a summons by the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of a settlement of the 15th of August, 1889, of the estates of the Earl of Egmont for the directions of the court as to the circumstances which they should take into account in considering schemes for improvement of the estates submitted to them by the tenant for life for their approval.

By the limitations declared by the settlement and in the events which had happened certain lands and hereditaments stood limited by way of legal limitations to the use of the Earl of Egmont during his life or until he should become a bankrupt or do any act depriving himself of his right to receive the rents and profits, and after his death to the use of his brother C. J. Perceval as tenant for life, and after his death to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainders over.

And by the said indenture of settlement it was agreed and declared (among other things) that the trustees for the time being were to be the trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and any amending Acts, and for the purpose mentioned in section 42 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and "Fourthly, for the like purpose"—the purposes of the Settled Land Act—"section 25 of the Act last aforesaid"—the Settled Land Act, 1882—"shall be read and take effect as if in addition to the works or purposes of improvements therein enumerated there were inserted therein the words 'rebuilding, reparation, or permanent improvement, or additions of or to building of any description, whether used or occupied for residential, farm, or other purposes'"; and, "Fifthly, for the like purpose, section 18 of the Act last aforesaid shall be read and acted upon as if the words 'or for improvements' were inserted in that section immediately after the word 'partition' therein."

The defendant, Lord Egmont, succeeded to the title and to the estates in 1897.

The estates subject to the settlement at the time of the summons comprised (among other property) a mansion-house, park, and land known as the Cowdray Park Estate, consisting of some 16,000 acres, and capital moneys liable to be invested in land of more than £250,000 in amount.

The earl had submitted various schemes for the improvement of the estate to the trustees which they had approved of, and which had been partly carried out, and in connection with which further sums, amounting to some £11,000, might become payable, and had to be provided for. He had again, shortly before the summons, submitted a further scheme for additional works of reparation and improvement which it was estimated would involve an outlay of between £4,000 and £5,000. And the trustees were informed by Lord Egmont's advisers that schemes of the same kind in reference to the Cowdray Park Estate would from time to time be submitted to them for their approval by Lord Egmont.

There was uncertainity as to who were the persons entitled in remainder after the present earl, and the residence of the probable claimants was believed to be abroad, but was unknown, and the trustees were unable to communicate with them.

Under these circumstances the trustees desired to have the directions of the court for their present and future guidance, and they took out this summons against the tenant for life asking whether, upon the true construction of the settlement and the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, before deciding to approve or withhold their approval from schemes for the execution of improvements falling within the powers of the Settled Land Acts as extended by the settlement, they might properly have regard to all or any of the following matters: (a) The number of previous schemes and the amount of capital already expended or liable to be called for thereunder; (b) the general connection between the improvements mentioned in the scheme proposed for their approval with improvements contained in schemes already sanctioned or the general policy which is being pursued by the tenant for life in improving the property; (c) the proportion between the probable cost of the improvements mentioned in the proposed scheme and the probable increased annual value of the estate; and (d) the amount of capital moneys in their hands, and the relation between such amount and the value of the estate.

Rowden, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the trustees.—The function of the trustees is not merely to consider whether the improvement is one authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 25 and 26. They have a further discretion to approve or not of the scheme put forward by the tenant for life. This is shown by the observations of Byrne, J., in In re Duke of Norfolk's Parliamentary Estates, 48 W. R., p. 329, [1900] 1 Ch., p. 467, cited with approval by Farwell, J., in In re Keck's Settled Estates, 52 W. R., p. 363, [1904] 2 Ch., p. 27. It seems clear that the approval of the trustees which is required by section 26 means something more than seeing whether the proposal of the tenant for life is within the terms of the Act. It is intended to afford protection to the remaindermen: see observations of Lindley, L.J., in In re Millard's Settled Estates, 41 W. R. 577, [1893] 3 Ch., p. 120. This implies a discretion in the trustees. And Chitty, J., in Clarke v. Thornton, 35 W. R., p. 603, 35 Ch. D., p. 313, speaks of the exercise of the approval of the trustees as a "discretionary trust."

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also referred to In re Marquis of Bristol's Settled Estates, 42 W. R. 46, [1893] 3 Ch. 161, and In re Calverley's Settled Estates, 52 W. R. 206, [1904] 1 Ch. 159.

H. Terrell, K C., and A. F. Petersen, for the Earl of Egmont.—It is for the tenant for life to determine the general policy to be pursued in improving the estate. All the trustees have to do is to decide whether the improvement proposed comes within sections 25 and 26. All the cases cited are consistent with this view. It is clear that the surveyor acting under section 26 (2) (ii.) could not, if satisfied with the execution of the improvement, have refused his certificate upon the ground that the whole improvement was mistaken; and the trustees are allowed to act upon his certificate. The tenant for life has a wide discretion, and should not only consider the estate, but the welfare of the people living on it: per Bowen, L.J., in In re Marquis of Ailesbury's Settled Estates, 40 W. R., p. 248, [1892] 1 Ch., p. 542.

WARRINGTON, J.—The question I have to decide is, shortly, whether or not the trustees of the settlement may properly inquire under section 26 of the Act into the entire policy pursued by the tenant for life with reference to the improvement of the settled estates. This question has never arisen directly in the courts, although the Settled Land Act has been in operation more than twenty-three years. There are to be found only certain remarks made by judges in certain decided cases on other questions arising under the Act which throw some light on what, without having had the matter argued before them, these judges thought was the proper construction of this section. The settlement in this case contains a provision which adds to the works or purposes of improvements enumerated in section 25 of the Act, an item of very wide application, having regard to the word "reparation," which has been held, as I understand, by Byrne, J., to authorize the tenant for life to treat as an improvement any repairs which are not simply decorative repairs. And by the addition made to section 18 by the settlement the tenant for life can get improvements executed, although there may be no capital moneys in the hands of the trustees, by determining under that section that moneys shall be raised by mortgage of the estate. Next, the definition of land must be considered. Land which is the subject of the settlement is by section 2 (3) called "settled land"; and when it is referred to in relation to the settlement it is called "the settled land," by which are meant quite separate things. If land is spoken of without reference to the settlement itself it is simply called "settled land." By section 21 capital money arising under the Act shall be invested or applied (amongst other modes), (iii.) in payment for any improvement authorized by the Act. By section 22, sub-section 1, the capital money in order to its being invested or applied as aforesaid shall be paid either to the trustees of the settlement or into court at the option of the tenant for life; and by sub-section 2, the investment or other application by the trustees shall be made according to the direction of the tenant for life. It is therefore the tenant for life who directs not only the investment, but the dealing with the funds, which is described in section 21 as their "application," in payment for any improvement. Section 25 defines improvements authorized by the Act as the making or execution on or in connection with, and for the benefit—not of "the settled land," but of "settled land"—that is, according to the definition in section 2 (3), for the benefit of land the subject of the settlement. The controversy in this case turns on section 26. [His lordship read sub-section 1 of that section.] Therefore the direction of the tenant for life as to the application of capital money given under section 22 would be of no avail, and would have no effect upon the trustees if the application which he was directing was in payment for something which was not an improvement authorized by the Act. The tenant for life has therefore to satisfy the trustees that what he is proposing is such an improvement. Now, the trustees have not to approve the improvement itself, but a scheme for the execution of the improvement. It is, therefore, for the tenant for life to select and decide on what he wishes to have done, and for the trustees to approve the mode in which that shall be carried into effect. Then by sub-section 2, where capital money is in the hands of trustees after a scheme—that is, a scheme for the execution of the works—is approved by them, they may apply that money in payment of any work or operation comprised in the improvement, on—taking it shortly—(i.) a certificate of the land commissioners certifying that the work has been executed, and that a particular sum ought to be paid in consideration thereof; or on (ii.) a like certificate of a competent engineer or able practical surveyor. These are merely modes of ascertaining that the scheme has been carried out, and that the money is properly payable by the trustees. There is a third alternative—namely, (iii.) on order of the court directing or authorizing the trustees to apply a specified portion of the purchase-money. Under that third sub-clause it was held in In re Keck's Settlement that the court had not to perform the function of an engineer or surveyor, and merely see whether the work had been carried out, but had to repeat over again what has, and in that case had, to be done by the trustees—namely, to consider the scheme. A good deal of controversy has turned upon the remarks made by Farwell, J., in that case in reference to what the court will pay attention to in considering a scheme. Now, it is to be observed that by sub-section 3 of section 26 powers are given to the court in dealing with the scheme—that is, the scheme for the execution of the improvement—of either allowing or disallowing expenditure much wider than those given to the trustees. Therefore, in my view, and apart from authority, having regard to section 26 alone, and comparing it with the other sections forming the fasciculus of sections relating to improvements, the duty of trustees is confined to seeing that the improvement proposed is really an improvement authorized by the Act—that is to say, that it is for the benefit of some land comprised in the settlement; and further, to seeing that the scheme for the execution of that improvement is a proper scheme for carrying out that improvement; and, in this connection, they would incidentally be justified in satisfying themselves that in preparing and submitting the scheme for their approval the tenant for life was acting under competent skilled advice in reference to the execution of the improvement. One has also in every case where the proposal of a tenant for life is being considered to consider section 53. The trustees therefore must consider whether or not what the tenant for life is proposing is outside his position as a tenant for life acting with regard to the interests of all parties, and deemed to be in the position of a trustee for them. My view, therefore, is—putting it concisely—that the general policy of the tenant for life as to the improvements he may propose is not a matter with which the trustees are concerned. Now, looking at the matters mentioned in the summons on the above assumption, the matters mentioned as (a), cannot be material in this case where the tenant for life has unlimited power to provide money for improvements. If a scheme were submitted to the trustees for which there were no capital moneys in hand, the questions would arise which were determined in In re Millard's Settled Estates and In re Duke of Norfolk's Parliamentary Estates. But except in such a case it seems to me that the trustees have nothing to do with the amount of money which has been expended or the amount of money which they have in their hands. Again, the matter mentioned in (b), is not one which the trustees have to consider, but is a matter for the tenant for life, who is intended by the Act to have the control of the management of the settled estate. As regards the matter (c), it is possible that in some modified form it might be taken into account in considering whether the scheme is or is not for the benefit of settled land. But beyond that I do not think it is the duty of the trustees to consider it. As regards matter (d), in this case, at all events, I do not think that the trustees should take it into account because of the powers of raising money given to the tenant for life.

Next, is there anything in any of the authorities which have been cited which prevents me coming to the conclusion I have expressed on the construction of the Act itself? The two earlier authorities of In re Millard's Settled Estate and In re Marquis of Bristol's Settled Estate really do not help at all. In re Keck's Settled Estate throws most light on the case. It was there decided that where an application is made under section 26 for an order directing the trustees to apply capital money in payment for the improvements, the court is entitled and bound to consider if such expenditure is proper for the improvement. The scheme there had been approved by the trustees and the work had been done. Farwell, J., in that case read a passage from the judgment of Byrne, J., in In re Duke of Norfolk's Parliamentary Estates, as follows: "The scheme of the Act is to give wide powers to the tenant for life and to give powers of consent to trustees upon the footing that they will act fairly in the exercise of their respective powers, and that neither trustees nor the court will sanction schemes which are improvident or which will unduly fetter any discretion which ought to be exercised at a later date, and there is always the safeguard that tenants for life joining in improvident schemes, or not acting with a due regard to the interest of the remainderman, are running the risk of the possible establishment of a personal liability against themselves." That, of course, is a liability under section 53. It has been said on behalf of the trustees that the expressions "an improvident scheme," "consent of the trustees being required," "the tenant for life is putting forward improvements which, though honest, are so utterly wrongheaded that they ought not to be sanctioned," used by Farwell, J., and Byrne, J., in those cases, show that these learned judges thought that the trustees had a discretion to exercise much wider than that which I have come to the conclusion is vested in them. But when these expressions are considered with reference to the points argued in those cases they cannot be carried so far as suggested, and they are satisfied if the discretion of the trustees is confined, as I propose to confine it—namely, to considering, first, whether the scheme is for the benefit of the settled land; secondly, whether the scheme for the execution of the improvements is a proper scheme; and thirdly, whether in proposing the scheme the tenant for life is acting within the restrictions imposed upon him by section 53. I propose therefore to make the following order: "Declare that the trustees may properly approve any scheme where they are satisfied (1) That the improvement is within the 25th section of the Act as enlarged by the settlement; and (2) that the tenant for life is acting bonâ fide; and on obtaining advice as to the improvement proposed, the amount to be expended thereon, and the method of execution thereof; and that they are not bound to take into consideration the various matters mentioned in the summons."

Solicitors, Littledale & Lefroy; Nash, Field, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) — Dec. 19.

LAIRD (Appellant) v. DOBELL AND ANOTHER (Respondents). (a.)

Sale of goods—Feeding stuff—Sale—Causing or permitting invoice to be given false in material particular—Guilty knowledge—Fertilizers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 56), s. 3, sub-section 1 (b).

It is not necessary that there should be guilty knowledge in order to constitute an offence under section 3, sub-section 1 (b), of the Fertilizers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1893.

Korten v. West Sussex County Council, 72 L. J. K. B. 515, 51 W. R. Dig. 173, followed.

Case stated by justices.

An information was preferred by the appellant against the respondents, charging them with having sold to one Davies, as food for cattle, five tons of finest Galveston decorticated cotton seed cake meal, being an article manufactured in the United Kingdom or imported from abroad, and with having unlawfully caused or permitted an invoice or description of the same to be given to the purchaser which was false in a material particular to the prejudice of the purchaser, in that it described the article as containing 58 per cent. of oil and albuminoids, whereas in truth and in fact the said articles only contained 51 per cent. of oil and albuminoids, and also unlawfully did abet, counsel, or procure the commission of the said offence contrary to section 3, sub-section 1 (b), of the Fertilizers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1893.

At the hearing of the information it was proved that in answer to a letter from Davies the respondents wrote to him quoting a price for the meal, "guaranteed 58 per cent. oil and albuminoids."

The appellant, who was chief inspector of the Weights and Measures Department of the Cheshire County Council, took an average sample of the meal supplied to Davies by the respondents, and the analysis showed that it contained only 51 per cent. of oil and albuminoids.

One of the respondents gave evidence before the justices, and stated that the meal formed part of a consignment of 200 tons, and that when it arrived samples were taken under the direction of the respondents and forwarded to their analyst for analysis, and that they received from him a certificate certifying that the samples contained over 60 per cent. of oil and albuminoids. The witness had invoiced and sold at 58 per cent. believing it to be a true statement, and that he had no idea of making by a false description an additional profit which would be a mere trifle. He further deposed that he relied entirely upon the analysis and had sold the meal to Davies upon such analysis.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The analyst employed by the respondents was called, and deposed that the samples analyzed by him contained 60·27 per cent of oil and albuminoids.

The justices were of opinion that the alleged offence had not been proved, as they considered that no evidence had been given that the respondents knowingly supplied meal not of the quality demanded, or were aware that the meal was not of the quality guaranteed, and that the remedy was a civil action by the purchaser in a county court, and they accordingly dismissed the information and summons.

The question for the court was whether the justices came to a correct decision in point of law.

Bankes, K.C., and Trevor Lloyd, for the appellant.

W. F. Taylor, K.C., and F. E. Smith, for the respondents.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is undoubtedly a hard case, because the respondents before sending out the description of the goods had the stuff analyzed, and the statement made by them was based on the result of that analysis. But these facts do not in law constitute a defence to the charge under section 3, sub-section 1 (b), of the Fertilizers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1893, which enacts that "if any person who sells any article for use as a fertilizer of the soil or as a food for cattle commits any of the following offences—namely: . . . (b) causes or permits any invoice or description of the article sold by him to be false in any material particular to the prejudice of the purchaser . . . he shall without prejudice to any civil liability be liable on summary conviction" to a penalty. In Korten v. West Sussex County Council, 72 L. J. K. B. 515, 51 W. R. Dig. 173, Wills, J., and myself (Channell, J. dissentiente) held that a person who causes or permits the invoice or description of the article sold to be false in any material particular—although he may have no personal knowledge of the falsity, is nevertheless guilty of an offence under that section. In my opinion the view we then expressed is correct, and it certainly is supported by sub-section 3 of section 3, which enables a person convicted under sub-section 1 to recover damages from his vendor and to include in the damages the amount of the fine and the costs. Moreover, if it be necessary to prove guilty knowledge, I can see no distinction between the words "causes" and "permit" in sub-section 1 (b). I think the object with which those words were used was to protect the purchaser where the description of the article sold was false in fact, though not false to the knowledge of the vendor.

If that is the right construction of the section, then it makes no difference in law that the respondents before giving the description of the article sold had caused it to be analyzed. It is not disputed that the stuff sold to Davies was not in accordance with the description, and the case must therefore go back to the justices to convict.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

RIDLEY, J.—I am not prepared to differ, but I am not sure how I should have decided this case but for the previous decision.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Busk, Mellor, & Norris, for Cooke, Winsford.

Solicitors for the respondents, North, Kirk, & Co., Liverpool.

K. B. Div. (Channell, J.) — Dec. 15.

YOUNG v. KINGSTON-ON-THAMES, SURBITON, AND NEW MALDEN JOINT BURIALS COMMITTEE. (a.)

Burial-ground—Erection of monument—Right of incumbent to fees in respect of—Burial Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 15), s. 3, sub-section 4 (1).

By the Burials Act, 1900, s. 3, sub-section 4, it is enacted that "no fee shall be payable to any incumbent in respect of any right of exclusive burial, or the erection of a monument, or any other matter whatsoever, in any burial-ground maintained by a burial authority except for services rendered him," but a proviso to the section preserved the rights of incumbents in "burial-grounds . . . laid out and used before the passing of this Act."

Held, that the above proviso did not apply to additional land which had been purchased by the local authority for the purpose of being added to the existing burial-ground, and which had been, previous to the passing of the Act, laid out as a burial-ground, but in which no burials had in fact taken place till subsequent to the passing of the Act, and that the incumbent was not therefore entitled to the fees claimed by him in respect of the erection of monuments on the additional land.

Action before Channell, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff's claim was for a declaration that as vicar of the parish of All Saints, Kingston-on-Thames, he was entitled in respect of the erection of monuments in any part of the defendants' burial-ground to such fees as were payable to him as such vicar in respect of the erection of monuments in the said burial-ground before the passing of the Burial Act, 1900, and that it was the duty of the defendants to collect such fees and pay them to the plaintiff.

The following statement of facts had been agreed upon by the parties:

"The plaintiff is the vicar of All Saints', Kingston-upon-Thames He was instituted and inducted into the vicarage in 1877.

"At the time of the formation of the burial board hereinafter mentioned the ecclesiastical parish of All Saints formed part of the then civil parish of Kingston-on-Thames, the residue of the area of such civil parish being then divided into several ecclesiastical parishes which had at one time been included in the ecclesiastical parish of All Saints, Kingston-on-Thames, but which had been separated therefrom under the provisions of the Church Building Acts and New Parishes Act, and which from the time of such separations respectively had been separate and distinct ecclesiastical parishes.

"There was at the time of the formation of the board a consecrated churchyard surrounding the parish church of All Saints, and a detached consecrated graveyard known as the 'New Burial ground,' which was provided as an extension of the churchyard. The vicar of All Saints was entitled to receive, and did receive before the formation of the board, certain sums or fees in respect of burials and in respect of the erection of monuments, gravestones, and tablets in the churchyard and extension, and also in respect of rights of burial in vaults in the churchyard and extension.

"In 1854 a burial board was formed for the old civil parish of Kingston-on-Thames under the provisions of the Burial Acts then in force, and a site of about seventeen acres of ground was purchased by the board for the purpose of providing a burial-ground for the parish.

"A portion of this site was laid out and enclosed by walls and railings and was used for burials. This portion was divided into consecrated and unconsecrated parts in the manner sanctioned by the Home Secretary.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"Shortly after this burial-ground was acquired and appropriated for burials the churchyard of All Saints and the extension were closed for burials by Order in Council.

"Under the provisions of section 33 of the Burial Act, 1852, as extended by the Burial Act, 1853, the vicar of All Saints for the time being became entitled to receive certain fees or sums of money for burials, and in respect of monuments, gravestones, and tablets erected in the consecrated part of the burial-ground provided by the burial board, and in respect of vaults and rights of burial in the consecrated part, in lieu of the fees or sums which he would have been entitled to on the grant of the like rights in the churchyard and extension. Between 1854 and 1893 additional portions of the seventeen acres acquired by the burial board were from time to time enclosed and added to the consecrated and unconsecrated parts of the burial-ground in the manner sanctioned by the Home Secretary until the whole area of seventeen acres was included in the burial-ground. The whole of the area of the seventeen acres was used or available for burials; the area was bounded on the south by a stream, on the east and west by brick walls erected by the burial board, and on the north by a road. No distinction was ever made between the various consecrated parts of the said seventeen acres as regards the right of the vicar of All Saints to receive the before-mentioned fees or sums, and as regards the receipt thereof by the burial board and the payment over thereof to him. In 1893 the board purchased eight acres of land adjoining their burial-ground of seventeen acres and put up a notice board stating thereon that the ground had been acquired for, and was intended to be used for, burial purposes. These eight acres adjoined the seventeen acres on the west side, but were separated from them by the western wall of the burial ground. Under the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1894, the old civil parish of Kingston-on-Thames was divided into and became four civil parishes—namely, Kingston-on-Thames, Surbiton, New Malden, and Coombe—and all the property, powers, duties, and liabilities of the burial board were transferred to the defendants, and the two areas consisting of seventeen acres and eight acres respectively became by operation of law vested in the defendants.

"In 1899 the wall forming the western boundary of the seventeen acres was lowered by the defendants to within one foot of the ground on the side of the seventeen acres, which was higher than the eight acres by about three feet, and communication between the old and new portions of the cemetery was effected by means of a flight of steps at one point for pedestrians, and a slope for a carriage-way at another point, and the defendants laid out and adapted the eight acres for burial purposes, so that the area of eight acres might be used for burials when actually required. No portion of the eight acres was required or used for burials until November, 1902.

The additional area of eight acres was divided into consecrated and unconsecrated parts in manner sanctioned by the Home Secretary. Such sanction was given on the 13th of June, 1900. The consecrated part was consecrated on the 13th of October, 1900. The first burial in the area comprised in the eight acres in November, 1902, was in the consecrated portion.

"The defendants from the time of the transfer to them of the property, powers, duties, and liabilities of the burial board up to the time of the passing of the Burial Act, 1900, have paid over to the vicar of All Saints for the time being the before-mentioned fees or sums in respect af the consecrated portions of the area of seventeen acres. They also admit the right of the plaintiff as such vicar to continue to receive the like fees or sums since the passing of the Burial Act, 1900, in respect of monuments and other matters arising in the consecrated part of the seventeen acres, and to have such fees or sums collected by the defendants and paid over to him, and the defendants have continued to collect and to pay over such fees or sums to the plaintiff since the passing of that Act. But having regard to the provisions of section 3, sub-section 4, of that Act they have retained in hand the before-mentioned fees for the erection of monuments, gravestones, and tablets pending a judicial decision as to whether or not such fees are by law payable to the plaintiff."

By the Burial Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 15), s. 3, sub-section 4, "Subject to the provisions of this section no fee shall be payable to any incumbent of a parish in respect of any right of exclusive burial, or the erection of a monument, or any other matter whatsoever, in any burial-ground maintained by a burial authority, except for services rendered by him, and this enactment shall apply to any such fee which is by law or custom payable to the churchwarden of any parish or to trustees or other persons for any parochial purpose, or for the discharge of any debt or liability in like manner as it applies to fees payable to an incumbent. Provided as follows: (1) Where at the passing of this Act fees other than for services rendered are payable in respect of any matter arising in any burial-ground attached to or used for the purposes of a parish, and laid out or used before the passing of this Act, the like fees shall continue to be paid during the incumbency of the person who, at the passing of this Act, is the incumbent of the parish, or during a period of fifteen years, whichever is longer, or if the fees are not paid to the incumbent, or to any person claiming through or under him, then during the said period of fifteen years, and shall be applicable to the like purposes as heretofore, and the burial authority shall collect and pay these fees in like manner as the fees to be paid for services rendered."

A. B. Kempe, for the plaintiff.—The eight acres were an addition to the burial-ground and they form part of that ground. The eight acres together with the seventeen acres form one burial-ground which was laid out and used before the Act of 1900, and it therefore falls within the operation of the proviso to section 3, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1900, and the fact that no burial had actually taken place within the eight acres makes no difference.

He cited In re Ponsford and Newport District School Board, [1894] 1 Ch. 454.

Lewis Thomas, for the defendants.—The plaintiff could not have got fees in respect of the eight acres previous to 1900 because it had not then been used as a burial-ground. The eight acres and the seventeen acres in fact constitute two separate burial-grounds.

Kempe replied.

CHANNELL, J.—The question raised by this case is one of some difficulty, because I suppose that facts exactly like these could not have been contemplated when the Act was drafted. The plaintiff's claim is in form for a declaration as to his rights to fees in respect of the erection of monuments in any part of the defendants' burial-ground, but what I have really to consider is whether the plaintiff would be entitled to a fee in respect of a monument erected in the consecrated portion of the eight acres of ground. It is agreed that unless the case comes within the first proviso to section 3, sub-section 4, of the Burial Act, 1900, the plaintiff cannot succeed. The question is not whether the proviso gives the plaintiff the right to the fees, but whether it preserves it to him, for the Act obviously intended to preserve for a limited time the rights of incumbents, and a test is laid down as to the state of things which must have existed previously to the passing of this Act in order that these vested rights may be preserved. Further, the rights intended to be preserved are, as it seems to me, rights which are vested in an incumbent in respect of a particular locality—namely, a burial-ground, formerly called a churchyard—and not in respect of his office as an incumbent. The question which I have to determine is what land it is in respect of which it was intended to preserve these vested rights. The difficult words in the proviso are: "Attached to or used for the purposes of a parish and laid out and used before the passing of this Act." Can I say that a monument erected in the consecrated part of the eight acres is in a burial-ground which was "used before the passing of this Act"? I think there is great difficulty in so holding, because it would follow that whenever within fifteen years after the passing of the Act of 1900, an addition is made to an existing burial-ground the incumbent would be given fees in respect of that addition. I do not think that can have been intended. The words "and used" were introduced, as I think, for the express purpose of limiting the vested rights to rights on land actually used in some substantial sense before the passing of this Act. I think, therefore, that for the purposes of this section the eight acres must be treated as a separate burial-ground from the seventeen acres. The plaintiff had, I think, at the time this Act was passed no vested rights within the meaning of the proviso to sub-section 4.

It is not without considerable doubt that I have come to the conclusion that my judgment must be for the defendants.

Judgment for defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Day & Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Durham, Carter, & Durham.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) — May 3.

STUCKEY AND OTHERS v. HOOKE. (a.)

Factory Acts—Underground bakehouse—Certificate of local authority—Expenses of structural alterations—Apportionment—Landlord and tenant—Covenant to pay outgoings—Right of action—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 22), s. 101, sub-section 8.

Where a local authority refuses to certify, under section 101, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, that an underground bakehouse is suitable to be used as such, unless certain structural alterations are made, by sub-section 8 of that section a court of summary jurisdiction is appointed the sole tribunal to determine whether the owner ought to bear the whole or any part of the expenses of the alterations, and for that purpose to apportion the expenses between the owner and the occupier; and where the owner has made the alterations, he has no right of action against the occupier to recover from him the expenses thereof under a covenant in a lease whereby the occupier has agreed to pay all "outgoings."

Horner v. Franklin, [1905] 1 K. B. 479, 53 W. R. Dig. 41, followed.

Goldstein v. Hollingsworth, [1904] 2 K. B. 578, 53 W. R. Dig. 59, and Morris v. Beal, [1904] 2 K. B. 585, 53 W. R. Dig. 60, distinguished.

Appeal from a judgment of Warrington, J.

By a lease dated the 24th of March, 1886, the plaintiffs' predecessors in title demised a house and premises (now situate in the metropolitan borough of Islington), which were used as a baker's shop with an underground bakehouse, for the term of twenty-one years from the 24th of June, 1888, at the yearly rent of £65; and the lessee covenanted with the lessor that he would "during the said term bear, pay, and discharge the main drainage and sewers rate and all other Parliamentary and parochial rates and taxes, and all burdens, duties, assessments, outgoings, and impositions whatsoever which now or at any time or times during the said term shall be rated, taxed, charged, assessed, or imposed on the said premises hereby demised, or any part thereof, or upon the landlord or tenant in respect thereof, or of the rent hereby reserved (landlord's property tax only excepted); and that he the said lessee shall and will from time to time and at all times during the said term at his own proper costs and charges well and sufficiently repair, uphold, support, sustain, amend, maintain, pave, purge, scour, cleanse, preserve, and keep in good and substantial repair and condition" the demised premises.

The defendant, before the year 1903, became the assignee of the term comprised in the lease, and occupied and used the underground bakehouse as such. In 1903 the Islington Borough Council refused to certify, under section 101, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, that the underground bakehouse was suitable for the purpose of being used as such, unless structural alterations were made. The plaintiffs and the defendant were unable to agree as to the apportionment of the expenses of the structural alterations necessary to obtain the certificate, and the defendant accordingly laid an information before a metropolitan magistrate under section 101, sub-section 8, of the Act, and obtained a summons calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why the cost of the structural alterations should not be borne by them, or in the alternative why the lease should not be determined. The parties appeared before the magistrate, who ordered that the estimated expenses of the agreed structural alterations—namely, £200—should be apportioned as follows: Three-fourths to be paid by the plaintiffs and one-fourth by the defendant. The plaintiffs submitted plans of the proposed alterations to the defendant and demanded from the defendant the £50, and executed the work at a cost of £170 10s. 1d.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover the £170 10s. 1d. from the defendant under the covenant in the lease, and in the alternative £50 as money paid by them for and at the request of the defendant. The defendant admitted that he owed the £50, and paid this amount into court.

Warrington, J., held, upon the authority of Goldstein v. Hollingsworth, [1904] 2 K. B. 578, 53 W. R. Dig. 59, and Morris v. Beal, [1904] 2 K. B. 585, 53 W. R. Dig. 60, that the defendant was liable under the covenant in the lease to pay the whole of the expenses, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, giving credit for the £50 paid into court.

The defendant appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and D. M. Kerly, for the defendant.—The case is governed by the decision of this court in Horner v. Franklin, [1905] 1 K. B. 479, 53 W. R. Dig. 41. There the lessees of a factory covenanted to pay "outgoings" of every description, and the landlord expended money in complying with the requirements of the local authority under section 7, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, providing proper means of escape in case of fire, and it was held that the landlord could not recover the sums so expended from the lessees by action, but that his only remedy was under section 7, sub-section 2, by application to the county court. It was further held that in determining what was just and equitable the county court judge must take into consideration the terms of the tenancy expressed or implied. That sub-section is now reproduced in section 14, sub-sections 2, 3, and 4, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The present case comes within section 101 of the Act of 1901, and sub-section 8 of that section is similar to section 14, sub-section 4, except that a court of summary jurisdiction is the tribunal to determine the question, and not a county court, and there is an express provision that in determining what is just and equitable, regard must be had to the terms of any contract between the parties, and power is given to the court at the request of the occupier to determine the lease. Section 101, sub-section 8, therefore excludes the jurisdiction of any court other than a court of summary jurisdiction, which is appointed the sole statutory tribunal to determine the question. Goldstein v. Hollingsworth, and Morris v. Beal, upon which Warrington, J., relied, are not in point. They are decisions upon cases stated by magistrates, and the question in each case was whether the magistrate was right in making the order which he did. The magistrate clearly had jurisdiction, and the Divisional Court was exercising an appellate jurisdiction. If, however, those cases or the reasoning in them are inconsistent with Horner v. Franklin, they ought not to be followed. [Monk v. Arnold, 50 W. R. 667, [1902] 1 K. B. 761, was also referred to.] Further, there was no obligation on the tenant to incur these expenses, and therefore they were not outgoings "rated, taxed, charged, assessed, or imposed" within the covenant, and the plaintiffs could not recover them from the defendant; and again, that the plaintiffs by appearing before the magistrate and acting upon the order and executing the works and applying to the defendant for the £50, could not now say that the order was wrong or a nullity.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. E. Bankes, K.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the plaintiffs.—There is a great difference between section 14 and section 101 of the Act of 1901. In the former section the expense is placed upon the owner unless he can show that the occupier ought to bear or contribute to it. The owner had to incur the expense or cease using the building as a factory, which he could not do if he had let it to a tenant as a factory. In the latter section the expense is placed upon the occupier unless he can show that the owner ought to bear the whole or any part of it. It was optional to the defendant to continue using the premises as an underground bakehouse, but if he did decide to use them as such he must comply with the requirements of the local authority. The landlord, having executed the necessary works, can recover the expenses thereof from the tenant under his covenant: Foulgar v. Arding, 50 W. R. 417, [1902] 1 K. B. 700. The magistrate having regard to the tenant's covenant, could only make an order that the tenant should bear the whole of the expenses, because if he made an order that the landlord should bear part of the expenses the latter could at once recover the amount so paid from the tenant under the covenant, as was pointed out in Goldstein v. Hollingworth.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal must be allowed. As I understand the judgment of Warrington, J., he decided as he did because he thought that the decisions in Goldstein v. Hollingsworth and Morris v. Beal compelled him to do so. I cannot agree with that. It seems to me to be plain that, so far as the judgment in the former case is concerned, it did not assert that the High Court had, as a court sitting to try causes, any jurisdiction in the matter. It came before the Divisional Court upon a case stated by a magistrate, and the court assumed that the magistrate had jurisdiction in the matter, and the only question was whether he had decided the matter rightly. The court did not send the case back to the magistrate because they were of opinion that, having regard to the covenant by the lessee, the magistrate was right in saying that the lessee should bear the whole of the expenses. That decision is not in any way conclusive of the question now before us. In these circumstances we have to consider whether there is jurisdiction in the High Court to hear and determine the dispute in this case between the parties, or whether the effect of the legislation has not been to make the court of summary jurisdiction, by virtue of section 101, sub-section 8, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, the statutory tribunal by which the questions must be decided. In Horner v. Franklin this court so decided under section 7, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, and I cannot see any reason why that decision in principle does not apply to the present case. It was said in argument that Romer, L.J., in the last passage in his judgment in that case, reserved the question whether the cases of Goldstein v. Hollingsworth and Morris v. Beal were consistent with the case of Horner v. Franklin. I agree; but Romer, L.J., did not mean to leave open any question as to the principle of our decision in Horner v. Franklin. He merely meant to say that he was not sure that those cases were inconsistent with the decision in Horner v. Franklin that the High Court had no jurisdiction in the matter, but that he reserved the right to consider the reasoning upon which those decisions were based. I have looked carefully at both those cases. In Morris v. Beal all the learned judges who were parties to that decision said that they were only following Goldstein v. Hollingsworth, and I need therefore only look at the latter case, and as I have already said there is nothing in the decision in that case which is inconsistent with the decision in Horner v. Franklin. Why, then, does not the decision in Horner v. Franklin apply here? It is said that the section under which it was decided is different from the section applicable to this case. It is no doubt a different section, but in what respects are the two sections different? There is first of all a difference in the party making the application. Under the section applicable to this case the occupier has to make the application; under the other section the owner has to make it. But that difference is not material. There is also a difference in the tribunal to which the application is to be made—in one case a county court and in the other a court of summary jurisdiction; but that again is an immaterial difference. The only other difference is that in section 101, sub-section 8, the words "regard being had to the terms of any contract between the parties" are inserted, whereas they did not occur in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, nor do they occur in the corresponding section (section 14, sub-section 4) of the Act of 1901. But that is exactly what this court said in Horner v. Franklin that the county court judge ought to do, even without express words to that effect in the section, and therefore that difference is not a real one.

That being so, it seems to me that there is no reason why this case is not governed by our decision in Horner v. Franklin. I think it is. That renders it unnecessary to deal with the other two points raised, but as at present advised, if the plaintiffs could have successfully got over the decision in Horner v. Franklin, I think that they would have had some difficulty in meeting those points.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree.

MOULTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only wish to add a few words. Section 101, subsection 8. of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, in my opinion, makes the court of summary jurisdiction the statutory arbitrator to decide how the expense of these structural alterations should be borne. The Act imposes a burden upon those who wish to continue the user of an underground bakehouse, and it was impossible at the time of the passing of the Act to say how that would affect those interested in the bakehouse. The Legislature accordingly adopted the sensible course of appointing an arbitrator to decide how the expenses of any structural alterations should be borne as between the owner and the occupier, and made his decision final. In arriving at his decision the arbitrator has to take into consideration as part, and only as part, of the circumstances of the case the terms of the contract between the parties. The question for the arbitrator is, what is just and equitable under the circumstances of the case, one of those circumstances being the terms of the contract between the parties. I desire also to say that I share the doubt which was expressed in Horner v. Franklin whether expenses of this kind come within the word "outgoings" as used in this covenant.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Gellatly & Son.

Solicitors for the defendant, Young & Sons.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) — May 3.

WAITE v. JENNINGS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Covenant not to assign without lessor's consent—Condition to lessor's consent—Covenant by assignee to pay rent during residue of term—Validity of covenant—Action by lessor against assignee—"Fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine payable for or in respect of such consent"—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 13), s. 3.

A lease contained a covenant by the lessee not to assign the demised premises without the consent of the lessors, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld. The lessee, being desirous to assign, applied to the lessors for the necessary consent. The lessors required as a condition to their consent that the assignee should covenant that he would pay the rent reserved during the remainder of the lease. A licence to assign was accordingly granted by the lessors in the form of an indenture, to which the assignee was a party, and which contained a covenant by the assignee that he would pay the rent reserved by the lease during the residue of the term. In an action by the lessors against the assignee under the covenant to recover rent which accrued due after a subsequent assignment,

Held, that section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, afforded no defence to the action; for, even if the covenant was for the payment of a "fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine," the effect of the section was not to make such a payment illegal, but merely to read into the lease as between the parties to the lease a proviso that no such sum should be payable, and the assignee was not in a position to complain of a breach of that proviso.

Semble, per Vaughan Williams and Stirling L.JJ., that the covenant was not a covenant for the payment of a "fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine" within the meaning of section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892.

Appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Darling, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover £28 15s., a quarter's rent of certain licensed premises known as the Burlington Hotel at Brighton.

The plaintiff, who was the freeholder, had mortgaged the premises, and on the 29th of October, 1895, he and his mortgagee granted a lease of the premises to Leon Perrot for twenty-one years, at the rent of £115. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee that he would not assign the demised premises without the consent of the lessors, such consent not to be unreasonably or capriciously withheld.

In 1902 the mortgage was vested in John Dear, and the lease was vested in one Chater, who had mortgaged by way of sub-lease to Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton (Limited). Chater and his mortgagees desired to assign the lease to the defendant, and they applied to the plaintiff and Dear for the necessary consent. The plaintiff and Dear required as a condition to their consent that the defendant should covenant that he would pay the rent reserved during the remainder of the lease.

By an indenture dated the 9th of June, 1902, between Dear of the first part, the plaintiff of the second part, Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton (Limited) of the third part, and the defendant of the fourth part, Dear and the plaintiff granted to Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton (Limited) licence to assign the demised premises to the defendant for the residue of the term, and the defendant thereby covenanted that he would at all times during the residue of the term duly pay the rent reserved by and perform and observe all the covenants, agreements, and provisions contained in the lease and on the part of the lessee to be performed and observed. The premises were accordingly assigned to the defendant, and the defendant subsequently with the consent of the lessors, assigned to one Escott.

The quarter's rent for which the action was brought was rent which accrued due at a date after the assignment to Escott.

The defence was that the covenant by the defendant for the payment of rent during the remainder of the term was unenforceable—first, because there was no consideration for it, and, secondly, because it was a provision for a payment in the nature of a fine within the meaning of section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892.

Section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, is as follows: "In all leases containing a covenant, condition, or agreement against assigning, underletting, or parting with the possession, or disposing of the land or property leased without licence or consent, such covenant, condition, or agreement shall, unless the lease contains an expressed provision to the contrary, be deemed to be subject to a proviso to the effect that no fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine shall be payable for or in respect of such licence or consent; but this proviso shall not preclude the right to require the payment of a reasonable sum in respect of any legal or other expense incurred in relation to such licence or consent."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Darling, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff.
The defendant appealed.

Buckmaster, K.C. (W. de B. Herbert with him), for the defendant.—This covenant is bad, for it provides for the payment of a fine or for a consideration in the nature of a fine, which is imposed by the lessors as a condition to their giving their consent to the assignment. Such a covenant is intended to be prohibited by section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892. This covenant is not made conditional on the lessee making default in payment of rent. It is an absolute covenant by the defendant, the assignee, and under it the lessors could call on him to pay the rent for the remainder of the term. This is not a case of a mere security, as in In re Cosh's Contract, 45 W. R. 117. [1897] 1 Ch. 9.

T. H. Carson, K.C. (J. D. Crawford with him), for the plaintiff.—This covenant does not provide for the payment of a fine or a sum of money in the nature of a fine within the meaning of section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892. It merely makes the defendant a surety, and it gives him the usual rights of sureties. Secondly, the section does not make the taking of a fine illegal. It imports into leases a statutory bargain to this extent—that it reads into every lease a particular proviso unless the lease itself contains an express provision to the contrary. The parties to any lease may contract themselves out of the statutory bargain.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Darling, J. The facts of the case are not in dispute, and it is not necessary for me to restate them. I will merely deal with the point of law which has been raised in this case, and on which my judgment must turn. The question arises with regard to a licence to assign a lease, a licence which was granted by the lessor and his mortgagee for the contemplated assignment of the demised premises by an assignee of the original tenant to another person as a subsequent assignee. The licence in question is dated the 9th of June, 1902, and is in the form of an indenture made between John Dear of the first part, William Waite of the second part, who were the original lessor and his mortgagee, Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton (Limited), in whom the lease was then represented to be vested, of the third part, and Arthur Lewis Jennings, the proposed assignee, of the fourth part. The indenture witnesses that John Dear and William Waite grant to Bass, Ratcliff, & Gretton (Limited) licence to assign the demised premises to Arthur Lewis Jennings for the residue of the term, and at the end of the indenture we find this clause: "And this indenture also witnesseth that in consideration of the aforesaid licence and of the premises the said Arthur Lewis Jennings for himself, his executors administrators and permitted assigns doth hereby covenant with the said John Dear and William Waite respectively that he, the said Arthur Lewis Jennings, will, as from the 25th day of March, 1902, and at all times during the residue of the said term of twenty-one years, duly pay the rent reserved by and perform and observe all the covenants, agreements, and provisions contained in the said recited indenture of lease, and on the part of the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to be performed and observed, but without prejudice to the liability of the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, under or by virtue of the said indenture of lease and the covenants provisions, and conditions therein contained." This action is brought to recover one quarter's rent of the rent so covenanted to be paid by Jennings—viz., £28 15s. It will be observed that this covenant is not a covenant which will cease to be in operation if Jennings parts with his interest in the premises by assignment, but is a covenant which will continue in operation for the residue of the term. The defence set up in answer to the action is a defence based on section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892. That section provides that "In all leases containing a covenant, condition, or agreement against assigning, underletting, or parting with the possession or disposing of the land or property leased without licence or consent, such covenant, condition, or agreement shall, unless the lease contains an expressed provision to the contrary, be deemed to be subject to a proviso to the effect that no fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine shall be payable for or in respect of such licence or consent." Our attention was called to a provision in the Conveyancing Act, 1881, section 2 (ix), which is as follows: "Rent includes yearly or other rent, toll, duty, royalty, or other reservation, by the acre, the ton, or otherwise; and fine includes premium or fore-gift, and any payment, consideration, or benefit in the nature of a fine, premium, or fore-gift." It is argued that the covenant in question is unenforceable, because the payment for which it provides falls within the words "fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine" in section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892; and the definition of "fine" which I have quoted was relied on in support of this argument. But in my judgment the rent here covenanted to be paid does not fall within the words of section 3 of the Act of 1892 read in the light of the definition. In my judgment this is a covenant to secure the rent, and not a covenant for anything over and above the rent. But although this is my opinion, I desire only to express it as an opinion, because it is not essential to my judgment in this case that I should determine that point. And, indeed, it is not desirable that I should determine it, for the reason that we are not all agreed on it. But even supposing the sum here covenanted to be paid was a "fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine" within the meaning of section 3 of the Act of 1892, yet it would not, in my judgment, be possible for the defendant to rely on that section as a defence to this action. The effect of the section is not to make a payment of this kind an illegal payment. The effect of it is that, as between the parties to the case, the lease is to be deemed to be subject to a proviso that no such payment shall be payable. It may well be that, as between the parties to the original lease, the lessee would have been entitled to disregard the absence of a licence if the lessors refused to grant their licence except on payment of a fine. That, however, does not affect persons in the position of the parties in this case, the defendant here being the assignee, and not having been a party to the original lease. Under these circumstances, it seems to me to be impossible to make out that the nature of this covenant, coupled with the provisions of section 3 of the Act of 1892, constitute a defence to this action. I therefore think that the appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, does not prohibit the taking of sums in the nature of a fine. What it does is to provide that, in the absence of an expressed provision to the contrary, a covenant against assigning without consent shall be deemed to be subject to a proviso to the effect that no sum of money in the nature of a fine should be payable for or in respect of such consent. In the present case the lease does not contain any expressed provision to the contrary. Suppose that on a proposed assignment the lessor had, nevertheless, taken a fine from the proposed assignee. It does not seem to me that the taking of such a fine would be illegal, or that the proposed assignee could recover it back on the ground of being an illegal payment. Of course it would be open to the person to whom the licence was granted, if the fine was demanded of him, to pay it under protest, reserving his right to recover it back. But if a person who was sui juris paid without protest, I do not see how he could recover it back. Here, however, no such fine was paid, but the assignee entered into a personal covenant to pay the rent reserved by the lease and to perform certain covenants. He has since assigned the lease, and he is now sued for rent which accrued due after that assignment. Is the claim a valid one? It may be that the covenant was entered into without consideration. I assume that it was, but the absence of consideration is no defence to an action on a covenant. I am of opinion that there is no valid defence, and that the action is bound to succeed. That is sufficient to dispose of the case, but I wish to add that, as at present advised, I share the opinion expressed by my lord that this covenant is not a covenant for the payment of a fine.

MOULTON, L.J.—I am also of opinion that the defence is unsustainable. The case raises an important question under section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892. The mischief aimed at by that section is one that is well known to lawyers. Leases are, in the absence of words expressing a contrary intention, assignable. It has accordingly become customary to insert in leases a covenant on the part of the lessee that he will not assign without the consent of the lessor, and there is usually added a proviso that such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld. Such a covenant in itself is one to which the Legislature could not object, as being one which affords a reasonable protection to the lessor. But the power to insert such a covenant, if unqualified, might be turned from a mere protection into a source of profit to the lessor. If the covenant were strictly interpreted, a lessee might find himself in the same position as old copyholders, who were subject to arbitrary fines on alienation. It was to counteract this that the section was passed. The effect of the section is to read into every lease containing a covenant against assigning without consent, unless the contrary is expressed, a proviso that no fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine shall be payable for such consent. The power of refusal is not to be made a source of profit to the lessor. I cannot believe that the section only applies to the payment of a sum of money. Looking at the definition of "fine" in the Act of 1881, which includes any consideration in the nature of a fine, I think that "fine or sum of money in the nature of a fine" in the section with which we are dealing means money or money's worth paid as the price of consent. Coming to this case, I ask myself whether we have here a consideration in the nature of a fine which is the price or condition of consent to alienation. I cannot feel any doubt that for the lessors to insist on the covenant in question was within the mischief aimed at by the section, and was a breach of the proviso which the section reads into the lease. But what is the effect of the legislation? It does not make such a covenant as the present a malum prohibitum; it reads into the lease this proviso in favour of the holder of the lease. It is in the power of the holder of the lease—that is, the intending assignor—to sue for a breach of the proviso so read into the lease. But any such breach is a wrong to the assignor only, and not to the assignee. So far as Jennings is concerned, it must be assumed that he took this covenant into consideration when he agreed to the price. We cannot listen to any complaint from him that there has been a breach of the proviso I therefore come to the conclusion that the defence is not sustainable.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Charles A. Bannister & Reynolds.

Solicitors for the defendant, Carthew & Wheeler.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 30.

In re JUDD AND POLAND AND SKELCHER'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conditions of sale—Trust for sale—Leaseholds—Sale in lots—Sale by way of underlease—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 13.

Trustees for sale of leasehold properties comprised in one lease may sell the same by lots, and may, in the event of only one lot being sold, carry out the sale by granting an underlease for the residue of the term less one day at an apportioned rent.

In re Walker and Oakshott's Contract, 50 W. R. 41, [1901] 2 Ch. 383, overruled on this point.

This was an appeal from a decision of Warrington, J., allowing an objection to title taken by a purchaser on a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, that trustees for sale, who had put up to auction several houses comprised in the lease in several lots, were not entitled to complete the sale by means of an underlease of each lot for the whole of the term, less one day, at an apportioned rent.

The facts were as follow: John Kempster, who died in 1887, devised and bequeathed the whole of his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for his wife for life and after her death upon trust for sale and investment as therein mentioned.

In June, 1905, the trustees of the will put up for sale by public auction, with other property of the testator, five leasehold houses, Nos. 40, 41, 42, 43, and 44, Lorrimore-square, in five separate lots, being lots 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, subject to certain printed particulars and conditions of sale.

Lot 13, No. 40, Lorrimore-square, was stated in the particulars of sale to be "held with lots 14, 15, 16, and 17 under a lease for ninety-two and a-half years (less ten days) from the 25th of March, 1853, at an entire ground-rent of £28 per annum, of which £5 will be apportioned to this lot."

There was a similar statement and apportionment of rent with reference to lots 14, 15, 16, and 17, except that £8 was the rent apportioned for lot 17.

The fifth condition of sale provided that the title to lots 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 should commence "with the lease (being an underlease) dated the 30th of December, 1853, under which these lots are held."

The eleventh condition provided that as lots 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 were all held under this same lease at an entire rent of £28, such rent should be apportioned between those lots in the sums mentioned in the particulars; that if all these lots were sold at the present sale the purchaser of the largest in value of such lots, or in the event of equality of purchase-money the purchaser of the first lot should take an assignment of the lease, upon trust to execute an underlease to the respective purchasers of the other lots of their respective lots for the whole term, less one day, at the said apportioned rents, and under and subject to covenants by the respective underlesses and conditions corresponding, so far as applicable, with the covenants by the lessee and conditions contained in the original lease; but that if any of these lots remained unsold "the vendors will grant to the purchaser or respective purchasers of the lot or lots sold such an underlease as aforesaid of each of the lots sold. The vendors being trustees will not enter into any covenants in the assignments or any underleases to be granted by them under this condition except the usual covenant against incumbrances, with the addition in any underlease of the usual restricted covenant for quiet enjoyment and an acknowledgment for production of the original lease."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lot 13 was the only one of these five lots sold at the auction. When the abstract of title was delivered the purchaser took the objection that the trust for sale in John Kempster's will did not authorize the vendors to grant an underlease of any part of the testator's property; as this objection was insisted upon, the vendors took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking for a declaration that the purchaser's objection was not a valid objection, and that a good title had been shown in accordance with the contract.

This summons was heard by Warrington, J., on the 3rd of August, 1905, when he considered the case covered by In re Walker and Oakshott's Contract, 50 W. R. 41, [1901] 2 Ch. 383, and he accordingly allowed the purchaser's objection and dismissed the summons with costs, ordering the contract to be rescinded and the deposit returned, as was done in In re Walker and Oakshott's Contract.

The vendors appealed.

Levett, K.C., and G. Welby King, for the appellants.—The transaction in question is not really the grant of an underlease, but is a sale carried out by a well-known conveyancer's expedient for the purpose: Still v. Webb, 45 W. R. 170, [1897] 1 Ch. 144; Davidson's Conveyancing Precedents (4th ed.), vol. 1, p. 701; Key & Elphinstone's Conveyancing Precedents (8th ed.), vol. 1, p. 293; Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (7th ed.), p. 191. We submit that In re Walker and Oakshott's Contract, 50 W. R. 41, [1901] 2 Ch. 383, which Warrington, J., followed, ought to be overruled.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and E. S. Ford, for the purchaser.—This is not a sale, but an underlease, which is inconsistent with the trust for sale: Evans v. Jackson, 8 Sim. 217; Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. v. Sutherberry, 29 W. R. 113, 16 Ch. D. 236.

No reply was called for.

COLLINS, M.R.—Romer, L.J., will deliver the judgment in this case.

ROMER, L.J.—In this case the trustees for sale of certain leasehold property, which comprises several houses, sold in exercise of their trust by public auction those houses in several lots. The conditions of sale provided that if all the lots were sold at the sale the purchaser of the most valuable lot, or in the event of equality of purchase-money, the purchaser of the first lot, in order of sale, should take an assignment of the leasehold property as a whole, and then should grant underleases to the purchasers of their respective lots for the term of the original lease less one day at the apportioned rents, which according to the conditions of sale had been apportioned as between the different purchasers. Now, stopping there, I do not suppose it can be said that there is any objection to that condition of sale, and if all the lots had been sold, and the purchasers of the different lots had completed according to those conditions, no objection could have been taken to any of the sales. But in a case of this kind it is necessary for the trustee who is selling in lots to consider what is to be done in case all the lots are not sold, and that some time may elapse before the sale of the whole of the lots can be completed, and what has to be done with regard to the case of a purchaser of any one lot by public auction. The condition of sale applicable to that state of things in the present case was the usual (to my mind) and well-known condition — viz., that should any of the lots remain unsold at the present auction, "the vendors will grant to the purchaser or respective purchasers of the lot or lots sold such an underlease as aforesaid of the lot sold." That is to say, the vendors purported to carry out the sale by auction in lots as best they could; so far as the lots actually sold were concerned they purported to complete that transaction, and then delayed to a future time, as was necessary, the completion of the sale of the remainder of the leaseholds. The question is, is that last condition invalid and not within the powers of trustees for sale to insert as a condition in the sale by them? In my opinion, there is no sufficient reason for holding it is not within their powers. The trust for sale in the present case was in the ordinary form, but under the Trustee Act of 1893, s. 13, it is provided that upon a trust for sale the trustee may sell either together or in lots all or any part of the property by public auction or by private contract subject to any such conditions respecting title or evidence of title or other matter as the trustee thinks fit. These are very general words, and I should be loth to cut down their generality. The only necessity for doing so would be this, that trustees must not, of course, in availing themselves of the provisions of the Act, do anything that would be unreasonable on the part of trustees for sale.

Now, seeing that such conditions of sale as I have mentioned are at the present day ordinary and usual conditions of sale, well known to conveyancers for the purpose of carrying out a sale of properties all comprised under one lease when selling by lots, it appears to me that it ought not to be said that the trustees are acting improperly or beyond the powers conferred upon them by the statute when they use such conditions as these. It is not as if there was any extra liability cast upon the trust estate by their doing so. I might almost say if they do not sell by means of such conditions as these I do not know on what other conditions they could possibly sell. I do not mean to say they might not have other conditions, but I am not aware of any other conditions that would be so convenient to the trust estate or which would cast less responsibility upon the trust estate. The trustees were using conditions of sale which to my mind were best adapted to carry out the trusts, and these conditions were within their powers. In any case, when only one lot is sold, whether they sold under conditions such as we have here, or under any other conditions allowing for an assignment with cross powers of distress, or otherwise, of the lots sold, so long as the trustees retain the rest of the property that had not been sold, so long the liability to the landlords continued. In substance the same liability existed whether they had carried out the sale of the one lot by means of absolute assignment, or whether they did it by means of underlease as in the present case. The only objection that can be made to the conditions of sale in the present case as to an underlease being granted direct by the trustees for sale, when only one lot is sold at the auction, is that in form it is an underlease, and it is said that underleases are not justified. I may take it that an underlease in substance is not justified, but where an underlease is a pure conveyancer's expedient, a method of conveyancing for carrying out a sale, then I cannot see there is any valid objection to it, especially as I have pointed out that this conveyancer's expedient is the best known method of carrying out such a sale, and the best for the trust estate. As Stirling, J., pointed out in the case of Still v. Webb with regard to such an underlease as I am now considering: "Is it a lease? In a sense no doubt it is a lease, but in truth it is a sale. It is described as a sale in the conditions of sale, and it is so described in the plaintiff's bill of costs. It is a sale carried out by an underlease, which is a well-known conveyancer's expedient where the property sold is held with other property under one lease to avoid an apportionment of the rent about which there might be a difficulty with the superior landlord." That, in my opinion, really disposes of this case. It is said that there is a hardship upon the purchaser; he may have a difficulty in proving on a subsequent sale by him that this underlease in form was a sale in substance. The answer is, the form of the conveyance would shew that. It would, if properly drawn, recite the contract for sale, the conditions of sale, and that it was carried out in this manner as part of the conditions of sale. It would show a sale effected and carried out by that mode of conveyance. It appears to me that there is no objection in substance to this sale, and that the vendors were right, and that the decision of Kekewich, J., which is in substance appealed from, in In re Walker and Oakshott's Contract cannot be upheld by this court. The reason given in that case is, as I have pointed out, based on a misapprehension as to what really is the liability of the trust estate in such a case as this, and for these reasons I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This appeal, though in form from Warrington, J., is really an appeal against the decision of Kekewich, J., in In re Walker and Oakshott's Contract. It seems to me it may really be disposed of on a very short and simple ground. The trustees who are authorized or directed to sell may sell in the manner pointed out by section 13 of the Trustee Act, 1893. They may sell in lots, and if they may sell in lots, they, it seems to me, may sell adopting the usual, the proper, I may also say the necessary, mode of selling the property.

In a case like this, where there is one leasehold which is split up into several lots, I have asked in vain for an answer to the question, How else can the trustees sell one lot and one lot only if there is no bidder for the remaining lots of the property comprised in the lease? In the language of Stirling, J. (as he then was), this condition simply adopts what is a well-known conveyancer's expedient, and I think it is a fallacy to say that because trustees for sale are not authorized to grant a lease that they have not power in a case like this to carry out the sale by means of that which is a mere piece of machinery—viz., the grant of an underlease with a nominal reversion, which is something wholly distinct from what I have in the course of the argument ventured to call a real underlease. Nor am I pressed with the difficulty which a purchaser from the present purchaser may be said to have; I think that would be entirely met by the conveyance being so framed as to show that the property was put up for sale, this lot having a rent apportioned to it, and that for the purpose of carrying out the sale of the said lot the underlease was granted for the whole term less one day. For these reasons, with great respect to Kekewich, J., I think his judgment in In re Walker and Oakshott's Contract ought not to be supported, and this appeal must be allowed with the usual consequences.

Solicitors, C. C. Algar; J. Gamble.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } April 24, 26.
Buckley, J. }

In re WRIGHT.
WHITWORTH v. WRIGHT. (a.)

Will—Appointment—Remoteness—Doctrine of election.

Persons taking a settled fund as in default of appointment in consequence of the appointment purported to be made by the will of the appointor being void for remoteness, and also having bequeathed to them by the same will other property belonging to the testatrix, are not put to their election between the settled fund and the property of the testatrix bequeathed to them, but are entitled to retain both without making compensation.

A testatrix having a power of appointment by will over certain settled property, and also being possessed of property of her own, devised and bequeathed her real and residuary personal estate, and all real and personal estate over which she had power of appointment by will, to trustees upon trust for sale, and to hold £10,000, part of the proceeds of sale, upon certain trusts, and the residue of the proceeds of sale upon other trusts. Some of the trusts were, as regards the settled property, void for remoteness.

Held, that the persons taking in default of appointment, who were also beneficiaries of the testatrix's own property, were not put to their election between the two properties.

Held, also, that the £10,000 must be considered as taken proportionately out of the settled property and the property belonging to the testatrix, according to their respective values.

In re Oliver's Settlement, 53 W. R. 215, [1905] 1 Ch. 191, and In re Beale's Settlement, 53 W. R. 216, [1905] 1 Ch. 256, followed.

Tompkyns v. Blane, 28 Beav. 422, and In re Bradshaw, [1902] 1 Ch. 436, not followed.

Originating summons.

The principal question for determination in this summons was whether persons were put to their election where a testatrix had made to them an appointment, which was void for remoteness, of certain property under a power, and had in the same will validly given them other property which was her own

By his will dated the 16th of July, 1851, after appointing trustees and executors, and subject to an annuity to his wife, John Whitworth gave his real and personal estate to his trustees, and directed them to cause a valuation to be made thereof and to divide the same into as many shares as (in the event which happened) there should be children of the testator, and he directed his trustees to invest one equal half part of the share of each daughter in trust for such daughter during her life for her separate use, "and after her decease in trust for the benefit of any child or children or other issue of any such daughter (born in her lifetime) as she shall (notwithstanding coverture) at any time or times by deed or will appoint, and subject thereto in trust for such child or children of any such daughter as shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or (being a daughter or daughters) attain that age or marry, if more than one in equal shares."

The testator died in August, 1861, entitled to real and personal estate of large value. He left a widow and five children, of whom Mary Whitworth (afterwards Mary Wright) was one.

The share of Mary Whitworth having been valued, certain real property, consisting of a farm and a house, and certain personal property were appropriated in respect of her part of the share.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By settlements of the 11th of April, 1871, this real and personal property was conveyed and assigned to trustees in trust as regards the real property for sale and to hold the proceeds and the personal property upon trust for Mary Whitworth for life, for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death "for the benefit of any child or children or other issue of the said Mary Whitworth (born in her lifetime) as the said Mary Whitworth shall (notwithstanding coverture) at any time or times by deed or will appoint, and subject thereto in trust for all such child or children of the said Mary Whitworth as shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters attain that age or marry, if more than one in equal shares." And if there should be no such child, in trust for the executors, administrators, and assigns of Mary Whitworth.

By a deed of the 24th of April, 1871, certain trust funds belonging absolutely to Mary Whitworth, of the value of £4,000, were directed to be held by the trustees of the settlement of the 11th of April, 1871, upon trust for Mary Whitworth for life for her separate use without power of anticipation; and after her decease, subject to a life estate to any husband, if she so directed, upon trust "for the benefit of such child or children of the said Mary Whitworth, and in such proportions and manner and at such times as the said Mary Whitworth (notwithstanding coverture) shall by deed or will appoint, and subject thereto" for her children who should attain twenty-one years, or being a daughter should marry under that age with lawful consent, in equal shares; and in default of such children upon trust to transfer the fund to such persons as Mary Whitworth should (notwithstanding coverture) appoint, and in default of appointment to transfer the fund to certain of her brothers or their children as mentioned.

Mary Whitworth was married to John Hodgson Wright in October, 1872. In September 1882 certain preference stock belonging to Mary Whitworth absolutely was settled to be held by the trustees of the settlement of the 24th of April, 1871, upon the trusts of that settlement. By her will, made in 1903, Mary Wright, after appointing executors and bequeathing legacies and an annuity of £100, devised and bequeathed her real estate and the residue of her personal estate, and all real and personal estate over which she had a power of appointment by will, to her trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and after payment of certain expenses and debts and the annuity, and after setting aside a fund to answer the annuity the trustees were to stand possessed of the residue of the proceeds of sale and also of the fund set apart to answer the annuity, subject to the same annuity, upon trust for investment and upon trust as to £10,000, part thereof (thereinafter called "Francis Whitworth Wright Trust Fund") upon the trusts thereinafter mentioned. And as to the residue of the moneys and the fund set apart to satisfy the annuity of £100 (thereinafter called "my residuary trust fund"), upon trust for Francis Whitworth Wright and the testatrix's daughters Ethel Wright, Mary Evelyn Wright, and Hilda Wright in equal shares as tenants in common. And as to the Francis Whitworth Wright Trust Fund, upon trust when Francis W. Wright should attain twenty-one years to pay the income to him until he attained the age of twenty-five years, and then to pay the income to him during his life; and after his decease upon trust for his children who being sons should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters should attain that age or marry under that age, in equal shares. And if he should not have any such child he should have power to appoint one moiety of the income to any wife surviving him for life, and subject thereto his fund was to be held upon trust for the other children of the testatrix in equal shares, the shares of the daughters to be held upon the same trusts as the original shares. And as to the share of Francis W. Wright in the residuary trust fund, upon trust to pay the same to him on his attaining the age of twenty-five years. And as to the shares of Ethel Wright, Mary E. Wright, and Hilda Wright in the same fund, upon trust to pay the income of each share to the daughter for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her decease to hold the share for her children, who being sons should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters should attain that age or marry under that age, in equal shares. And in case any of the daughters should not have any such children, the daughter should have power to appoint by will after her decease one moiety of her share to any husband surviving for his life, and subject thereto the share of the daughter was to be held for the other children of the testatrix in equal shares, the shares of the daughters to be held upon the same trusts as their original shares.

The testatrix died in August, 1905. She had no power of appointment except that vested in her by the will of John Whitworth and the settlements mentioned above. All her four children were born before the 20th of September, 1882, the date of the last settlement. Only one, Mary Evelyn, had married, and she had only one child, the defendant Hilda M. Wilson, who was born in 1904.

In addition to the property settled by the will of John Whitworth and the indentures of settlement, Mary Wright had at her death unsettled property of considerable amount.

Various questions having arisen in the carrying out of the trusts of the wills and settlements, the surviving trustee of the will of John Whitworth, and two of the trustees of the will of Mary Wright, and the surviving trustee of the indentures of settlement—one of the plaintiffs being the trustee of both wills and also one of the trustees of each of the settlements—took out this summons in the matters of the estate of Mary Wright, the will of John Whitworth, and of the settlements of 1871, asking (amongst other things) whether any case of election arose as against the children of Mary Wright as between the settled funds respectively and the residue of the estate, so as to make it necessary for such children respectively to elect whether they would make good the purported settlements of the appointed funds respectively out of their respective shares of the testatrix's estate, or whether they would retain their shares in the estate and give up the appointed funds, or vice versâ.

Gatey, for the trustees.

G. P. Walker, for the children of Mary Wright.—The appointments to the children of F. W. Wright, Ethel Wright, Mary E. Wright, and Hilda Wright are void for remoteness, and consequently the settled property goes as in default of appointment to those persons as the children of Mary Wright equally. The property, however, which belonged to the testatrix, Mary Wright, will go to her grandchildren according to the terms of the will. No case of election arises. To put the persons taking in default of appointment to their election would be to allow the rule against perpetuities to be evaded: In re Oliver's Settlement, 53 W. R. 215, [1905] 1 Ch. 191; In re Beale's Settlement, 53 W. R. 216, [1905] 1 Ch. 256; In re Handcock's Trusts, 23 L. R. Ir. 34. It is submitted that In re Bradshaw, [1902] 1 Ch. 436, 50 W. R. Dig. 138, was wrongly decided.

Gilbart Smith, for Hilda M. Wilson.—I submit that In re Bradshaw was rightly decided, and that the children of Mary Wright are put to their election either to settle the settled property which they take as in default of appointment in accordance with the purported appointment of the testatrix, or to make compensation to the disappointed appointees out of the interests in the testatrix's own property given them by her will. The case falls within the ordinary principles upon which the doctrine of election is founded—namely, that the testatrix has given her own property to donees upon the implied condition that they will carry out her wishes with regard to the settled property. The rule against perpetuities is not infringed. The persons taking in default of appointment need not give effect to the purported appointment unless they choose to do so. If, however, they do so, they resettle the property as absolute owners of it, just as is constantly done where real estates are settled from generation to generation in families. The case of Tompkyns v. Blane, 28 Beav. 423, which decided in a case of the same kind as this that the parties were put to their election, was not cited to the learned judges who decided In re Oliver's Settlement and In re Beale's Settlement.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J.—I deferred the delivery of my judgment in this case out of respect to Kekewich, J., in order that I might consider with deliberation his judgment in In re Bradshaw, and look into the previous authorities upon the question. Having done so, I find myself unable to follow the learned judge's decision. I agree with Farwell, J., in In re Oliver's Settlement and with Warrington, J., in In re Beale's Settlement. I concur in the reasoning and the conclusions of Farwell, J., in In re Oliver's Settlement. By her will Mary Wright exercised powers given to her by the settlements of the 11th of April, 1871, and the 24th of April, 1871, so as to transgress the rule against perpetuities. As regards property the subject of those powers, the gift to Francis W. Wright payable at twenty-five and the interests given by Mary Wright to her grandchildren are gifts in breach of the rule against perpetuities, and are void. This follows from what I have said. There remains for argument the question (supposing that under these circumstances the question arises) whether the consequence of the gifts being void is that the funds as to which the gift in the will fails go as in default of appointment, or whether the prior absolute gift in the will prevails. I reserved this question for argument, if necessary. Mary Wright had properties other than those over which she had the above-mentioned powers—namely, property of her own, and property hers by way of power under the settlement of 1882. At the date of the settlement of 1882 all her four children were lives in being. No question of perpetuity arises in respect of these two classes of property. By her will Mary Wright throws all property, both that which was hers and that over which she had powers, into one fund, and out of the proceeds of conversion of that fund directs the payment of her funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and an annuity of £100 a year to her father-in-law, Henry Wright. These are gifts which could not come out of the property over which she had a power, and I think must be taken to have been given out of the property which was hers. She then gives the residue of the fund and the amount set apart to answer the annuity upon trusts for investment, and the trustees are to stand possessed as to £10,000 upon certain trusts for her son Francis, and as to the residue upon trust for Francis and his three sisters in equal shares as tenants in common, with certain further provisions for settling her children's shares. As regards some part of the property these trusts are good, and as regards other part they are bad, as infringing the rule against perpetuities. For determining the portion of the fund as to which the trusts are valid and the portion as to which the trusts are invalid, I think that a rateable proportion must be attributed to each having regard to the values of the respective properties, and that this applies as much to the £10,000 as to the residue. There is no gift of £10,000 as a separate legacy. It is a sum to be taken out of the general fund, and it must be taken rateably out of the property included in the settlements of 1871 and the other properties according to their respective values. The above, I think, furnishes the materials for answering all the questions in the summons subject to the question upon which I said that I would hear argument.

I shall declare to the effect that the trusts as regards the gifts to Francis W. Wright at twenty-five and to the grandchildren of Mary Wright are in breach of the rule against perpetuities and are void, that there is no consequent election, and that as to the proportion included in the settlements of 1871 and the other properties there is to be a rateable proportion as between the two, and that the trusts will fail or succeed as regards those rateable proportions. That applies to the £10,000 as well as to the residue.

Solicitors, Walker & Rowe, for Frederick Walker & Son, Halifax.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } March 29.

PHILLIPS v. RAIL. (a.)

Will — Construction — Miscopying — Omission in will supplied by inference.

Where upon the construction of a will it is clear that words have been omitted from the will, owing to its having been miscopied, the court will supply the necessary words, where it can be inferred from other parts of the will what the testator intended should be inserted.

Dictum of Knight-Bruce, L.J., in Key v. Key, 4 De G. M. & G. 73, approved.

Adjourned summons.

By his will, dated the 15th of March, 1855, the testator William Rail the elder thereby gave and devised (subject to certain annuities or rent-charges) certain freehold hereditaments therein mentioned unto and to the use of his son Samuel James Rail and his assigns for and during his life, with remainder to his sons and daughters in tail, as therein mentioned, the two last limitations being expressed as follows: "And in case there shall be but one other or remaining daughter, then as to the part or share of the daughter or daughters so failing of lawful issue, to the use of such only remaining daughter and the heirs of her body; and in case there shall be but one daughter of the body of my said son Samuel James Rail, then to the use of such one or only daughter and the heirs of her body, and in default of such issue to the use of my own right heirs for ever."

And the testator thereby gave and devised (subject to certain annuities, rent-charges, and legacies) certain freehold hereditaments therein mentioned unto and to the use of his son William Rail the younger and his assigns for and during his life, with remainder to his sons and daughters in tail, as therein mentioned, the last two limitations being expressed as follows: "And in case there shall be but one other or remaining daughter, then as to the part or share of the daughter or daughters so failing of lawful issue to the use of such only remaining daughter and the heirs of her body, and in case there shall be but one daughter of the body of my said son William Rail to the use of my own right heirs for ever."

(a.) Reported by P. W. PEGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There then followed a residuary devise and bequest to the testator's sons, the said Samuel James Rail and William Rail, in equal shares as tenants in common, and the testator appointed the said Samuel James Rail and William Rail the executors thereof.

The testator died on the 7th of March, 1866.

The testator's son and heir-at-law, the said Samuel James Rail, died on the 5th of March, 1903, without ever having been married, and having by his will, dated the 23rd of February, 1899, appointed the plaintiffs Thomas Phillips and Ernest Bullmore the executors and trustees thereof.

The testator's son, the said William Rail the younger, died on the 2nd of December, 1904, without ever having had any children, and having by his will, dated the 30th of March, 1903, appointed his wife, the defendant Mary Caroline Rail, the sole executrix thereof, and devised all his real and personal estate to her absolutely.

The devise to Samuel James Rail and his issue was in the ordinary form, but in the devise to William Rail the younger and his issue, although the limitations were obviously intended to be the same, mutatis mutandis, as in the devise to Samuel James Rail and his issue, there was a gift over to the testator's own right heirs in case there should be but one daughter of the body of William Rail the younger.

Under these circumstances an originating summons was taken out by the said Thomas Phillips and Ernest Bullmore, the personal representatives of the said Samuel James Rail, against the said Mary Caroline Rail, the personal representative of the said William Rail the younger, for the determination of the following questions: (1) That it may be determined whether upon the true construction of the will of the said William Rail the elder, the real estate thereby devised to the use of the said William Rail the younger for his life with remainders over passed on the death of the said William Rail the younger without his ever having had issue to the plaintiffs as claiming through the said Samuel James Rail as heir-at-law of the said William Rail the elder, or whether such real estate thereupon passed under the residuary gift contained in the said will of the said William Rail the elder.

Macnaghten, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the plaintiffs.—The point is whether the plaintiffs take the whole, under the gift to the testator's own right heirs, or only half under the residuary gift. In the gift to the daughters of William Rail there is a slip; it is not intelligible, and it ought to be struck out or amended by inserting the same words as in the gift to Samuel James Rail. In the devise to Samuel James Rail the provisions are in the ordinary form, and it is peculiar that in the case of William Rail, the testator should break off in the middle of the devise. There is a gift to an only daughter, and the testator could not have intended to take it away three lines after: Abbott v. Middleton, 4 W. R. 69, 7 H. L. Cas. 68; Luxford v. Cheeke, 3 Lev. 125; Newburgh v. Newburgh, Sugden's Law of Property, 196, 206, and 207; Doe v. Micklem, 6 East 486. Adopting the rule laid down by the House of Lords in Abbott v. Middleton, there is here a repugnance, for there is a gift to an only daughter and a gift over if he leaves an only daughter. Taking the will as a whole, the testator must have intended to give the property to one daughter if there was only one, and if there were no children of such daughter, then to the testator's own right heirs: Mellor v. Daintree, 33 Ch. D. 198; Sweeting v. Prideaux, 24 W. R. 776, 2 Ch. D. 413; Key v. Key, 4 D. M. & G. 73; In re Redfern, 25 W. R. 902. 6 Ch. D. 133. In cases of this description the courts have taken into consideration that the will is obviously miscopied: In re Dayrell, [1904] 2 Ch. 496. In the present case the limitations were carefully framed, but there are several miscopyings showing the carelessness with which this will has been compared.

Eve, K.C., and Romer, for the defendant.—If the will is read as it stands it is impossible to say that the event has not happened which brings into effect the remainder to the testator's own right heirs: Key v. Key, 4 D. G. M. & G. 73. The words of this will are capable of being construed, and are perfectly intelligible, and a strict construction ought to put on them. It was not a mere copying of the provisions of the limitations to Samuel; there are verbal dissimilarities. The plaintiffs are asking not only for the addition of words, but also for the exclusion of words. There is nothing on the face of the will to show what the testator intended, it is only because he has previously used somewhat similar words in the devise to Samuel that the court is asked to insert them, in the devise to William. There is no ambiguity except when you look at the previous gift.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: This will is a conveyancer's will, and it is obvious that it has been copied in a blundering manner. In the earlier parts of the will the words used are apt to effect the purpose desired. When it came to be copied for execution it was miscopied. [His lordship then read the two last limitations in the devise to Samuel and the ultimate limitations in the devise to William, as above set forth.]

When a gift is vested the court does not divest it, unless there are very clear words. On reading the whole will, it appears that the intention of the testator was, after the gift of an estate tail to his son, and in default of issue of any daughter of the latter, to give a remainder to his own right heirs. It is a remainder after the determination of all previous estates. It is not a remainder over if there is one daughter. If you look at the devise to Samuel, it is not difficult to see what has happened. It is manifest that the copyist has left out a line in copying. Reading the will as a whole, and giving effect to the testator's intention as expressed in the will, the remainder is to the right heirs of the testator in default of the previous estates tail.

As Knight-Bruce, L.J., says in Key v. Key: "In common with all men, I must acknowledge that there are many cases upon the construction of documents in which the spirit is strong enough to overcome the letter; cases in which it is impossible for a reasonable being, upon a careful perusal of an instrument, not to be satisfied from its contents that a literal, a strict, or an ordinary interpretation given to particular passages would disappoint and defeat the intention with which the instrument, read as a whole, persuades and convinces him that it was framed. A man so convinced is authorized and bound to construe the writing accordingly."

This passage is applicable to the present case, as is also the case of Abbott v. Middleton, and the judgment of Joyce, J., in In re Dayrell.

I declare that the will confers a remainder in fee simple on the right heirs of the testator on the failure of the estates previously given, therefore the plaintiffs, as the devisees of Samuel, are now entitled. No order as to costs.

Solicitors, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for Bullmore, Falmouth; Rawle, Johnstone, & Co., for Jenkins, Penryn.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) Dec. 20, 21.

BOYLE v. SMITH. (a.)

Licensing law—Sale of beer—Sale of beer in unlicensed place—Liability of master for illegal act of servant—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94).

The respondent, who held an off-licence for the sale of beer at his brewery premises, employed a drayman to deliver beer. The drayman had no authority to sell beer, but only to deliver it, and he had been expressly forbidden to sell beer. The drayman, however, sold and delivered beer in the street contrary to the above orders.

Held, that the respondent was not liable to be convicted under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, for selling by retail intoxicating liquor at a place where he was not authorized to do so, as the drayman had no authority at all to sell beer.

Case stated under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts by a metropolitan police magistrate.

Five summonses were issued against the respondent upon an information by the appellant for unlawfully, upon five different days, selling beer at a place where he was not authorized by his licence to sell the same, contrary to section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

All the summonses were heard together, and at the hearing the following facts were admitted and proved: A licence had been granted to the respondent authorizing him to sell beer by retail for consumption off the premises of the Southwark Park Brewery, under which licence he was entitled to sell beer by retail at those premises only. Upon each of the five days mentioned in the summonses the respondent's drayman, Deeth, was in a street in charge of a van belonging to the respondent containing crates of bottled beer from the brewery, and upon each of those days Deeth sold and delivered in the street out of the crates beer by retail to two persons, who had not ordered any beer from the said brewery, whose names in no way appeared as customers or otherwise in the books of the brewery, who were strangers to Deeth, and who there and then in the street paid Deeth for the beer. The respondent had given orders to all his draymen not to deliver beer unless an order for the beer had been previously given at the brewery, and he took every care to prevent any beer being sent out which had not been so ordered. A notice was posted in the respondent's office, where all the employees could see it, to the following effect:

"Important Notice. — Draymen are especially cautioned not to deliver to any person or persons unless the orders for same have been previously given by customers or sent or taken to the brewery. To deliver beer unless an order is first given as above is illegal."

Each drayman was required to keep a book for his own use upon his round containing the names of the customers on his round. A notice was posted up at the brewery as follows: "Notice to draymen.—Sale of beer to private customers.—Every drayman must keep a book for each day's delivery, having the name, number of house, street or road, where any beer is delivered or about to be delivered, and the book must be produced immediately when stopped and asked for by any excise officer. All draymen must strictly carry out this order." A book was kept at the brewery shewing exactly the beer sent out, and the particular customers to whom the beer was to be delivered in accordance with the orders received. A special clerk checked the load on the dray before it went out. The beer was sold almost entirely for cash on delivery by the drayman, who was authorized to receive cash on delivery, and was required at the end of each day to bring back to the brewery all beer undelivered by him, and a proper amount of money for the beer which he had delivered during the day, so that the amount of beer and money brought back should tally with the amount and value of beer booked out. Occasionally customers, when called upon by the drayman for the purpose of delivering beer to them, were found by him to have left the address at which he had previously delivered beer, so that out of the load of beer taken out from the brewery the drayman would from time to time have some beer in his van which he had been unable to deliver. It was the duty of the drayman in those circumstances to bring back such beer to the brewery, and to strike out from his round-book the name of the customer for whom it had been intended.

The magistrate dismissed the summons upon the ground that the respondent was not responsible for the acts of the drayman Deeth.

It appeared from the case that, after the summonses against the respondent had been dismissed, summonses were issued against Deeth, charging him with offences under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and he was convicted and fined.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the above facts, the decision of the magistrate was correct in point of law.

By section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), "no person shall sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed to sell the same or at any place where he is not authorized by his licence to sell the same. Any person selling or exposing for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor which he is not licensed to sell by retail, or selling or exposing for sale any intoxicating liquor at any place where he is not authorized by his licence shall be subject to the following penalties . . ."

Danckwerts, K.C., for the appellant.—The master is here responsible for the act of his servant. This was not a casual act, but the beer was sold by the servant in the course of his employment for his master.

Counsel cited Williamson v. Norris, [1899] 1 Q. B. 7; Dyer v. Munday, 43 W. R. 440, [1895] 1 Q. B. 742; and Bird v. Evans, 21 Q. B. D. 249.

H. C. Biron, for the respondent.—The respondent here, as the magistrate finds, took every precaution to prevent the improper sale of beer, and he is not responsible for the illegal sale The drayman's duty was not to sell beer, but to deliver it, and therefore his illegal act was not within the scope of his employment.

He cited Newman v. Jones, 17 Q. B. D. 132, 134 W. R. Dig. 105, Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case stated by a police magistrate upon a prosecution for selling beer contrary to the provisions of section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, on five separate days in a certain street. The only question before us is in respect of those sales to persons in the street. It raises a question, in my opinion, not entirely covered by any of the authorities which have been cited. There is a group of sections in the Act of 1872, under the heading "Offences Against Public Order," sections 12-18, under which it has been decided that a licensee is liable to a penalty, in one case for the conduct of a servant in charge of the premises in permitting gaming (Bond v. Evans, 21 Q. B. D. 249, distinguishing Somerset v. Hart, 12 Q. B. D. 360); in another for an illegal sale of beer by his servant within the general scope of his employment though contrary to the licensee's express orders: Commissioners of Police v. Cartman, [1896] 1 Q. B. 655. I may refer also by way of illustration to Emary v. Nolloth, [1903] 2 K. B. 264, where it was held that a licensee who was himself in charge of the premises at the time was not liable for an illegal sale to a child by his servant against the licensee's express orders. It has been urged upon us on behalf of the appellant that Williamson v. Norris decided that a servant could not be prosecuted for a sale contrary to the provisions of section 3, and that it followed that the master must be liable; but in that case the only decision was that a sale by a servant by his master's order was not a sale by the master himself within section 3. In my opinion if a servant having no authority to sell at all, chooses to make a sale, he, not being a licensed person, is liable to penalties under section 3. The question we have to decide is whether the respondent is liable for the conduct of his drayman. In my opinion the magistrate has taken a correct view of the law, and the respondent is not liable. It cannot, I think, be contended that he is liable because the drayman whom he has sent out to only deliver beer to customers sells beer contrary to his orders. This is not a case of delegated authority within the class of cases of which Bond v. Evans and Commissioner of Police v. Cartman are examples. The business must be carried on in this way, for it cannot be contended that the respondent ought to go out and deliver all the beer himself. It seems to me, the fact being that the drayman had no authority at all to do that which he did, and was expressly forbidden to do it, there was not a sale by the master contrary to section 3. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The duties of the drayman was to deliver beer to customers who had ordered it, and if for any reason he could not deliver, then to bring it back to the brewery, and he had express orders not to deliver beer to anybody else. It is quite true that if the drayman was acting within the general scope of his employment in selling beer it would be no answer for the master to say he had expressly forbidden him to do so. In the present case, however, the drayman was employed only to deliver beer and not to sell beer, and therefore the respondent cannot be made liable for what his servant did.

RIDLEY, J., concurred.

Solicitors for the appellant, Maitlands, Peckham, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Skewes-Cox, Nash, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) Dec. 20.

LOWERY v. HALLARD. (a.)

Adulteration—Food and drugs—Sample—Division into three parts—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63).

When an article is purchased for analysis under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, each of the three parts into which it is divided pursuant to section 14 of the Act must be sufficient for the purpose of analysis.

Case stated by justices of Cheshire.

At a petty sessions held at Birkenhead an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under the Sale of Foods and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1899, charging that the appellant on the 11th of November, 1904, at Hoylake, by James Barry, her servant, unlawfully sold to the respondent a certain article of food—to wit, brandy—which was adulterated with spirit not derived from the grape, and which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, was heard and determined by the justices, and the appellant was ordered to pay a fine.

On the 11th of November, 1904, the respondent purchased from the appellant's firm half a pint of brandy. The respondent divided the brandy into three parts as required by section 14 of the Act, and delivered one of the parts to the appellant. He sent another part to the public analyst, and retained the third part, which was afterwards sent to the Government laboratory. The part sent to the public analyst weighed five ounces, the part retained by the respondent about three ounces, and the part delivered to the appellant about two and a-half ounces.

The public analyst analyzed the part sent to him and gave a certificate stating that the sample was adulterated with proof spirit derived from some source other than the grape. For the appellant an analytical chemist was called, who stated that the part given to the appellant had been sent to him for analysis, but that he had refused to analyze it as it contained less than three ounces. On behalf of the respondent the public analyst stated that he could not make a complete analysis with less than five ounces. For the appellant it was contended that the sample ought to have been divided into three equal parts, and as that had not been done there had been no compliance with section 14 of the Act.

The justices held that the section had been sufficiently complied with and overruled the objection. The question (among others) for the opinion of the court was, whether the conviction was wrong upon the ground that the sample of brandy was divided into three unequal parts as above stated.

Pickford, K.C. (Cuthbert Smith with him), for the appellant.—Section 14 was not properly complied with, and the conviction is therefore wrong. The sample must, under section 14, be divided into three equal parts, or at any rate each part ought to be sufficient for the purpose of analysis.

He cited Barnes v. Chipp, 3 Ex. D. 176, 26 W. R. 685; Mason v. Cowdary, [1900] 2 Q. B. 419, 48 W. R. Dig. 8; Smith v. Savage, 53 W. R. 477 [1905] 2 K. B. 88.

Bankes, K.C. (Leslie Scott with him), for the respondent.—It may often be impossible to divide the article into three equal parts or into three parts each of which is sufficient for analysis. That is not the right construction of section 14. The question is one for the justices, and they may refuse to convict if they are satisfied that the divided parts are insufficient for analysis. There is no such finding in the present case.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is an important case. In my opinion the provisions of this Act would be impaired if we took the view contended for by the respondent. Here half-a-pint of brandy was purchased from the appellant by the respondent, who divided it into three parts—five ounces were sent to the public analyst; three ounces were retained for comparison; and about two but less than two and a-half were given to the seller. The main point is whether each of the three parts into which the sample is divided must be sufficient to enable what has been called, I think correctly, a checking analysis to be made. Now, section 14 of the Act of 1875 provides that the person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis shall notify to the seller his intention to have the same analyzed by the public analyst and that notification has been held to be in the strictest sense a condition precedent to the right to institute a prosecution. Then the section says that the purchaser shall divide the article into three parts, each part to be marked and sealed or fastened up, and shall, if required to do so, deliver one part to the seller, and shall retain one part for future comparison, and shall submit the third part, if he deems it right to have it analyzed, to the public analyst. It is contended for the respondent that it is not a condition precedent that the other two parts should be of equal value for the purpose of analysis as that which is submitted to the public analyst. In my opinion the provisions of section 14 are conclusive against that contention, and I think that even a superficial consideration of those provisions is sufficient to show that each of the three parts must at least afford substantially the same facilities for analysis. I do not, of course, mean that they must be all mathematically equal, but in my judgment there is no good ground for the argument that the section is satisfied if the part which is submitted to the public analyst for the purpose of founding a prosecution alone affords sufficient facilities for analysis. The subsequent provisions of the Act confirm me in that view. Section 20 provides that when the public analyst has analyzed the portion which has been sent to him, and has given his certificate, from which it may appear that an offence has been committed, the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings. Then section 21 says that at the hearing the part retained by the purchaser shall be produced, and section 22 as amended by section 21 of the Act of 1899 provides that the justices before whom the complaint is made shall, at the request of either party, or without such request, if they think fit, cause the article—that is, the portion retained by the purchaser, and produced in court, to be sent for analysis to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. Either party, therefore, has an absolute right to have that analysis. Then we must consider the third portion, which, if required, is to be delivered to the seller. It would be little less than a farce if that part were not sufficient for the purpose of analysis on the part of the seller. The whole scheme of the Act therefore seems to show that the sufficiency for the purposes of analysis of these two portions which are retained is a condition precedent to the prosecution of the proceedings. One good reason why this should be so is that, under section 21, the justices may act upon the production of the certificate of the public analyst without any further evidence. It is therefore most important that there should be a proper opportunity of checking or correcting any analysis made by the public analyst. I have therefore come to the conclusion, not that the three parts into which the article is divided must be mathematically equal or identical in every respect, but that each part must at least be sufficient for the subsequent purposes contemplated by the statute—that is, for analysis by a Government analyst or by an analyst on behalf of the seller.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is really not disputed in this case that two of the parts did not fulfil that purpose; the part given to the seller and the part retained for comparison were not sufficient for the purpose of analysis. I entertain no doubt that in order to found a prosecution the person purchasing an article with a view to analysis must so divide the article that each of the three parts may be sufficient for analysis. If the contrary were held, the Act would in my opinion be open to grave objection. It seems clear from the statement of the case that the justices came to the conclusion that it was not necessary that the other two parts should fulfil the same conditions as the part sent to the public analyst, and that being so the conviction ought not to stand. With regard to the suggestion made by counsel for the prosecution, that there may be cases in which it is impossible to divide the article into three sufficient parts, I can only say that I have heard very many of these cases, and have never heard that suggestion made before, and that if that be so, it is a matter for the Legislature to deal with. I am of opinion, therefore, that this conviction must be quashed.

LAWRANCE and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Solicitors for the appellant, A. B. Sanders, for Thompson, Hughes, & Mathison, Birkenhead.

Solicitors for the respondent, Pritchard, Englefield, & Co., for Holden & Cotton, Birkenhead.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). March 26.

PAQUIN (LIMITED) v. BEAUCLERK. (a.)

Married woman—Purchase of goods—Liability—"Contract otherwise than as agent"—Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 1.

In order that a contract entered into by a married woman may bind her separate property under the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, it must affirmatively be shown that she entered into the contract otherwise than as agent.

In 1903 a married woman, while living with her husband, bought from a tradesman certain articles of dress suitable to her position and with the consent of her husband. She had made previous purchases and paid for them with her own cheques, and on the occasion in question was debited with the amount charged as "Mrs. H.," but was without any separate property of her own.

Held (Lords Robertson and Atkinson dissenting), that there was no evidence that she contracted "otherwise than as agent" within the meaning of section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, and therefore that she was not liable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), which had reversed a judgment of Lawrance, J.

The facts are given in the judgments.

R. Isaacs, K.C., M. Lush, K.C., and A. W. Groser, for the appellants.—The respondent must prove affirmatively that the appellants knew that she was a married woman and looked to her husband for payment: Married Women's Property Acts, 1882 and 1893 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75 and 56 & 57 Vict. c. 63). The decisions upon the earlier Act were Palliser v.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Gurney, 35 W. R. 760, 19 Q. B. D. 519; Stogdon v. Lee, 39 W. R. 467, [1891] 1 Q. B. 661; and Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120. The Act of 1893 shifts the onus of proof on to the married woman to show that she was contracting as agent, and here there is no evidence.

Debenham v. Mellon, 29 W. R. 141, 6 App. Cas. 24, was referred to.

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Norman Craig, for the respondent.—The appellants have failed to show that the respondent was contracting "otherwise than as an agent" within the Act of 1893: see Jewsbury v. Newbold, 26 L. J. Exch. 247; Morel v. Westmorland, 52 W. R. 353, [1904] A. C. 11.

Isaacs, K.C., replied.

Lord LOREBURN, L.C.—This is an action brought by a firm of dressmakers against a lady, who at all material times was a married woman living with her husband, to recover the price of certain articles of dress. The articles were ordered in the months of April, May, and June of 1903. When their dealings commenced nothing was said on either side to indicate upon whose credit they were to be supplied, whether that of the husband or of the wife. The plaintiffs debited the lady in the name of Mrs. E. Holden, evidently a mistake for Mrs. V. Holden, and were paid by her cheque for such goods as were paid for. They have never claimed against the husband. It is their custom to debit the lady who gives an order and to ask no questions. They are entitled to carry on their business in this way, but if they do so they must take their chance of the status of those with whom they deal, and of the consequences which the law affixes to that status. It will be convenient to state first what I understand to be the law applicable to the present case. At common law the general rule, with exceptions not material for the present purpose, is that a married woman is incapable of contracting on her own account and cannot be sued alone. But she might contract as agent for her husband. In equity a married woman possessed at the time of separate estate not subject to restraint against anticipation (I will call it free separate estate) could make contracts enforceable against her separate estate, but not enforceable against herself personally. Such being the state of law and equity, it is manifest that the present plaintiffs could not, apart from statute, have sued the defendant at law at all because she was a married woman. Nor could they have sued her in equity because, in fact, she had no separate estate. It was not argued that she had, and it could not have been argued, because all the evidence is that she had none. Accordingly, in order to succeed, the plaintiffs must rest their case upon statute. There are two Acts of Parliament which have been relied upon. One of them is the Married Women's Property Act of 1882. A portion of that Act has been repealed, but section 1, sub-section 2, remains, and under it a married woman can be sued as if she was a feme sole, and may also contract as such. But it has been held, properly, I think, that this right to contract only exists where the married woman has separate property at the time. So far, therefore, as the present case is concerned, the Act of 1882 does indeed authorize the action being brought against a defendant in her own name, but it does not give any effective remedy against her or entitle the plaintiffs to judgment as soon as it appears that she had no separate estate at the time of the alleged contract. The second Act relating to this subject is the Married Women's Property Act of 1893. The only chance of the plaintiffs is to bring their case within the Act of 1893. The Act of 1893 provided that all the present or future separate estate of a married woman should be available to answer every contract into which she might enter, where she entered into it "otherwise than as agent." It does not signify under this Act whether or not she had separate estate at the time. If she was acting as an agent, the Act of 1893 will not apply. If she was acting otherwise than as agent, then the Act will apply. I think it clear that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in the present case if Mrs. Holden ordered these goods on her own account, and equally clear that they must fail if she ordered them as agent of her husband. Mr. Isaacs argued that, in order to prove that she entered into the contract as an agent, a married woman must establish, not merely that she was, in fact, an agent for her husband, but also that the other contracting party knew it, and contracted with her on those terms. I cannot adopt that view. The Act of 1893 does not mean that a married woman's separate estate is to answer her contracts unless both parties to the contract deal on the footing that she is an agent. It means, in my opinion, that the separate estate is not to answer when, in fact, she entered into the contract as an agent. Before the Act was passed a tradesman could fix a husband with liability for a debt contracted by his wife if he could prove either express or implied authority from the husband. It was immaterial whether at the time the contract was made the tradesman knew that the wife had her husband's authority, or even knew that she was a married woman. The knowledge of the tradesman was immaterial. I think it equally immaterial under the Act of 1893.

It is now necessary to advert to the course of the trial. Evidence was given by the plaintiff's manager and also by the defendant, and a variety of issues were raised. They were embodied in five questions left by Lawrance, J., to the jury. The jury could not agree upon a verdict, and in the end the learned judge, in the hope of sparing the parties of the expense of a new trial, entered judgment for the plaintiffs. When the case came before the Court of Appeal that judgment was reversed upon the ground that there was no evidence of the defendant's having entered into a contract otherwise than as an agent. That was the substance of the decision, although some of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal expressed opinions and purported to arrive at findings upon the evidence, some of which seem to be appropriate rather for a jury than for a court. It was argued by Mr. Bankes that even if there had been some evidence that the defendant contracted otherwise than as an agent, the judges of the Court of Appeal would in this case have been at liberty under ord. 58, r. 4, to draw their own inferences of fact and to enter judgment accordingly. The proper construction of ord. 58, r. 4, has been the subject of criticism in Millar v. Toulmin, 34 W. R. 695, 17 Q. B. D. 603, and Allcock v. Hall, 39 W. R. 443, [1891] 1 Q. B. 444. In the latter case all the judges of the Court of Appeal concurred in the opinion that they were at liberty to draw inferences of fact and enter judgment in cases where no jury could properly find a different verdict. Obviously the Court of Appeal is not at liberty to usurp the province of a jury; yet, if the evidence be such that only one conclusion can properly be drawn, I agree that the court may enter judgment. The distinction between cases where there is no evidence, and those where there is some evidence, though not enough to be acted upon by any reasonable jury, is a fine distinction, and the power is not unattended by danger. But if cautiously exercised it cannot fail to be of value. In the present case I think that the Court of Appeal came to a sound conclusion. The only decisive question was whether the defendant made this contract as agent for her husband. Or, to put the same thing in other words, had she his authority express or implied? In my opinion the evidence, which was uncontradicted and not impugned by cross-examination, leaves it beyond reasonable doubt that she did act with his authority. There was no evidence the other way. That is sufficient to dispose of the case. I desire to add that while agreeing with the Court of Appeal in this particular conclusion of fact, I think, as at present advised, that some of the inferences of fact which were drawn by the judges in the Court of Appeal were matters on which, as the evidence stands, a jury might reasonably have found either way.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered by the Lord Chancellor. The material facts and circumstances of the case are, I think, beyond controversy, and the question at issue, in my opinion, lies in a very narrow compass. A married woman had dealings with Paquin (Limited), who carry on a large business in Dover-street as milliners and dressmakers. She was introduced by an old customer. The manager apparently made some inquiries of one or more trade protection societies, and came to the conclusion that the lady might be supplied with goods on credit. On that footing she dealt with the firm and became a regular customer. The articles which she ordered were charged to her account. The bills were sent in to her and for a while she paid regularly by her own cheques. After about twelve months' time the lady's husband, who had been living for a good many years with vast show of wealth, was found to be utterly insolvent. He absconded, And then this action was brought against the lady for the balance remaining unpaid on her account. In answer to interrogatories the lady admitted that when she ordered the goods (referring, I presume, to the inception of the transaction) she did not state whether she ordered them on her own behalf or on behalf of any other person, and she admitted that she did not say that she was a married woman. In fact, as one would expect, she merely gave her married name and her address. The name and address were given correctly. The manager at the trial stated that he did not make any inquiries about the husband and that he "did not think about him." He said, too, that he had "considerable experience in giving credit to ladies in the West End," and that they "always treated a lady as a principal, not an agent." I see no reason to doubt the manager's statement. In such a case, to borrow the words of Bramwell, L.J., in Debenham v. Mellon, I may say: "I very much doubt whether the tradesman has any intention of trusting the husband. He hopes and expects that somehow the wife will get the money and pay for the goods without the husband knowing anything about the matter." The lady swore that she had no separate estate or separate income of any kind. She said that her husband from time to time paid money to an account which he allowed her to open with the London and County Bank for the purpose of defraying household expenses and other claims upon him and the bills for what she bought for her own use. She said that she had her husband's express authority for dealing with Paquin (Limited), and she added that the dresses which she bought were worn in her husband's presence. This evidence was not contradicted, nor was her testimony shaken in cross-examination. Now if this transaction had occurred just before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, there cannot, I think, be the slightest doubt what the result of an action by the tradesman would have been. It must have been held that the lady entered into the contract as agent. The husband, and the husband alone, would have been liable. The lady would not have been liable either at law or in equity, and as she had no separate estate at the time she could not have been brought within the Married Women's Property Act, 1882: Stogdon v. Lee. It seems to me that after the passing of the Act of 1893 such a contract is still a contract of agency and nothing else. Whatever was necessary and sufficient before the Act to make a transaction entered into by a married woman a contract of agency is, I think, necessary and sufficient to make a transaction entered into under similar circumstances a contract of agency now. In order to exempt a married woman who is in fact an agent from the very serious consequences of a judgment against her in respect of future separate estate, when she has no separate property at the time, it is not required by the Act of 1893 that she should communicate to the person with whom she is dealing the fact that she is her husband's agent, or state that she is not acting on her own behalf, or declare that she is married and cohabiting with her husband, or confess that she has not a sixpence in the world which she can really call her own. It can hardly be expected that such domestic confidences should be whispered across the counter or imparted to some forewoman in the comparative privacy of an inner apartment. I cannot imagine that Parliament could have meant to impose on married women a task so novel and disagreeable, not to say so strange or so odious. The only object of the first section of the Act of 1893 was, I think, to correct or reverse the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Stogdon v. Lee, and to repeal the provision in the Act of 1882 which threw upon a married woman the burden of showing that her contract did not bind her separate estate. There is really no hardship on the tradesman who deals with a married woman. He is under no obligation to give credit at all or to continue or extend the credit if credit is given. He may make any inquiry he pleases of the customer or of anybody else. If he chooses to trust a lady with unlimited credit when he is not sure of his ground, he has only himself to blame if anything should go wrong. The learned judge told the jury that the real question was whether the manager knew that the lady was a married woman. I venture to think that that question is not material. The only question, as it seems to me, is whether the contract was entered into by the lady "otherwise than as agent." That is a question of fact. Unless the affirmative is shown the Act does not apply. In the present case, inasmuch as it has been proved that the lady had her husband's express authority to act as his agent, and did so act, and it is not suggested that there was any misrepresentation on her part, I think that the view of the Court of Appeal is right. No jury, I think, could have properly come to any other conclusion on the evidence. I do not myself agree with all the inferences of fact drawn by Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J. I agree entirely with the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, L.J. I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON.—In my opinion the law governing this case is the first section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, and I quote the words which state the new rule set up for married women's contracts: "Every contract hereafter entered into by a married woman, otherwise than as agent, shall be deemed to be a contract entered into with respect to and to bind her separate property, whether she is or is not possessed of or entitled to any separate property at the time when she enters into such contract." The plain result of this enactment is that unless the respondent entered into this contract as agent for her husband she is liable to the appellant. Whether she entered into the contract as agent seems to me the only question in the case; and, the facts being perfectly free from dubiety, that question is one of law. The facts which are relevant are these: The lady was living with her husband; she had his authority to buy such articles as those in question, and he knew of their purchase, at least after it had been made. On the other hand, it is equally certain that the appellants did not know that the respondent had a husband living, or that she was living in cohabitation with him. The respondent manifested herself to the appellants merely as "Mrs. V. Holden," and that they had no further or other knowledge of her status. It is obvious that this name was entirely consistent with her being a widow or a separated married woman, and it was therefore insignificant on the question of agency. No circumstance or scintilla is suggested as raising a jury question whether the appellants did or did not in fact know that the respondent had a living husband and was living with him. In these circumstances, what the respondent relies on is the undisclosed fact that she had her husband's authority; and the question of law is whether this is enough to make the contract that of an agent. In my opinion it is not, and the point may, as I think, be subjected to a very simple test—did the appellants deal with the respondent as an agent? As already stated, they certainly did not, for they never heard of the existence of a husband. This being so, I find it legally impossible to hold that the respondent contracted as an agent, for unless both parties regarded the appellant as an agent she did not contract as agent. It seems to me that, primâ facie, every person who contracts contracts for himself or herself. The application of this to those who de facto hold the powers of agents is thus stated in Smith's Mercantile Law (10th ed.), p. 173: "If any agent contract without disclosing that he has any principal, he is himself the person primâ facie responsible." In the present case, where the respondent affected and purported to stand on her own feet vis à vis to the appellants, and did not apprise them of anything about herself to suggest agency, she must be held to have contracted personally. And the first section of the Act of 1893 places beyond dispute the capacity of a married woman to contract personally, and places the case of an agency in antithesis and exception to the primary case of contract—viz., personal contract. I have stated my views shortly, and I feel that it would be superfluous to protest the irrelevancy of several suggested topics. Thus, it is surely unnecessary to deprecate such phrases as that this lady contracted in her married name (as if she had the choice of two names, either of which she could truthfully give to a tradesman). Again, the question before the House being solely whether this lady is liable, it is nothing to the purpose to prove that an undisclosed principal might also be liable. The only hesitation which I feel about the case is whether it is permissible to withhold it from further trial by jury. But a careful examination of the evidence has satisfied me that there are no questions of fact remaining in dubio, and that the sharp question of law which I have discussed is decisive of the controversy. I am therefore for allowing the appeal, and finding the appellants entitled to judgment, with costs.

Lord ATKINSON.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of Lord Robertson, and I concur in it. I do not think that the first section of the Married Women's Property Act of 1893 protects, or was intended to protect, from liability a married woman who enters into a contract apparently as principal, though she may in fact be only agent for an undisclosed principal. If the other party to the contract should discover that she was in fact an agent for an undisclosed principal, he may, I think, sue the principal just as he could sue him if the married woman were a man or a feme sole, but if he should elect to sue her I do not think that she can escape liability on the plea that she was in fact agent, though at the time when the contract was entered into she neither disclosed that circumstance nor mentioned any facts from which the inference would naturally and reasonably be drawn. The liability of the husband on the wife's contract is governed by the general principles of the law of principal and agent. He cannot be held responsible for goods supplied to her unless he has expressly or impliedly authorized her to act as his agent or ratified the contract which she has professed to make on his behalf, or conducted himself in such a way that he would be estopped from denying that she was his agent. One mode by which this authority of the wife to act as the agent of the husband can be established is by proof of two facts—(1) that she is living with him; and (2) that the goods ordered or supplied are of such character and nature as are usually required in those departments of domestic life and economy which the wife ordinarily manages and controls. The tradesman who sues the husband for goods supplied on the order of the wife will, on proof of those two facts, though they may have only come to his knowledge after the contract was made or the goods supplied, have laid before a jury evidence which, if unexplained or unrebutted, would justify them in drawing the inference of fact that the wife had authority to act as the agent of the husband: see Thesiger, L.J.'s, judgment in Debenham v. Mellon. That inference may be rebutted in several well-known ways independently of any statute, and, amongst others, by evidence from which the jury might draw the inference of fact that the goods were supplied on the credit of the wife to the exclusion of the credit of the husband: Bentley v. Griffin, 5 Taunt. 356; Jewsbury v. Newbold. These last-mentioned matters, however proper for consideration in a suit against the husband, do not, I think, help much to solve the question in controversy in this appeal. In my view the question here is not what Mrs. Holden in fact was, but how and in what character did she professedly contract. Primâ facie every person who enters into a contract without disclosing that he or she as a principal contracts for himself or herself. The only facts indicating the nature of the defendant's position or her power or authority to contract, known to the plaintiff company when the contract now sued upon was entered into, which could, in my opinion, be regarded as evidence of any weight on the issues raised in this action are two: First, that the defendant when first introduced gave her name as Mrs. V. Holden or Mrs. E. Holden; and, second, the fact that subsequently she paid for wearing apparel supplied to her by cheques signed May Holden. The opening of the account in the plaintiff's books in the name of Mrs. Holden or Mrs. E. Holden, or the furnishing to her of bills in that name, are, as it has been said, "colourless transactions," not helping to a conclusion either way. The two first-mentioned facts cannot, I think, be regarded as amounting to a disclosure that the defendant had a principal, her husband, nor to a representation, express or implied, that she was contracting as agent on his behalf, and any finding of a jury that they amounted to either should necessarily, in my opinion, be set aside, as having been made without evidence reasonably capable of supporting it. Nor do I think that these two facts amount to evidence from which a jury could legitimately draw the conclusion that the plaintiff company had constructive notice that the defendant was a married woman actually living with her husband, and was primâ facie contracting as his agent and pledging his credit. During the progress of the argument I entertained some doubt as to whether a new trial ought not to be directed; but on reconsideration I am of opinion that Mrs. Holden must, on the evidence, be held to have contracted otherwise than as agent. I have therefore come to the conclusion that there is no evidence on which a jury could properly find that this lady acted as agent for or on behalf of her husband, and therefore I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the appellant.

Lord LOREBURN, L.C.—I find in the precedent of the Eastern Steamship Co. v. Smith and Others, [1891] A. C. 310, 40 W. R. Dig. 241, the record is as follows: "It being moved to reverse the judgment, the same was objected to; both were equal, two for affirming and two against. According to ancient rule of law semper præsumitur pro negante, the question for reversal was determined in the negative, therefore the judgment was affirmed and the appeal dismissed." Costs are never given in such a case. I propose, therefore, that that rule should be adopted in this case, unless your lordships think otherwise.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Gery & Brooks.

Solicitors for the respondent, Lewis & Lewis.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.) — May 15.

MARTIN v. NADEL.
DRESDNER BANK, Garnishees. (a.)

Practice—Attachment of debts—Garnishee order—Discharge of garnishee—Foreign debtor—Foreign garnishee—Possibility of garnishee being sued by debtor in foreign court—Disregard by foreign court of garnishee order—Garnishee not discharged by payment—Ord. 45, r. 1.

In an action against a foreigner residing in Germany the plaintiff recovered judgment and obtained a garnishee order against German bankers, who were indebted to the judgment debtor.

Held, that, as the judgment debtor might sue the bankers in Germany for the debt due from them to him, and as the German court would not recognize payment under an English garnishee order as a defence to the action on the debt, the garnishee order ought not to have been made.

Appeal from an order of Sutton, J., making absolute a garnishee order nisi.

Judgment in the action having been given in favour of the plaintiff in the Court of Appeal, the defendant, Nadel, who was a German, resident in Berlin, appealed to the House of Lords.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was necessary for him, in accordance with the usual practice, to give security for the costs of the appeal by recognizance to the amount of £500 and by either a bond for £200 or payment of that amount into the Security Fund Account of the House of Lords. He paid the £200, but, as he was a foreigner, there was difficulty about accepting his recognizance. He applied to the Dresdner Bank, a German bank in Berlin, which had a branch in London, and with their consent proposed their London branch as his substitute. On his advancing the sum of £500 to the bank at Berlin, the London branch entered into the required recognizance for £500.

The appeal to the House of Lords was dismissed with costs.

A sum of £300 was required out of the £500 towards the costs which the defendant became liable to pay. The result was that a balance of £200 remained due from the Dresdner Bank in Berlin to the defendant.

The plaintiff thereupon obtained a garnishee order nisi against the Dresdner Bank, under ord. 45, r. 1, to attach the sum of £200 to answer the judgment debt, and the garnishees not appearing upon summons, the order was made absolute under rule 3.

The garnishees appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Ralph Bankes, for the garnishees.—This garnishee order ought not to have been made. The garnishees are out of the jurisdiction. The court will never order anyone to pay to A. a debt which he owes to B. unless such payment discharges him from his debt to B.: see ord. 45, r. 7, which says that payment by a garnishee under garnishee proceedings shall be a valid discharge to him as against the debtor. The German courts by their law do not recognize garnishee orders made in foreign countries. If Nadel sued the Dresdner Bank, as he might do, in Berlin to recover the debt owing from them to him, the bank could not rely on payment under this garnishee order, and would have no defence to the action. The court therefore cannot, or at any rate will not, allow this garnishee order to stand, because the bank if they obeyed it would not thereby be discharged. If the London branch of the Dresdner Bank is a separate entity from the bank itself, the judgment creditor fails to show any debt owing from the London branch to Nadel at all. If, on the other hand, they are the same, or the branch is a mere limb of the bank, then the garnishees are out of the jurisdiction.

They cited Mayor, &c., of London v. London Joint Stock Bank, 29 W. R. 870, 6 App. Cas. 393; Roberts v. Death, 30 W. R. 76, 8 Q. B. D. 319; Wood v. Dunn, 15 W. R. 180, 7 B. & S. 94.

Disturnal, for the judgment creditor.—No distinction need be drawn between the Dresdner Bank in Germany and its English branch. But it is no answer to the application for this garnishee order to suggest that some claim might be made against the garnishees in Germany notwithstanding payment. The recognizance was given in England in respect of an English action. The whole matter arises in England, and the case does not involve any consideration of foreign law. If the argument on the other side is correct, it would never be possible to obtain a garnishee order where the judgment debtor was a foreigner, for the foreign judgment debtor might always sue in his own country to recover the debt owing to him. It was open to the garnishees to go before a master and dispute their liability under rule 4 of order 45.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Sutton, J., at chambers, an order in garnishee proceedings made under ord. 45, r. 1. By it the garnishees, who are the present appellants, were ordered to pay to the judgment creditor £200, the debt due from them to the judgment debtor, or so much thereof as might be sufficient to satisfy the judgment debt. The question is whether that order was rightly made. With regard to the debt due from the garnishees to the judgment debtor, it was, as I understand, a debt contracted in Germany, and it was contracted under these circumstances. Nadel, the judgment debtor, being an appellant in the House of Lords, was required to provide security for the costs of his appeal—viz., £200 and a recognizance for £500. The £200 he paid into court, but as to the recognizance for £500 he was allowed to provide for that by getting a bondsman to act as his surety. That surety was the Dresdner Bank, and the Dresdner Bank, when they became surety, credited Nadel at their office in Berlin with £500, he having paid them that sum in Berlin. Nadel failed in his appeal to the House of Lords, and consequently money had to be paid under the bond of suretyship, not the whole of the sum for which the Dresdner Bank had become surety, but a part of it. The result is that a sum of money remains in the hands of the Dresdner Bank at Berlin, which they now hold as money had and received to the use of Nadel. That is the debt which is the subject of the garnishee order. The reason of its being possible to make the garnishee order in England is that the Dresdner Bank has a branch office in London. The question is whether under the circumstances the order ought to have been made. It is said against the making of it that if the Dresdner Bank are compelled under the order to pay Martin, the judgment creditor, the amount of the judgment debt, they will still remain liable to be sued in Berlin by Nadel for the whole amount of their debt to him, and will not be entitled to rely on any discharge by reason of the fact that they have been compelled in England to pay a portion of that debt to a creditor of Nadel under the garnishee order. There is no dispute between the parties as to the general proposition of law laid down in Wood v. Dunn, in the Exchequer Chamber, following the earlier case of Allen v. Dundas, 3 T. R. 125. That proposition was thus stated by Channell, B.: "The law will never compel a person to pay a sum of money a second time which he had paid once under the sanction of a court having competent jurisdiction." It is said here that to make this order will place the Dresdner Bank in the unfair position which these cases recognize that no one ought to be placed in, because, if the order were made, and the Dresdner Bank obeyed it, they might be compelled to pay a second time in Berlin. There was at first a little dispute on the question, but ultimately it was not disputed that the law of Germany was that the bank could not set up payment under the garnishee order as a defence to an action on the debt. But, even apart from the consideration whether the affidavits as to the German law on this question which have been read are sufficient, it seems to me to be plain that execution—and garnishee proceedings are execution—is primâ facie part of the lex fori, and that by the law of nations a court never recognizes an execution which has been effected in a foreign country by foreign law and has taken away any part of a man's property. So, according to international law, the Dresdner Bank could not set up in an action brought against them by Nadel in Berlin the fact that execution had been levied on this debt under a garnishee order in England. We have to say whether the court ought to refuse to make this order on the Dresdner Bank to pay in England, on the ground that after they have paid in England they may be compelled to pay a second time in Germany. I do not desire my judgment to proceed on the fact that here the debt was contracted in Germany, and that primâ facie the contract would be governed by German law. I am going to apply ord. 45, r. 1, which says that "The court or a judge may, upon the ex parte application of any person who has obtained a judgment or order for the recovery or payment of money, either before or after any oral examination of the debtor liable under such judgment or order, and upon affidavit by himself or his solicitor stating that the judgment has been recovered, or the order made, and that it is still unsatisfied, and to what amount, and that any other person is indebted to such debtor, and is within the jurisdiction, order that all debts owing or accruing from such third person (hereinafter called the garnishee) to such debtor shall be attached to answer the judgment or order; and by the same or any subsequent order it may be ordered that the garnishee shall appear before the court or a judge . . . to show cause why he should not pay to the person who has obtained such judgment or order the sum due from him to such debtor." In my opinion the execution creditor has not under that rule a right to an order ex debito justitiæ. The case of Roberts v. Death in principle decides this, that the court ought not to make an order for payment or execution against a garnishee in a case where it is inequitable to do so. That shows that there is no right ex debito justitiæ. There the equity was not the equity of the garnishee, but the equity of cestuis que trustent, who were behind the garnishee, and who came forward and took objection to the making of the order. Although there is no express provision in the rules enabling cestuis que trustent to come forward and object, the court refused to make the order, on the ground that it had a discretion, and that in that particular case it would be inequitable to make an order. I am unable to cite any authority which covers the present case, or which deals generally with the case where the garnishee is prevented from getting a discharge and remains under an obligation to pay a second time; but, dealing with the matter on principle and in accordance with my own view of what is equitable, I think that this order, which would leave the garnishees after they had obeyed it still liable to be sued for the full amount of the debt, one which is inequitable, and which ought not to have been made. The appeal will therefore be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the judgment creditor, Barnett & Shirer.

Solicitors for the garnishees, Oppenheimer & Southern.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — June 15.

In re ELLIS.
HARDCASTLE v. ELLIS. (a.)

Practice—Attachment—Four-day order—Order on two persons—Service on one—Construction—"After service of this order."

Two defendants were ordered to lodge a sum in court

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"within four days after service of this order." The order was served on one defendant only, the other not being able to be found.

Held, that the words "after service" meant after service upon the person against whom the order was to be enforced, and that a writ of attachment might be issued against the defendant who had been served.

Motion.

This was a motion in a creditors' administration action for leave to issue a writ of attachment against one of the defendants.

The following order had been made in the action: "It is ordered that the defendants W. P. Ellis and P. E. Ellis do within four days after service of this order lodge in court, as described in the schedule hereto, £360 14s. 5d. appearing . . . to be due from them as executors of the late defendant Eliza Ellis." The order had been duly served upon the defendant P. E. Ellis, but not upon W. P. Ellis, who could not be found.

The evidence was that the defendants had sold a house forming part of the estate of the testatrix, and had received the proceeds of sale; that the defendant W. P. Ellis had subsequently gone abroad, and that the only address which he had left behind was "Poste Restante, General Post Office, Cape Town."

The money had not been paid into court. More than four days having elapsed since the service of the order upon P. E. Ellis, the plaintiffs moved for liberty to issue a writ of attachment against P. E. Ellis.

Buckmaster, K.C., and H. Greenwood, for the motion.—A question arises whether the order can be enforced against the defendant who has been served with it before the other defendant has been served. The order is in respect of a joint and several debt, and can be enforced against either of the defendants: Evans v. Bear, 23 W. R. 67, L. R. 10 Ch. 76. A writ of attachment is a process of execution, and is for the purposes of practice a "writ of execution": see ord. 42, r. 8. The object of the service of the order on a defendant is to give him an opportunity of obeying it. He must obey it if he can whether his co-defendant does so or not. If service on both defendants is necessary one of several defaulting trustees could always by keeping out of the way prevent the court enforcing its orders against any of them.

The respondent did not appear.

BUCKLEY, J.—The question is one of construction of the order. What do the words "after service of this order" mean? Do they mean after service of the order upon both the defendants, or after service upon the one against whom the order is sought to be enforced? I think that the latter is the right view, and that the service is sufficient.

Leave granted.

Solicitors, Jaques & Co., for Samuel Wright Morgan, Bradford.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Bray, JJ.) April 2.

GIEBLER v. MANNING. (a.)

Metropolis—Unsound meat—Proceedings—Consent of local authority to proceedings instituted by their inspector—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 47, 99 (4), 107 (3), 123.

A summons was taken out by a sanitary inspector of a borough council under section 47 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, against a person for having on his premises unsound meat intended for sale for human food. It appeared on the face of the summons that the information was laid by and the summons issued to the respondent on behalf of the borough council, whereas in fact the inspector had not obtained the express consent of his council to issue the summons.

Held, that the conviction was not bad ab initio, as the words "on behalf of the borough council" could be rejected as surplusage, since a private individual could institute proceedings before justices under the above section.

Allman v. Hardcastle, 89 L. T. 553, 52 W. R. Dig. 112, considered and applied.

Case stated by a Metropolitan police magistrate, before whom the appellant, Frederick Giebler, a butcher, carrying on business in King's-road, Fulham, had been convicted upon an information preferred by the respondent, a sanitary inspector appointed by the Fulham Borough Council under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 47, alleging that on the 23rd of March, 1905, the appellant did deposit for the purpose of sale, or of preparation for sale, or had in his possession or on his premises for that purpose, 5lbs. of meat, which was on that day lawfully seized by the respondent, the said meat appearing to him at the time of seizure to be unsound, unwholesome, and unfit for the food of man.

The meat was in due course of law adjudged by the magistrate to be unsound, &c., and ordered to be destroyed.

The respondent, before applying for the summons, did not report the facts to the Fulham Borough Council or any committee appointed by them. He never received any express authority, by resolution or in writing, general or special, from the council or any such committee, authorizing him to make complaints or take proceedings on their behalf.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that under section 107 (3) of the Act, for the purposes of and as a condition precedent to prosecution on behalf of a sanitary authority by their sanitary inspector under section 47, it was necessary that the inspector should report the alleged offence to the authority, that the authority should consider such report, and direct or authorize their inspector to apply for a summons and act as prosecutor. No such report was made by the respondent, nor did the Fulham Borough Council or any committee thereof expressly direct or authorize the respondent to make the complaint and take proceedings.

The magistrate was of opinion that the reports required by section 107 (3) were confined to (a) nuisances discovered by the inspectors themselves under section 1, and other sections; (b) inquiries by them into complaints of nuisances and offences against the statute and statutory bye-laws made by individuals under (amongst other) sections 3 and 21. The offence in the present summons did not appear to fall into either class; but even if it did, the language of the section, "subject to the direction of the council," was capable at least of meaning such direction as it might choose to give. But however this might be, there was nothing in the language of section 107 (3), or, as regards committees, section 99 (4), compelling the authority to give directions in any particular form or manner, and the course adopted might well justify the respondent as resting on an implied direction and authority or on ratification.

W. Clarke Hall, for the appellant.—Before an inspector can institute a prosecution on behalf of a local authority he should report to the local authority and they should authorize him to apply for a summons and act as prosecutor against the alleged offender. No such report was made, nor did the borough council or any committee expressly authorize the respondent to make the complaint and take proceedings. The magistrate was wrong in holding that the reports required by section 107 (3) were confined (a) to nuisance discovered by the inspectors themselves under section 1 and other sections; (b) inquiries by them into complaints which were made as to nuisances and offences against the statute and against the statutory bye-laws by private individuals under (amongst others) sections 3 and 21, and as stated in evidence at the hearing these two classes of reports were always made, and as a fact consequent process was always applied for by the council's solicitor. The offence in the present instance does not appear to fall within either of those classes, but if it does the language of section 107 (3)—"subject to the direction of the sanitary authority or of a committee thereof"—is capable of meaning such direction as the council might deem it expedient to give, and here there was no direction at all. The question of authority is one of substance, because otherwise the local authority might not be held liable in costs if the prosecution failed.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Isle of Wight Ferry Co. v. Ryde Commissioners, 25 J. P. 454, was referred to.

Danckwerts, K.C., and W. J. Jeeves, for the respondent.—Even if the contention of the appellant that section 107 (3) makes it a condition precedent that the inspector should report and should have the express authority of the sanitary authority to prosecute, that would not affect the validity of the conviction, as anybody can institute proceedings under section 47 (2). Therefore the words "on behalf of the Fulham Borough Council" in the summons for the purpose of this case are quite immaterial. Allman v. Hardcastle, 89 L. T. 553, 52 W. R. Dig. 112, is directly in point.

They cited also Worthington v. Kyne, 3 L. G. R. 1098; Reg. v. Stewart, 44 W. R. 368, [1896] 1 Q. B. 300; Back v. Holmes, 57 L. J. M. C. 37, 36 W. R. Dig. 108; and Cole v. Coulton, 8 W. R 412, 29 L. J. M. C. 125.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion this appeal fails, as the case is practically covered by authority. The really important question is whether an individual can take proceedings under section 47 (2). I agree that section 47 operates to give only certain powers to individuals and that for certain purposes the rights and duties of the sanitary inspector and medical officer are hedged in by provisions for the protection of the ratepayers and of the sanitary authority, who are or may be their principals. If the sanitary authority were going to delegate their power to take proceedings to a particular officer they must do so under section 123 by a resolution. If a committee was going to authorize someone on their behalf to make complaints they must do so in accordance with section 99 (4). Therefore, for the purpose of liability for costs and of the question whether any proceedings had been taken on behalf of the sanitary authority, those provisions become of very great importance. But the question here is whether a private individual could take proceedings under section 47 (2). Can it be contended that the only persons who could take proceedings under section 47 (2) are the medical officer of health or the sanitary inspector, or the council who authorized them? It was said that the right to take proceedings was limited by the opening words of the section, but that contention I think goes too far, in view of the object of the statute, which was intended to ensure food being wholesome and to prevent diseased food from being exposed for sale. If it was the intention of the Legislature to restrict the right of any individual to lay an information there ought to have been express words to that effect. For the reasons stated in Back v. Holmes, it is not open to argument that a private individual can not lay an information. It was said that in this case the information was laid by the respondent on behalf of the borough council, but on that point this case was covered by Allman v. Hardcastle, which decided that the words "on behalf of the borough council" in the summons could be rejected as surplusage. In that case it was held that any person might lay an information for the offence of exposing goods for sale upon or so as to hang over any footway so as to cause an obstruction within section 60 (7) of the Metropolitan Police Act. It follows, therefore, as the power to lay an information is not limited to the persons referred to in the earlier part of section 47 of the Act we are considering it can not be contended that because there are in the Act certain sections protecting the sanitary authority, these proceedings were bad ab initio. The case of Isle of Wight Ferry Co. v. Ryde Commissioners is a very different case from the present. That was a case of an alleged nuisance on a foreshore and involved very different considerations. The statute there in question (the Nuisances Removal Act, 1855) was not a statute of the character of the Public Health Acts, dealing with a matter of great public importance, and the point that a private individual could not take proceedings for a nuisance was not raised there, nor could it have been raised. The respondent in the present case is entitled as a private individual to lay an information and take out a summons, and the fact that the sanitary authority was protected as regards costs was not sufficient to enable the court to say that these proceedings ought not to have been instituted by him.

For these reasons I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed without costs.

DARLING, J.—I agree.

BRAY, J.—I concur.

Appeal dismissed, but without costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, W. T. Ricketts & Son.

Solicitor for the respondent, R. M. Prescott.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) March 7.

HORNSEY CORPORATION v. BIRBECK FREEHOLD BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Local government—Making up street—Expenses—Owner residing outside district of local authority doing work—Power to charge such owner—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 150.

A local authority acting under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and making up streets under that section, has no power to charge any part of the expense on frontagers who reside outside the boundary of the local authority.

Case stated by justices.

The appellants were the local authority for the borough of Hornsey, and the respondents were the owners within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, of the premises adjoining and abutting on the footpath on the north side of the Birbeck-road. The Birbeck-road is a highway not repairable by the inhabitants at large, and it runs east and west. The boundary between the appellant's borough and the urban district of Friern Barnet was along the line of the kerb of the footpath on the north side of the Birbeck-road, so that the carriage-way and the footpath on the south side are in the appellant's borough, and the footpath on the north side is outside the appellant's borough and within the urban district of Friern Barnet.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In July, 1903, the appellants, purporting to act under the Public Health Act, 1875, served notice on the respondents, inter alia, requiring them to level, pave, metal, and flag, and make good the part of the Birbeck-road within the appellant's borough, and on their failing to do so carried out the work themselves and endeavoured to recover the apportioned cost from the respondents. About the same time the urban district council of Friern Barnet served notice on the respondents with regard to the footpath on the north side of the Birbeck-road, and executed the necessary works.

The respondents paid the amount apportioned on them in respect of those works, but refused to pay the amount apportioned on them by the appellants in respect of works in those parts of the Birbeck-road which lay within the appellants' borough, on the ground that their property lay outside the appellants' borough and was not under any liability for the maintenance of the road within the borough. There are soil and surface-water sewers running through that part of the Birbeck-road which is within the borough of Hornsey. These sewers form part of the main drainage system of that borough and are vested in the appellants. The houses on the south side of the road drain into those sewers, but the houses on the north side drain into a sewer running along that part of the road which is within the Friern Barnet urban district, and which has been recently constructed by the district council at the request and the cost of the owners of premises on the north side of the road. The justices dismissed the complaint but stated this case.

By the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 150: "Where any street (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large), or the carriage-way, footway, or other part of such street is not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, and made good . . . to the satisfaction of the urban authority, such authority may, by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, or channelled . . . require them to sewer, level, pave, metal, channel, or make good . . . the same within a time to be specified in such notice. . . . If such notice is not complied with, the urban authority may, if they think fit, execute the works mentioned . . . therein, and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default.

Macmorran, K.C. (A. F. Jenkin with him), for the appellants.—These premises abut on the road, and it makes no difference that they are outside the district of the particular local authority.

He cited Wakefield Local Board v. Lee, 1 Ex. D. 336, 25 W. R. Dig. 224; London County Council v. Collins, 3 Knight's Local Government Reports 1103.

A. Glen, K.C. (Naldrett with him), for the respondents.—A local authority cannot assess property outside the limits of the local jurisdiction. The respondents have no voice in deciding what is to be spent on the road. Special provision is made in the Public Health Acts whenever it is contended that one local authority shall charge another outside its own district (sections 48 and 191 of the Act of 1875; Act of 1878, ss. 16, 21, and 22).

He cited Reg. v. Warner, 27 L. J. M. C. 144; Withington Local Board v. Corporation of Manchester, 1 E. & E. 203.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion this appeal fails. There are two or three broad considerations which guide us as to the meaning of the section. Primâ facie the powers and authorities of these statutory bodies are to be exercised within their own district. No doubt by express enactment or by necessary implication they may be given powers outside their districts, but the question is whether or not in this case the language is so plain that we ought to hold that, either by express enactment or reasonable implication, this authority had power to charge people outside its own district. No doubt there is some ground for saying that roads are made up largely for the benefit of people who live by the side of them. The Legislature has recognized that by requiring the making up of the roads not to be thrown as a burden upon the general body of ratepayers, but upon the particular individuals. To a certain extent that is qualified by the exception of the highways repairable by the inhabitants at large, but it still leaves the section with regard to all the other roads in full force. When the street is in a condition which is not to the satisfaction in certain respects of the local authority they may, by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting on or adjoining or abutting on the road, require them to sewer, level, &c., within the time specified. Now, if that means individuals independently of the district in which their premises are situate, the contention of the appellants is right. But in my opinion there are other words which to a certain extent qualify that proposition. In the first place, the urban authority may do the work themselves and may recover the apportionment, which is to be settled by their surveyor, from the frontagers. Then the urban authority may by order declare the expenses so incurred to be private improvement expenses. These matters seem to me to be entirely in favour of the view that the local authority are dealing entirely with matters within their own district. If it were otherwise I do not quite see why the surveyor of the other district should have no share in the apportionment of the expenses.

So as to improvement expenses, the authority which is to take the necessary steps for recovering improvement expenses is the authority by whom the work has been done. So again, the plans are to be deposited in the office of the urban authority which does the work. To a certain extent that point might be met by the fact that notice is to be given to the frontagers, but still at the same time it supports the view that the section deals with things which are to be done within the district. Therefore, inasmuch as it lies upon the appellants to establish the right of the urban authority to charge people outside their own district, the language of the section is not, in my judgment, sufficient to give them this power by necessary implication, and it certainly does not do so by express enactment. I am a good deal impressed by the principle of the previous cases and the argument upon the other parts of this statute. With regard to Reg. v. Warner, the decision in that case, although it turned no doubt on the proviso to the section there in question, does indicate the broad principle that one district could not tax or charge the inhabitants of another. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the appellants have failed to satisfy us that they have a statutory power, either expressed or implied, to tax the inhabitants of Friern Barnet, and this appeal must therefore be dismissed.

RIDLEY and DARLING, JJ., agreed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, L. J. Tatham.

Solicitors for the respondents, Rubinstein & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) March 6.

REX v. SOUTHAMPTON JUSTICES.
Ex parte FULLER, SMITH, & TURNER. (a.)

Licensing law—County borough—Licence—Renewal—Compensation authority—Refusal to renew licence—Appeal to quarter sessions of county—Licensing Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 23), s. 8 (2).

The refusal by justices of a county borough, acting as the compensation authority under the Licensing Act, 1904, to renew a licence subject to the payment of compensation is final, and no appeal therefore will lie from their decision to the quarter sessions of the county under section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828.

Mandamus to justices of the county of Southampton to hear an appeal.

On the 21st of February, 1905, Edward Donkin, who was the licensed occupier of the York Inn, Southampton, of which Messrs. Fuller, Smith, & Turner, brewers, of Chiswick, were the owners, received a notice of objection to the renewal of his licence upon the ground that the licence was not required in the neighbourhood.

On the 2nd of March, 1905, he attended at the general annual licensing meeting held for the county borough and applied for the renewal of his licence. That application was referred to the whole body of justices acting in and for the county borough as the compensation authority. On the 25th of May, 1905, the compensation authority refused to renew, subject to payment of compensation. From this refusal Donkin and Fuller, Smith, & Turner appealed to quarter sessions for the county.

On the 27th of June, 1905, the quarter sessions refused to hear the appeal, on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to entertain it, whereupon the present rule was obtained at the instance of Fuller, Smith, & Turner.

Duke, K.C., and J. A. Simon showed cause.—Prior to the Licensing Act of 1904 the question of renewing licences was determined in boroughs by the whole body of the justices acting for the borough, and an appeal from their refusal to renew was given to quarter sessions of the county by section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828. By section 8 of the Act of 1904 the decision of the whole body of justices in a county borough is substituted for that of quarter sessions. It is therefore final. The county borough raises its own fund out of which compensation for extinquished licences is paid, and it was the intention of the Legislature that boroughs should have entire control of the way that fund was to be applied. In this particular respect the county borough was placed on the same footing as the county. This change does not affect the right of appeal from the refusal by the borough justices to renew on some ground other than "redundancy."

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pickford, K.C. (S. H. Emmanuel and H. Brodrick with him), in support of the rule.—If the appeal which previously existed under the Act of 1828, and which still exists as to other matters, is taken away in the case of a refusal to renew with compensation, it must be taken away either expressly or by necessary implication. But there is no provision in the new Act which abrogates the right of appeal either expressly or by implication. Although section 27 of the Act of 1828 gives a right of appeal to quarter sessions only to a person aggrieved by an act of a justice "done in or concerning the execution of this Act," nevertheless by section 10 of the Act of 1904, that Act is to be "construed as one with the Licensing Acts, 1828 to 1904," so that the words "this Act" in section 27 of the earlier Act must be read as including the Licensing Act of 1904. Section 8 of the new Act in substituting the whole body of justices in a county borough for the quarter sessions substituted a body from which an appeal would lie. It does not say that the whole body of justices shall be deemed to be for this purpose the quarter sessions. If the right to appeal is gone, the only way in which the correctness of the justices' decision in point of law can be questioned, is gone too, because they are not a court and have no power to state a special case: Boulter v. Kent Justices, 46 W. R. 114, [1897] A. C. 556. The Act of 1904 does not expressly take away this right of appeal, and to so hold would be to render the Act inconsistent with its own provisions.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. Before 1904 there existed a right of appeal to the quarter sessions from a refusal by the licensing authority of a county borough to renew a licence, the licensing authority for the purpose being the whole body of justices for the borough. The question is whether that right of appeal is taken away by the Act of 1904 so far as a refusal upon the ground that the licence is unnecessary. The broad scope of the Act of 1904 was to limit the ordinary jurisdiction of the licensing authority, who were to have the power to refuse the renewal of a licence only on certain specified grounds, the power to refuse a renewal upon any other ground being vested in the quarter sessions instead of in the justices of the licensing district. In other words, the Act conferred upon quarter sessions a new jurisdiction, not an appellate jurisdiction, but an original jurisdiction—namely, the right to refuse the renewal of a licence upon other grounds than those mentioned in the early part of section 1. A new jurisdiction was then given to the licensing justices of the district; they were to form an opinion on the question of the renewal of licences upon other grounds and make a report to quarter sessions, by whom, if considered expedient, the renewal might be refused. With regard to counties the enactment is pretty clear, and its broad feature is the new jurisdiction conferred upon the quarter sessions, who were once and for all to deal with the question of renewal, the preliminary condition being that these should have the report before them made by the justices of the licensing district. In working out the machinery to carry out that broad intention it is not unimportant to consider certain of the provisions of section 5 of the Act, from which it appears that not only was there a departure from the old appellate jurisdiction, but a power given to quarter sessions to delegate to a committee the discharge of some of their duties. In the same section—section 5—a clause was inserted that "the justices of a licensing district being a county borough shall exercise their powers under the Licensing Acts, 1828 to 1902, as to the renewal of licences through the borough licensing committee appointed under section 38 of the Licensing Act, 1872." So far, therefore, the Act proceeded to deal with counties and county boroughs on parallel lines. Reports had to be made by the justices of a licensing district in a county and by the licensing committee in a county borough. Then comes the section upon which the question in the case turns—section 8, sub-section 2—which is as follows: "This Act shall apply to a county borough as if it were a county, with the substitution for quarter sessions of the whole body of justices acting in and for the borough." And section 5 (4) provides that the "justices of the licensing district" upon whose reference and report the whole body of the borough justices are to act, shall in the case of a county borough mean the "borough licensing committee." That is what may be called a drafting clause, because it is doubtful whether it is always possible in reading the Act as a whole to substitute the whole body of justices for the quarter sessions; it is, therefore necessary to look at the broad scope of the enactment to see what is its intention. It seems to me that the intention was to substitute in a county borough the whole body of justices to perform the functions performed by quarter sessions in a county. That makes the scheme of the Act consistent. In each case—in the county and in the county borough—there is the consideration of the question by a superior body which is no longer an appellate body. I agree that, looking at the state of things before 1904, the Act of that year might well have been more clearly drafted. But looking at its general scope, the construction I am giving to it is the only one consistent with its purpose. As I have said, the intention was to put county boroughs in the same position as counties for the purpose of finally determining as to whether a renewal upon grounds other than the four mentioned in section 1 should be refused. That view is not inconsistant with other provisions of the Act which point to the question being dealt with locally, and it would be a departure from that principle if we were to hold in this matter an appeal lay from the whole body of justices in a county borough to the quarter sessions.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I consider that it is more in accordance with the scheme of the Act of 1904 that there should be no appeal in such a case as the one we are considering. I agree with my lord in thinking that although the Act does not expressly take away the right of appeal given by section 27 of the Act of 1828, its general effect is to render such a right of appeal inconsistent with its own provisions.

DARLING, J.—I agree. This Act of Parliament starts, and for some way continues, as though it dealt with counties only, and provides that in the class of cases with which it was intended to deal the question of the renewal of licences should be referred by the justices of the licensing district to the quarter sessions of the county for decision. To this end the county was treated as excluding county boroughs, although it includes boroughs which are not county boroughs. Then by section 8 (2) it confers upon the whole body of justices in a county borough the same jurisdiction to decide questions of renewal as it confers upon quarter sessions in a county, and in my opinion it was intended to make the decisions of both bodies equally final. It was argued that whereas in the case of a county the quarter sessions have power to state a special case, in a county borough the justices, sitting as a licensing body, have no such power, and therefore the right of appeal on a question of law must be still existing against the decision of justices of a county borough. Though it is perhaps not necessary for me to decide that point, I may say I disagree with that contention. I think that the borough justices would have power to state a case. I think the intention of the Legislature was that they should, within the county borough, have the same powers as those the quarter sessions have within the county.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for the prosecutors, Godden, Son, & Holme, for Lamport, Bassitt, & Hiscock, Southampton.

Solictors for the justices, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for H. Barber, Winchester.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) — Feb. 14.

TOZELAND v. WEST HAM UNION. (a.)

Poor law — Guardians — Liability for negligence of servant to pauper inmate—Common employment.

The plaintiff, who was an inmate of the union workhouse belonging to the defendants, was ordered by the labour master to assist in an enlargement of the electric light installation which was being carried out under the order of their engineer, who was a permanent official of the workhouse. In the course of the work the plaintiff went on to some staging which collapsed, owing to its improper construction, and the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and sustained severe injuries. It was admitted that the engineer was responsible for the staging.

Held, that the plaintiff was not prevented by the doctrine of common employment from recovering, as he was bound to do the work, and had not voluntarily undertaken its risks.

Held, further, that the action was maintainable as the work was not being carried out by the defendants in the discharge of their administrative duties.

Appeal from the judge of the Bow County Court.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the negligence of the defendants' servants.

The facts of the case are as follows:

The plaintiff became an inmate of the West Ham Workhouse on the 19th of July, 1904, and was at first employed in the bakery and afterwards in gardening work. On the 28th of September, 1904, the installation of the electric light was being enlarged, and the assistant electrician, by name Byers, applied to the labour master for increased assistance, and the plaintiff was allotted to him for that purpose.

In the course of the work, the plaintiff, acting under Byers's orders, went upon a staging consisting of a scaffold-board, one end of which rested upon a pair of steps and the other upon one of the rungs of the ladder. The staging collapsed and the plaintiff received severe injuries, resulting in the amputation of his right leg. It was admitted that Baird, the engineer of the West Ham Infirmary, was responsible for the staging.

The county court judge found the staging was insecure and that Baird had been guilty of negligence, but he held that the doctrine of common employment applied and that the plaintiff was therefore prevented from recovering; he gave judgment for the defendants without costs, but assessed the damages at £100 in the event of the plaintiff being held entitled to recover.

The plaintiff appealed.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

R. Wallace, K.C., Abinger, and Angus Campbell, for the appellant.

Avory, K.C., and Stephen Lynch, for the respondents.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Upon the main question upon which the learned judge decided this case I have felt no doubt. His view, which is crisply and clearly put, is that the case should be decided upon the assumption that the plaintiff was a servant of the defendants, giving his services in return for board and lodging; and that in the circumstances of the case the defence of common employment afforded an answer to the action. With great respect for the opinion of the learned judge I am unable to take that view, which seems to overlook the broad consideration lying at the root of the doctrine of common employment, that the servant has the option of entering, or refusing to enter, into a contract of employment. It was conceded during the argument that the plaintiff was doing labour which he was compelled to do under the Poor Law Acts affecting the management of workhouses, and that a refusal on his part would or might have entailed penalties; it is only necessary to refer to 55 Geo. 3, c. 137, s. 5; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 58; and 34 & 35 Vict. c. 108, s. 7, all which provide for penalties or punishments for refusal to do the prescribed work. We ought not to hesitate to apply the doctrine of common employment, if that defence has not been taken away by statutory enactment, and if the facts justify it, but it is essential to see the basis upon which that doctrine rests. That may be collected from a series of cases, to which I need only refer very shortly, in which the doctrine has been discussed. In Priestly v. Fowler, 3 M. & W. 1, at p. 6, Lord Abinger, C.B., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "The servant is not bound to risk his safety in the service of his master, and may, if he thinks fit, decline any service in which he reasonably apprehends injury to himself; and in most of the cases in which danger may be incurred, if not all, he is just as likely to be acquainted with the probability and extent of it as the master."

In Hutchinson v. York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Co., 5 Ex. 343, at p. 352, Alderson, B., laid down the principle thus: "The principle is that a servant, when he engages to serve a master, undertakes as between him and his master to run all the ordinary risks of the service, and this includes the risk of negligence on the part of a fellow servant whenever he is acting in discharge of his duty as servant of him who is the common master of both."

Lord Cairns, in Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 326, at p. 332, puts it thus: "At all events, a servant may choose for himself between serving a master who does, and a master who does not, attend in person to his business. But what the master is, in my opinion, bound to his servant to do, in the event of his not personally superintending and directing the work, is to select proper and competent persons to do so, and to furnish them with adequate materials and resources for the work. When he has done this he has, in my opinion, done all that he is bound to do." In all these leading cases, therefore, the doctrine of common employment is based upon the consent of the servant to enter into the particular employment. The doctrine might, I think, apply to the case of a servant who consented to enter an employment which involved work of a miscellaneous character. But there must be something in the nature of a voluntary bargain on the part of the servant to run the risks of the employment, and not merely the doing of work by compulsion of law. Smith v. Steele, L. R. 10 Q. B. 125, is a more recent illustration of the principle; it is not an authority in the present case, for it must not be forgotten that in that case the particular workman, a pilot, was bound, under severe penalties, to go and perform the particular service; it was not a case of what I may call a general, but of a particular, compulsion.

The defendants' counsel met the difficulty by contending that the plaintiff need not have gone into the workhouse, and that he went in on the terms that he would give his labour in return for his sustenance. But I cannot agree with his contention that the language of the Act of Parliament shows that to be the basis of the relations between a pauper and the guardians. When a pauper goes into the workhouse he does not know what work he may be called upon to perform, and it seems to me an unjustifiable extension of the doctrine of common employment to say that for a man to go in a starving condition into the workhouse is equivalent to a contract on his part to do any work that he may be ordered to do as though he were a servant who could refuse to do it. The option or choice which the servant has to exercise must be an option or choice with reference to the work, and I cannot think that we are at liberty to disregard the compulsion of hunger, which drives a man into the workhouse, and to say that under such circumstances a man goes into it voluntarily in the sense in which a servant voluntarily enters an employment.

But the other question which was argued before us, that of the liability of poor law guardians for the negligence of their subordinate officers, presents to my mind a more serious difficulty, which has not been wholly removed during the arguments; the balance, however, of the reasoning leads me to the conclusion that the guardians are responsible. It is difficult in such cases to apply to public bodies who act by agents the ordinary rule of law as to the liability of a principal for the acts or omissions of an agent. From the decisions it seems that in some cases that rule ought to be applied, in others that it ought not, and the difficulty here is to decide whether the facts bring the case within the rule or not. Of the cases in which the rule ought to be applied Levingston v. Lurgan Guardians, Ir. R. 2 C. L. 202, and Southampton and Itchen Bridge Co. v. Southampton Local Board, 8 E. & B. 801, afford good illustrations. In general terms, the result of them is that if a public body is doing by their agents work connected with their ordinary ministerial or administrative duties, that body will be liable for injury resulting from the commission of a negligent act on the part of a subordinate. On the other hand there are cases of which Breman v. Limerick Guardians, 2 L. R. Ir. 42, is an example, where it has been held that, if the injury arises from the negligence or omission of a subordinate to comply with his instructions, he being a proper person for the post which he was appointed to fill, no action will lie against a public body such as a board of guardians. If in the present case there had been merely a breach by the labour master of his duties as labour master, or a breach of the instructions given by him, I should have felt great doubt whether the defendants were liable. The difficulty is to decide within which of the two classes of cases to which I have referred the present case falls, and that decision can only be arrived at upon a consideration of the particular facts of the case. Shortly put, the facts are, that the defendants decided to extend the electric light installation at the workhouse; they did not engage a contractor for the work, but did it themselves by their own servants, who in the course of the work erected this platform. By direction of the labour master the plaintiff was told to go and assist in the work, part of which consisted in holding up pipes against the wall while standing on the platform; there was no improper act of the labour master in giving the direction, for he was merely finding work for the plaintiff as a pauper. The accident arose from the negligence of another employee who had improperly constructed the platform, or had allowed it to be improperly constructed, so that it was negligence in the ordinary sense of the word to allow the plaintiff to go upon it. These facts bring the case, in my opinion, within the class of case in which the guardians, having work to do as guardians, do it under circumstances in which a person to whom they owe a duty would have a right of action against them if injured through the negligence of a servant acting on their behalf. I have therefore come, though with considerable hesitation, to the conclusion that this action can be maintained.

I only desire to add, with regard to the argument on behalf of the defendants, that I must not be supposed to agree with the view that the distinction drawn between a servant and a volunteer is an exhaustive distinction. I think there may be cases of servants who would be entitled to recover in such an action, notwithstanding that others might be prevented from recovering by the operation of the doctrine of common employment, and similarly that some volunteers might maintain an action, although other volunteers would be debarred from recovering on the ground that they had merely interfered in the performance of a particular piece of work in which they had no interest and over which they had no control.

For the reasons I have given, I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £100, the amount at which the damages were provisionally assessed by the learned county court judge.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree on both points with the judgment of my lord. I do not think that the doctrine of common employment affords a defence to the action. The case is one in which the plaintiff was necessarily subject to the orders which might be given to him by the defendants' servants, and it was in doing work which he was ordered to do, and could not refuse to do, that he met with the accident. In the judgment in Priestley v. Fowler there are phrases used which have been already cited by my lord, and which seem to place great stress on the question whether the risk of the employment had been undertaken by the servant of his own free will, and the root of the principle underlying the doctrine of common employment is plainly shown to be that the servant has taken upon himself the risk of the negligence of his fellow servants in the course of their employment. The same principle is also clearly laid down in the passage cited by my lord from the judgment in Hutchinson v. York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Co., which shows that the court was there dealing with a case where the servant had the option of refusing to enter the employment or of undertaking the particular work, and where, knowing the risks as well as his master knew them, he deliberately decided to run these risks. If we want an instance of a case where the facts are all the other way, one need look no farther than the present one, that of the workhouse pauper, who had no option of doing or refusing to do the work ordered; it is not open to him to say that he knows the risks of the employment and declines to take them upon himself. That being so, it seems to me that the argument on which so much reliance has been placed—namely, the doctrine of common employment, furnishes no defence to this action. Then it was contended that the plaintiff was only a volunteer, and in one sense that is true; he was a volunteer in so far as he got into the workhouse by his own voluntary act, but he was not a volunteer as to the work which he should do as an inmate, and the application of the doctrine of common employment must depend upon his voluntary consent to do that work; the doctrine cannot apply merely because at an antecedent period he voluntarily entered the workhouse.

It was further contended substantially that the action was against public policy, and that such an action was not maintainable against poor law guardians. No doubt there are limits to the liability of public officers in actions of tort; but the general rule, as applied in Southampton and Itchen Bridge Co. v. Southampton Local Board, is that they may be liable for negligence. The case of Brennan v. Limerick Guardians, where the alleged negligence was in not providing proper attendance on a patient in a fever hospital, is not binding on us, and is clearly not on all fours with the present case. Nor do I agree with the contention that the principle of that decision should be extended. The present case is more akin to Levingston v. Lurgan Guardians, in which an action was held to be maintainable against guardians for making a sewer and discharging sewage from the workhouse into a stream, to the use of which the plaintiff was entitled. I can see no reason of public policy why guardians should not be liable in an action of negligence; but I think that good reasons may be found why they should be.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Dealing first with the question whether guardians of the poor can be made liable in an action of negligence, I must confess that it seems to me one of very considerable difficulty; that difficulty I feel equally with my lord, and I have come to the same conclusion at which he has arrived. I think that the rule of law is to be ascertained from the judgment in Levinston v. Lurgan Guardians, where Whiteside, C.J., says: "Upon the ultimate decisions in these two cases, Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, L. R. 1 H. L. 93, and Coe v. Wise, L. R. 1 Q. B. 711, it must, I think, be now taken as established—first, that unless the provisions of the Legislature, by express enactment or necessary implication, otherwise determine an action for such a wrong as that which is the subject of the present suit lies against a corporation, or public trustees acting gratuitously for public purposes; secondly, that they are not exempted by the Legislature from this liability because the legislative provisions which regulate them do not provide funds out of which the damages recovered against them in an action against them can be paid." It is true that in that case the injury to the plaintiff had been caused by the making of a sewer by the guardians, and that there is, of course, upon the facts, a broad distinction between that case and the present.

Then came the case of Brennan v. Limerick Guardians, in which the judgment of the court was delivered by Fitzgerald, J., who says: "The reasons I have expressed are sufficient to sustain our judgment, and are concurred in by my brethren; but I desire, further, to state my own impression that on other and wider grounds the action is not maintainable." Apparently, therefore, the grounds which the learned judge goes on to mention did not altogether commend themselves to the other members of the court, and it is these grounds (and it is this which I particularly wish to point out) which form the strongest part of the argument against the plaintiff in the present case. The learned judge proceeds thus: "If the present action can be maintained, why should not an action lie against the guardians at suit of each pauper for every supposed neglect of administrative duty causing to the individual any real or fancied grievance? For example, for supplying food insufficient in quantity, or inferior in quality, or insufficient or inferior clothing or bedding, defective sanitary arrangement, or any other of the various neglects or omissions by which inmates of a workhouse may be prejudicially affected. If the real or supposed omissions of guardians are to be thus redressed, it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to administer the laws for relief of the destitute poor." It is to be noticed at this point that all the instances which are put by Fitzgerald, J., are strictly confined to cases of omission to perform certain statutory duties. In the earlier part of the judgment, with which the other members of the court agreed, he says: "We are of opinion that the plaint is bad in substance, in not stating any duty which the statute law imposed on the defendants; and on the contrary alleging a duty which the law did not impose on them, and resting the supposed right of action on a breach of that duty." And further on he says: "Their duty was to take order for the relief of the poor according to the orders, general or special, of of the poor law commissioners . . . The action might as properly be brought against the commissioners as against the guardians." Looking at the present case, can anybody say that this action might as properly be brought against the modern equivalent of the commissioners—that is, against the Local Government Board, as against the guardians? It seems impossible to me to so contend. The complaint here is not that the doing of an act imposed upon the defendants by statute or by the Local Government Board led to the plaintiff's injury. The defendants were extending the existing installation of electric light in the workhouse, they were at liberty to employ a contractor for that purpose, but they preferred to use the inmates to do it. I do not suggest that there was anything improper in doing so; on the contrary, I think it was a reasonable course to take. They had the power to order the inmates to perform certain kinds of labour which they (the guardians) might select, and they ordered the plaintiff to assist a person who was putting in this electric light installation; in the doing of the work that other person did something which the learned judge finds to have been negligent, the direct result of which was the injury to the plaintiff. In my opinion this case is quite distinguishable from Brennan v. Limerick Guardians, and has a much greater resemblance to Levingston v. Lurgan Guardians, in which the action was held to be maintainable. With considerable hesitation, therefore, I think that this action will lie against the guardians.

Then comes the point upon which the learned county court judge decided this case in favour of the defendants. He held that the plaintiff must be regarded as a fellow-workman of the man who was negligent, and that, therefore, the doctrine of common employment applied to prevent his maintaining this action. I do not think that this was the correct view, for a reason which is, I think, somewhat different from that given by the other members of this court, and which at any rate I would prefer to express in my own language. In my opinion the doctrine of common employment is based upon the existence of a contract between the servant and the employer; if the servant is in a position to choose whether he will or will not run the risk, then (and this is the foundation of the argument) the doctrine volenti non fit injuria applies. But a pauper is not in a position to choose whether he will run the risk, or to choose what sort of labour the guardians shall put him to. At the most, when he is ordered to do some particular task, he can say, "My poverty, but not my will, consents." In that way, therefore, I think that the doctrine volenti non fit injuria cannot apply to the case of a pauper employed upon a workhouse task, and the very foundation of the doctrine of common employment fails; there is no common employment, for there is no contract with the guardians at all.

If that is so, there is only one way in which the defendants can hope to escape from the position, and that was taken by their counsel when he put forward the argument that the plaintiff had entered the workhouse willingly. That really amounts almost to setting up the doctrine of the contrat social of Rousseau, that all the rights, all the obligations, and all the disabilities of all the inhabitants of the world were regulated by an implied contract to which everyone was a party. If that theory could be supported, no doubt there would be a contract between the plaintiff and his fellow-paupers and the guardians. But that doctrine has for long been discredited, and I think that in the absence of an actual contract, express or necessarily implied, between the pauper and the guardians the doctrine of common employment has no application to the present case, and that there must be judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Philbrick & Co., for Haynes, Robinson, & Co., Bow.

Solicitor for defendants, Hillearys.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Swinfen Eady, J. — May 10.

In re WALLIS AND GROUT'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Title—Recital twenty years old—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), ss. 1, 2.

In 1906 a vendor made an open contract to sell a freehold house. The abstract commenced with a conveyance dated June, 1882, which recited a mortgage dated May, 1878, and contained an acknowledgment of the right to production of deeds set out in a schedule. The first deed was dated the 31*st of August*, 1877.

Held, that the purchaser was entitled to a forty years' title.

Bolton v. London School Board, 26 W. R. 549, considered.

Originating summons.

This was a vendor and purchaser summons by the purchaser for an order that the purchaser was entitled to delivery by the vendor at her own expense of an abstract of the vendor's title to real estate for a period of forty years immediately prior to the contract.

On the 23rd of January, 1906, the vendor, Margaret Wallis, made an open contract to sell a freehold house to the purchaser for £260.

The abstract of the title commenced with a conveyance by a mortgagee and mortgagor to Charles Wallis on the 2nd of June, 1882.

This conveyance recited that by an indenture dated the 9th of May, 1878, made between the mortgagor, D. T. Baker, and the mortgagee, of "the hereditaments hereinafter described and intended to be hereby conveyed were with other hereditaments granted unto and to the use of the mortgagee, his heirs and assigns, for ever, for the purpose of securing the repayment to the mortgagee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, of the sum of £700 and interest thereon as therein mentioned."

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The mortgagor gave an acknowledgment of the right of the purchaser Charles Wallis to production, and an undertaking for safe custody of the following documents mentioned in a schedule:

Conveyance of the 31st of August, 1877, Pritchett to the mortgagor.

A mortgage of the 24th of June, 1878, between the mortgagor of the first part, Paterson and Burn of the second part, and J. Faulding, W. F. Faulding, and A. J. Faulding of the third part.

A release of the 27th of May, 1882, between J. Faulding, W. F. Faulding, and A. J. Faulding of the one part, and the mortgagor of the other part.

The recited mortgage of the 9th of May, 1878.

The mortgagee acknowledged the right of the purchaser to production of the recited mortgage of the 9th of May, 1878.

The vendor, Margaret Wallis, was the widow and sole executrix of Charles Wallis, who died on the 15th of May, 1905. The freehold house in question was devised to her.

Crossfield, for the purchaser.

J. G. Wood, for the vendor.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The contract was an open contract, and the abstract began in 1882. [He referred to the conveyance and the schedule.] The vendor refused to deduce a title before 1882. Why is the purchaser not entitled to see the deeds mentioned in the schedule, which relate to dealings with the property? The case of Bolton v. London School Board, 26 W. R. 549, 7 Ch. D. 766, did not apply. Even if this case were the same as Bolton v. London School Board, I should have grave difficulty in following it. According to the language of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, ss. 1, 2, the vendor was bound to furnish a forty years' title. [He referred to Williams on Vendors and Purchasers, vol. 1, p. 109n.] The order will be that the purchaser offering to accept a title commencing with the deed of the 31st of August, 1877, the vendor is entitled to an abstract of such title.

Solicitors, William Moryan Lloyd; Pettitt & Valentine.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } May 10.

In re PERTH ELECTRIC TRAMWAYS (LIMITED). LYONS v. TRAMWAYS SYNDICATE (LIMITED). (a.) Company—Debentures—Issue—Deposit of blank debentures to secure loan.

A company borrowed money on the security of debenture bonds. The bonds were signed and sealed and left blank as to the date and name and were deposited with a bank. The loan was paid off and the debentures returned.

Held, that the transaction with the bank amounted to an issue, and that the company were not in a position to re-issue the debentures.

Special case.

The Perth Electric Tramways (Limited) had by a trust deed assigned property to trustees to secure 500 debentures of £100 each.

The directors passed a resolution to borrow £2,000 on the security of twenty-one debentures. Such debentures were signed and sealed and deposited with the company's bankers, the Union Bank of Scotland. The debentures were in blank, i.e. without any name or date, and they were not registered in the name of the bank.

The debentures were in the form set out in the schedule to the trust deed. Each debenture was to be under seal and to be issued to a person to be specified therein as a creditor for £100, and as the person to whom or to other the registered holder thereof payment was to be made by the company. The names, addresses, and descriptions of the registered holders were to be entered in a register which was to be kept by the company.

The loan was paid off and the twenty-one debentures were returned to the company.

The company subsequently issued six of the debentures to the defendant syndicate, filling in the name and date, but without re-sealing, and the syndicate was registered as holder. The syndicate had no notice of any prior dealing.

The company proposed to issue the other fifteen debentures.

The question was now raised whether the transaction with the bank amounted to an issue so that the twenty-one debentures were spent and could not be re-issued.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Sargant, for the plaintiff, the registered holder of a valid debenture.

Percy Wheeler, for the company.

The syndicate joined in the special case, but did not appear at the hearing.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said that no separate point was raised as to the six debentures held by the syndicate, and the real question was whether the company have power to issue any of the twenty-one at the present time. The company claimed that these debentures never were issued to the bank, but that the first issue as to the six was to the syndicate, whilst the remaining fifteen had up to the present time never been issued at all, and could, therefore, now be issued by the company. The short point to be determined on the special case was whether the transaction with the bank amounted to an issue so that twenty-one debentures were spent and could not now be re-issued. Now it was pointed out by Chitty, J., in Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co., 36 W. R. 411, 37 Ch. D. 260, that "'issued' is not a technical term; it is a mercantile term well understood." I will consider what the position of the bank was. There was a resolution of the directors to borrow on the security of second debenture bonds, and then the twenty-one bonds in question were signed and sealed and left blank as to date and name, and these twenty-one sealed pieces of paper were deposited in the bank. In my opinion that gave the bank an equitable charge. There was an agreement that they should have a charge, and in equity they had a charge on these bonds. If the bank had not been repaid and the company had gone into liquidation the bank would have been entitled to prove and to receive the full amount. They had a valid equitable charge on these debentures, and, in the language of Stirling, L.J., in In re Tasker & Sons, 54 W. R. 65, [1905] 2 Ch. 598, "If no payment had been made to" [substituting in the present case "the bank"], "and the debentures had remained in their hands, they would have been entitled to prove in the action and to receive dividends on the full nominal amount of the debentures in their hands pari passu with the other debenture-holders until they received in full the principal and interest due to them. This right was established by the Court of Appeal in In re Regent's Canal Ironworks Co, 24 W. R. 687,

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

3 Ch. D. 43. It was there decided that a company may issue or deposit debentures by way of collateral security for money lent, and that the holders of other debentures of the same issue have no equity to prevent such a bargain from being carried into effect." If they might so deposit debentures validly issued, they might equally agree to deposit them, and in In re Strand Music Hall Co., 14 W. R. 6, 3 De G. J. & S. 147, showed that effect might be given to such an agreement. As Buckley, J., said in In re Geo. Routledge & Sons, 53 W. R. 44, [1904] 2 Ch. 480: "If there is a contract that a person is to have a loan on the terms that the lender is to have a binding security, and he does not get that which he contracted to have, he has the right to be placed in the same position as if he had got it." In other words, there was a contract here giving these debentures as a security—a valid contract to issue debentures, and that, in the contemplation of equity, amounted to an issue. The debentures had now served their purpose as a security for the loan, which has run its course. Under these circumstances the transaction with the bank amounted to an issue, and as the company had no power to re-issue debentures which had once been issued, they were not in a position to re-issue any of the twenty-one debentures, and the six debentures issued to the syndicate had not been validly issued. This followed the decisions in In re Geo. Routledge & Sons, In re W. Tasker & Sons, and In re Strand Music Hall Co.

Solicitors, Burn & Berridge.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } May 3.

In re CORSELLIS.
FREEBORN v. NAPPER. (a.)

Will—Illegitimate testator—Gift to "all my nephews and nieces"—Some named—Gift to "my brother A. and my sisters B., C., D., and E."—Children of unnamed sister.

An illegitimate testator left the residue of his property, subject to his wife's life estate, in trust for his brother A. and his sisters B., C., D., and E., the income of A.'s share to be paid to him for life, and on his death, in the events that happened, the principal to go "equally amongst all my nephews and nieces then living." Like provision with regard to D.'s share. There being amongst others also reputed nephews and nieces by a reputed sister of the testator who was not mentioned in the will, it was Held, applying Hill v. Crook, 22 W. R. 137, 6 H. L. 265, that, in the absence of legitimate brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces, all the reputed nephews and nieces took, although some reputed brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces only had been mentioned in the will.

Originating summons.

This was a summons to determine certain questions arising under the will of Henry Joseph Corsellis.

By his will, dated the 9th of January, 1872, the testator, who was illegitimate, after giving certain legacies, left his residue in trust for his wife for life, and after her death in trust for his brother Charles, and his sisters Frances, Emily, Caroline and Eliza. The income of Charles' share was to paid to him for life, and at his death the principal was to be divided, subject to a power of appointment by the wife, which was not exercised, "equally amongst all my nephews and nieces then living." (This was construed as "living at the death of Charles.") Similar directions were given as to his sister Caroline's share.

The testator died on the 7th of August, 1873; Caroline died on the 24th of April, 1874, and Charles died on the 1st of January, 1876. The testator's wife died on the 22nd of April, 1905.

Besides the reputed brother Charles and the reputed sisters mentioned in the will by name (as above) the testator had another reputed brother who was referred to by name elsewhere in the will and also another reputed sister Mary. Mary had died in 1853, long before the date of the will, leaving issue, but neither she nor her children were mentioned in the will.

This summons was taken out by the present trustee to determine (inter alia) whether Mary's children were included in the gift to "all my nephews and nieces," and were thus entitled to participate with the children of the named sisters of the testator in the shares of Charles and Caroline Corsellis.

L. H. Elphinstone, for the trustee.

T. L. Wilkinson, for persons claiming under the children of Frances, contended that the gift was confined to the reputed nephews and nieces mentioned in the will and the children of the reputed brothers and sisters therein named.

He cited Seale-Hayne v. Jodrell, [1891] A. C. 304, 40 W. R. Dig. 284.

Peterson, for persons similarly interested, argued on the same lines, and cited Meredith v. Farr, 2 Y. & C. C. C. 525.

Manning, for persons claiming under Mary's children, contended that all the reputed nephews and nieces took, and cited In re Deakin, 43 W. R. 70, [1894] 3 Ch. D. 565, and In re Wood, 50 W. R. 695, [1902] 2 Ch. D. 542.

Vaughan Hawkins and Cavanagh, for other parties.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The question I have to decide is who is to participate under the description "all my nephews and nieces" in the shares of Charles and Caroline Corsellis. Under the circumstances of this case the testator had not, and could not have, any legitimate nephews and nieces—his father and mother never having married. It is undisputed that the testator and his brothers and sisters had lived together as one family as if their parents had been married, and that all the children, including Mary, were treated by the parents as if they were lawful children, and were regarded by the testator as his lawful brothers and sisters. The testator in his will refers to some, but not all, as his brothers and sisters; he also refers to the children of some as his nephews and nieces, and to one Arthur Alexander Corsellis, as his relative, though he could have no lawful relatives. From these facts it is clear that the testator proceeded on the footing that his parents were lawfully married. It was argued that the bequest must be confined to the children of those whom in his will he had mentioned as his brothers and sisters. The language of the will does not justify that contention. It is not, as in Seale-Hayne v. Jodrell a gift "to my relatives hereinbefore named," but a gift to "all my nephews and nieces," by a testator who could have no legitimate ones. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that Hill v. Crook, 22 W. R. 137, 6 H. L. 265, applies. I hold, therefore, that the children of Mary are entitled to share in their character as nephews or nieces equally with the children of the other sisters of the testator.

Solicitors, W. T. Coventon, for Brown & Elmhirst, York; Indermaur & Brown, for Cardens, Brighton; W. J. Homewood.

(a.) Reported by R. E. V. BAX, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K. B. Div.
(Ridley and Darling, JJ.) May 24.

WHEATLEY v. SMITHERS AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Partnership—Bill of exchange—Auctioneer—Trading firm.

A firm of auctioneers is not a trading firm, so as to give one partner the implied power to bind the firm by accepting a bill of exchange.

This was an appeal from the City of London County Court.

The action was upon a bill of exchange for £50 accepted by one Alcock in the name of the firm, Smithers & Alcock, of which he was a partner.

The county court judge found (1) that the partnership, for the purpose of carrying on the business of auctioneers, was not a trading one; (2) that the matter for which the bill was accepted was outside the partnership business; (3) that Alcock had no express authority from Smithers to accept the bill; (4) that Alcock purposely concealed such acceptance from Smithers.

In accordance with these findings the judge gave judgment for the defendant with costs.

Cairns, for the appellant.—It is submitted that this was a trading firm, and if that was so it will not be contended that Smithers is not liable. There is no authority, but Schedule I. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which is headed "Description of Trades," includes auctioneers. So far as material it is as follows. "Alum makers, apothecaries, auctioneers, . . . persons using the trade of merchandize by way of commission . . . persons who either for themselves or as agents for others seek their living by buying or selling . . . ; but a farmer, grazier, common labourer . . . shall not be deemed a trader for the purpose of this Act." An auctioneer is not allied to a profession, nor to a farmer who does not buy in order to sell, but sells the produce from the land. A limited trading company alone can borrow for its business without special powers, and in General Auction Estates Co. v. Smith, 40 W. R. 106, [1891] 3 Ch. 432, it was held that the company was a trading company: see also Bryan v. Metropolitan Co., 3 De G. & J. 123; Ex parte City Bank, 16 W. R. 668, L. R. 3 Ch. 432; Palmer on Company Law (5th ed.), p. 231.

Ernest Palmer, for the respondent, was not called upon.

RIDLEY, J.—I do not think we can interfere in this case. The learned county court judge has said that in his opinion this firm is not a trading firm within the meaning of the law affecting bills of exchange, and we are not prepared to say he was wrong. It is true that the matter is bare of authority, but Mr. Cairns has not been able to point us to any authority which supports his view. We can see, on the other hand, reasons to support the judgment below. In order to get some guide, perhaps it is desirable to refer to the first schedule of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. That Act does not apply purely to traders, but certain sections of it do. In order to define traders, the Legislature has dealt with the matter in the first schedule. [His lordship read it.] There for the purpose of the Bankruptcy Act an auctioneer was held to be a trader. But I think that it is a different thing from saying that because we ought to hold an auctioneer to be a trader for one purpose therefore we ought to regard him as a trader for all purposes. There is no definition of a trade laid down, but any definition must include the business of buying and selling. That must have something to do with it. But an auctioneer does not buy. He accepts the goods of another person for the purpose of selling them for him by auction. In the case of Harris v. Amery, L. R. 1 C. P., p. 154, Willes, J., points out that the term "business" is wider than "trade": "It is unnecessary to refer to authorities to show that 'business' has a more extensive signification than 'trade.'" An auctioneer, it is true, carries on a business; but so does a barrister, yet he does not carry on a trade. Under these circumstances I am not prepared to differ from the learned county court judge. On the whole I think his decision was the right one.

DARLING, J.—I concur.

Solicitor for the appellant, John Smith.

Solicitors for the respondent, Dormer & Johnson.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling, J.) May 4.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Smoke—Company's default—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 114—Regulation of Railways Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), s. 19.

Section 114 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, provides: "Every locomotive steam engine to be used on the railway shall, if it use coal or other similar fuel emitting smoke, be constructed on the principle of consuming and so as to consume its own smoke; and if any engine be not so constructed the company or party using such engine shall forfeit five pounds for every day during which such engine shall be used on the railway."

Section 19 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, provides: "Where proceedings are taken against a company using a locomotive steam engine on a railway on account of the same not consuming its own smoke, then, if it appears to the justices before whom the complaint is heard that the engine is constructed on the principle of consuming its own smoke, but that it failed to consume its own smoke, as far as practicable, at the time charged in the complaint through the default of the company or of any servant in the employment of the company, such company shall be deemed guilty of an offence under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 114."

Held, that it was not a default on behalf of the company merely because the company did not supply the coal which was the best that could be obtained regarded from the point of view of its smokelessness.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

On the 26th of July, 1905, the Great Eastern Railway Co., the respondents, were summoned for that they on the 8th day of July, 1905, at Bethnal Green Junction, in the county of London, did use upon their railway at Bethnal Green Junction a locomotive steam engine, to wit, locomotive steam engine No. 363, using coal or other similar fuel emitting smoke, and not then constructed on the principle of consuming and so as to consume its own smoke, and which did not then consume its own smoke.

The material facts as set out in the case are as follows: "4. It was proved before me at the said hearing on the part of the appellants by Samuel Tinworth, a coal officer of the appellants, and

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Herbert Court, his assistant, that on the 8th of July, 1905, he was watching from a building near to the Bethnal Green Junction Station of the respondents when a passenger train belonging to the respondents drawn by No. 363 came into his view at 6 22 a.m. from the direction of Liverpool-street Station, drew up at Bethnal Green Junction Station, and passed out of his view at 6 24 a.m., and also at 7.47 a.m. the same engine came into his view, having a similar train, which stopped at Bethnal Green Junction Station, and passed out of his view at 7.49 a.m., and that during a portion of each of the said periods of two minutes the said engine was emitting dark smoke.

"5. It was further proved before me on the hearing of the said summons that the said engine was a properly constructed engine and constructed on the principle of consuming, as far as practicable, the smoke of the coal then in use on the said engine, which was a Derbyshire or York-hire coal of a bituminous character, and that such coal was a good hard steam coal and the normal locomotive coal in use in some districts.

"6. It was further proved to my satisfaction that it was not through the default of any servant of the respondent company in the stoking or management of the said engine that any such smoke was emitted at the time aforesaid.

"7. It was also proved before me that the respondents on another line (the East London Line, over which they have running powers) are under obligation to employ and do employ on their engines on such line a Welsh smokeless steam coal different from that used in engine No. 363 on the said 8th of July. This Welsh coal produces smoke not so dark as that of the coal used by engine No. 363, and not so much in proportion to the amount of coal used as is produced by the Derbyshire and Yorkshire coal. The engine, No. 363 as constructed could have used similar Welsh coal, and if this had been done less smoke would have been emitted from the said engine. The said Welsh coal, costs about twice as much to the respondents as the coal used upon the said engine on the occasion complained of, and the greater expense of it is the principal reason why it was not used on the said engine.

"I was of opinion:

"(a) That the engine No. 363 was properly constructed within the meaning of section 114 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

"(b) That it did not fail to consume its own smoke so far as was practicable having regard to the coal which was used.

"(c) That the use of the coal which was used was not a default of the company within section 19 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, and that there was no other default.

(d) That the smoke emitted by the said engine was of a darker colour and slightly more in quantity than would have been emitted if Welsh coal had been used.

"I accordingly dismissed the summons."

The question for the opinion of the court is whether I was right in law in my decision on the above facts, or whether I was bound in law to hold that the use of a coal producing a darker smoke than would have been produced by the use of a different coal was a default on the part of the company.

Bodkin, for the appellants.—The amending section 19 of the Act of 1868 is due to the decision of Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway v. Wood, 29 L. J. M. C. 29, where it was held, the engine being properly constructed, there could not be a conviction because excessive smoke was produced through negligence. The effect of the two sections is that smoke must not be emitted as far as practicable, and if this could be obtained by the use of better coal, such better coal must be used, and the mere question of expense would not be considered by the court as a reason for not doing so: Patterson v. Chamber Colliery Co., 56 J. P. 200. The Lord Chief Justice had expressed his opinion in favour of this view, it is contended, in South-Eastern Railway v. London County Council, 65 J. P. 568, and his view coincided with that of Bacon, V.C., in Smith v. Midland Railway Co., 37 L. T. N. S. 224, at p. 226. The words, or very similar words to, "as far as practicable" had been interpreted in Cooper v. Wooley, 36 L. J. M. C. 27.

Avory, K.C. (Grain with him), for the respondent.—The argument of the appellants is, in the result, that we must use the best coal obtainable, and the short answer to that argument is that the statute does not say so. It contemplates smoke being emitted. [He was stopped by the court.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It has been most ingeniously argued by Mr. Bodkin that the effect of the amending section is indirectly to impose upon the railway the obligation to use coal of the highest quality from the point of view of smokelessness. It seems to me that that is going too far. I am not prepared to say that the magistrate has come to a wrong conclusion on the point of fact. Section 114 of the 1845 Act does say that the engine should be constructed so as to consume its own smoke. It was contemplated that engines might be constructed so well as to consume their own smoke. This was pointed out in the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway case, where it was held that in order to justify proceedings there must be proof of a wrongly-constructed engine, and it is not sufficient to show that smoke was emitted owing to the negligence of a servant. The amending section provides: [His lordship read section 19.] This section clearly contemplates that coal which will emit smoke will be used. The magistrate has here found that the smoke was of a darker colour and slightly more in quantity than the Welsh coal. The colour has nothing to do with the question except where there is evidence to show bad stoking or of smoke being emitted in an excessive quantity. But the finding is that the Welsh coal emits smoke only slightly less in quantity than the coal complained of. Is it necessary to use that coal which produces the least smoke? If so there would have been conflicting evidence as to which coal would give the best results, and that would have led to more embarrassing questions than the one we have to try. I think that section 19 points in the first instance to default in the construction of the engine or in not providing proper coal, and not in not providing the best coal. The findings in this case are: [His lordship read paragraph 5.] It is true that for some contractual reasons, they have undertaken to use Welsh steam coal when running over the East London line. It is perfectly plain that the contractual obligation cannot extend the obligation under the Act of Parliament. It is clear to my mind that it is a wrong construction of the section to say that the company has been guilty of default because it has not used a particular kind of coal. I think the magistrate has come to a right conclusion. There is no mistake in law in any case by which we can reverse his finding, for if we did we should have to say, not "as far as practicable" the company must use the engine so as not to emit smoke, but that they must use coal which does in fact cause the engine to emit the least possible amount of smoke.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Bodkin, I think, put his argument best when he said that the company is bound to provide an engine which shall emit no smoke as far as practicable.

That is true. But further he contends that the company is bound to provide a fuel which will permit the engine as far as practicable to consume its own smoke. That is where I think he has not made out his case. The statute might have said that in the apt words used by Mr. Bodkin. It has not said so. If it had said so the case narrows itself down to this—that it is an offence to burn, even in the best constructed engine, anything but anthracite coal, probably coal from Wales, because that is coal which will give out the least smoke, and therefore the coal which makes the engine capable of using its power to consume its own smoke to the greatest possible extent. I think the fact that the Legislature has not said so in plain words is strong evidence that it did not intend it. These engines must be used in various parts of the country. This doctrine of Mr. Bodkin would also be applied to manufacturing districts, where it is also necessary to avoid by all reasonable means the production of smoke, and it would come to this: the local coal could not be used either for the local manufactures or engines, and I cannot think that the Legislature ever intended that. It intended that an engine should be so constructed that, given the use of a coal under all the circumstances of the case reasonable to be used, it will consume as far as practicable the smoke which that coal will necessarily give off. Upon Mr. Bodkin's reading of section 114 an offence would be committed unless all the smoke be consumed. I do think the Legislature relaxed the law by the enactment of 1868 and in the manner in which it has been put in my lord's judgment.

Appeal dismissed.

Counsel for the appellants, Segar Berry.

Counsel for the respondents, E. Moore.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Ridley and Darling, JJ.) April 26, 30.

REX v. BRIGHTON CORPORATION.
Ex parte SHORSMITH. (a.)

Corporation—Highway—Alteration and making up by local authority—Orders for payment of money—Wasteful, extravagant, and unnecessary expenditure—Public road adapted for motor-car racing—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 149—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 141.

The court ordered a certiorari to issue to bring up and quash a resolution of a municipal corporation for the payment by the treasurer of two several sums of £2,500 and £550 to the Public Works Committee, which sums had been expended on paving a road in the borough with tarmac, on the grounds that the expenditure was wasteful, extravagant, and unnecessary, and therefore illegal, the money not having been bonâ fide expended for the repair of the road, but solely for the purpose of enabling the motor-car trials of the Automobile Club to be held there.

Rule nisi calling on the Corporation of Brighton to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into the High Court all and singular the orders and resolutions made by the council on or about the 6th of July, 1905, and the 4th of August, 1905, whereby it was ordered that the treasurer of the borough should pay to the Public Works Committee two several sums of £2,500 and £550, upon the grounds that the expenditure was wasteful, extravagant, and unnecessary, and therefore illegal, and that the corporation had no jurisdiction or authority to make it.

From the affidavits read in court it appeared that the corporation had spent these sums in altering and making Madeira-road, Brighton, a public highway, and completing its surface with tar macadam, in view of a contemplated motor-car competition by the Automobile Club, and then sought to cast the expense so incurred upon the ratepayers.

Sir R. B. Finlay, K.C. (J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and E. E. Humphreys with him), showed cause.—The cost incurred in laying a portion of the Madeira-road, Brighton, with tarmac for the purpose of an automobile competition is not ultrà vires, and consequently the expenditure sanctioned by the resolution for that purpose is not illegal. The question of the desirability of paving the road in this way was brought before the corporation many years ago, and they are acting strictly within their powers in adopting this form of pavement, which in their discretion they consider desirable. The immediate cause of the corporation deciding to pave the road in this way was, no doubt, because it was especially suitable for motor-cars, and they considered that the patronage of the Automobile Club would be beneficial to the town. But that is no reason whatever for disallowing the expenditure. The question is whether in acting as they did the corporation exercised perfectly bonâ fide the discretion given them by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), to "alter and repair roads as occasion may require" within their district. It is submitted that the evidence is conclusively in their favour, and the court has therefore no jurisdiction to interfere with their discretion.

He cited Westminster Corporation v. London and North-Western Railway, 54 W. R. 129, [1905] A. C. 426; Attorney-General v. Blackburn Corporation, 57 L. T. 385, 36 W. R. Dig. 189; Attorney-General v. Cardiff Corporation, [1894] 2 Ch. 337; Reg. v. Mayor of Norwich, 30 W. R. 752; Attorney-General v. Tynemouth Corporation, 46 W. R. 518, [1898] 1 Q. B. 604; Reg. v. Exeter Corporation, 29 W. R. 441, 6 Q. B. D. 135; and Reg. v. Ramsgate Corporation, 37 W. R. 781, 23 Q. B. D. 66.

Lush, K.C., and Ernest Pollock, K.C. (W. A. Casson with them), in support of the rule.—In deciding this case it is necessary to consider first what is the power of an urban authority with regard to spending money on roads, the rule nisi having been obtained on the ground that the corporation had expended this money ultrà vires. An ordinary urban district council under the Public Health Act, 1875, would be liable to have surcharged against them money they had spent which the auditors considered to be wasteful, extravagant, and unnecessary expenditure; but where, as here, the corporation are the urban authority, the auditor has no power to surcharge at all. In such a case as the present the court sits as a court of appeal against any wasteful expenditure, for an appeal to the court is the only remedy open to the ratepayer. It is not necessary to show that there has been an excess of jurisdiction on the part of the corporation. The discretion is not a discretion of the corporation, but of the court. It is submitted that the corporation have in fact exceeded their powers, and if not, there has been a "wasteful" expenditure, and the court had therefore power to consider if the expenditure was wasteful, and to quash the orders for payment if they find it was. The officials of the corporation are now endeavouring to justify expenditure made for one object as if it were made for another, and it has been urged that there being no evidence of mala fides, the discretion exercised by the corporation in altering the road cannot be interfered with by the court. They said that although the cost was heavy, it was a prudent thing to make up the road with tarmac, because so many advantages were gained by it. But it was admitted that the road was in such a good state of repair that it was not necessary for ordinary traffic that any repairs should be undertaken. The repairs quâ highway were not necessary.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case of very great importance, because the court is asked to quash orders for the payment of a very considerable sum of money; and I confess that when the matter was first argued by Sir Robert Finlay I did not see my way to take the view which Mr. Lush has since convinced me we ought to take.

Speaking for myself, if there had been evidence to show that the corporation had acted bonâ fide under their statutory powers, I think the case of Westminster Corporation v. London and North-Western Railway would be conclusive authority that we ought not to review that discretion on this application. Of course there might be cases in which the expenditure was so unreasonable as to be ultrâ vires, but I wish to reserve my judgment as to what the powers of this court might be under section 141 if it was conceded that the operation of the payments made could not be brought within the points of legality.

Now, it is not disputed that the section under which the corporation have purported to act is section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875. That section provides that the road authority shall from time to time repair such streets, and do such paving, and so forth, "as occasion may require." If there had been evidence upon the affidavits—however long they had been thinking over it, and however dilatory in coming to a decision—that the altering of the road in the way suggested was the result of a consideration by the urban authority as to the needs of the road "as the occasion required," then the question Mr. Lush had contended for on his second ground—whether this expenditure was a bonâ fide and proper expenditure or was so unreasonable as to be illegal—would not have arisen. If I had thought the affidavits of Sir Alexander Binnie and other distinguished engineers on behalf of the corporation had been directed to the point of view that the repairs and alteration of the road were really necessary in the interests of the road itself, I should have taken a long time before allowing myself to investigate the motives which led to such expenditure. I have come to the conclusion that the beginning and end of this expenditure was the desire of the Automobile Club to come to Brighton, and the desire of the corporation to have the automobile races there. I am satisfied from the initiation of the matter, the correspondence in the early part of 1905, the action taken by the corporation to investigate the tarmac system from the motor point of view, and also from the absence of any report or suggestion of any surveyor that the road required to be repaired with tar macadam or tarmac—prior to the suggestion made by the Automobile Club that they should go to Brighton—and the very frank statement made by the corporation in their affidavits that they were acting in the interests of the borough and not in the interests of the road—from all this I am satisfied that the beginning and end of this alteration was the automobile races and nothing else. Nor do I lose sight of the fact that these races involve excluding the public from the road, involve closing a public highway, and possibly involve operations which are not legal; but while I mention these things, I do not wish it to be thought that they were anything like half as strong grounds in support of the rule being made absolute as the fact that it was the desire of the corporation to accept the club's suggestion to hold the automobile races on this road, and that that was the only motive that moved the corporation. That view is confirmed by what happened when the resolution had once passed the council, and the club's invitation had been accepted. The contract was immediately obtained, the work was put in hand, and actually commenced before the inquiry was held into the application for a loan to meet the cost; and I see that the contract required that the work should be completed by the 17th of June. It was not suggested that the letter of the Local Government Board was a judgment as to the purpose for which the loan was required, but there is no contradiction of the statement that the avowed object of the new work was the motor speed trials. That being the uncontradicted statement of the gentleman who held the inquiry strongly confirms my own view that no question of exercising their powers, apart from creating a surface suitable for the motor speed trials, has ever been raised by the corporation. So determined, indeed, were the corporation to have the motor trials that they passed a resolution in anticipation, and directed that if the money was not allowed to be raised by loan it should be paid out of the current rates. I have no hesitation, therefore, in coming to the conclusion that it was an illegal payment, on the ground that it was not a payment that could be possibly justified in any exercise of the corporation's discretion, however wide their powers under the section. I have, perhaps, felt more difficulty than my learned brethren upon the question of time.

I still think the court would have to consider whether there were circumstances which would make it not right for them in the exercise of their discretion to impose the serious consequence of quashing the order. But while it is true that section 141 of the Act of 1882 contemplates that the money has been spent and delay in applying to the court might in some cases become material, I am not prepared to give effect to the objection that the application came too late. In this case the time within which any effective proceedings could have been taken was certainly very limited—between some day in May and the early part of June—and I can well imagine that there were some questions raised about the position of this road; and the answer of the corporation in September was ample justification for the delay between September and the time the rule was moved for. By September the mischief had been done. Looking at the correspondence, and having regard to the whole circumstances of the case, the fact that Mr. Shoesmith did not move for this rule before was not, in my opinion, sufficient to justify me in saying that the rule ought to be discharged. I think the rule ought to be made absolute.

RIDLEY and DARLING, JJ., delivered judgment to the same effect.

Rule made absolute.

Solicitors for the applicant, E. Elvey Robb, for Gates & Burnand, Brighton.

Solicitors for the corporation, Boxall & Boxall, for Hugo Talbot, Brighton.

Solicitors for the other defendant, Cutler, Allingham, & Nesfield.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Divorce. (Gorell Barnes, P.) — Dec. 19; March 19; April 27.

DODD v. DODD. (a.)

Divorce—Desertion—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895.

The wife prayed for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery and desertion. Prior to the commencement of the two years necessary to complete the defence of desertion within the meaning of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the wife had obtained an order under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1895, directing that she should be no longer bound to cohabit with the respondent, on the ground that the respondent had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance.

The Court held that, if the two years had not been completed prior to the making of the order of the court of summary jurisdiction, it would have had the effect of preventing the desertion from continuing after it. It dismissed the petition for divorce, on the ground that the wife had not proved a case of desertion but adultery alone.

Smith v. Smith, [1905] P. 249, not followed.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Willis, for the petitioner.

Sir J. Lawson Walton, A.G., and Lowenthal, for the King's Proctor.

GORELL BARNES, P., in delivering his considered judgment, said: This is a suit for divorce by the petitioner, a wife, in an undefended case, on the alleged grounds of her husband's adultery and desertion without reasonable excuse for two years and upwards. The case originally came before me on the 19th of December last, when evidence of the facts was given; the adultery was established by the evidence, but the facts with regard to the desertion have given rise to a question of importance—of importance, indeed, far beyond that which is at first apparent. Having regard to this, and to the fact that there have been two undefended cases—viz, Levy v. Levy, 21 Times L. R. 157, and Smith v. Smith, [1905] P. 249, in each of which a somewhat similar point was raised to that which causes the present difficulty, and in each of which the point was disposed of without the court having the advantage of an opposing argument, I thought it desirable to take advantage of the provisions of section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, by directing that the papers in the matter should be sent to the King's Proctor, in order that he might instruct counsel to argue the case before the court. Accordingly, on the 19th of March last, the case was again considered before me, the Attorney-General arguing on behalf of the King's Proctor, and the petitioner's counsel also being heard.

The facts necessary to state in order that the point may be appreciated are as follows: On the 26th of March, 1891, the petitioner was married to the respondent, a provision merchant, of Manchester. There was one child of the marriage, born in 1892. In the year 1896 itappears that the husband had given way to drink, had lost his business, and, though living with his wife, was neglecting to provide for her and her child, and was being kept by her, and, in consequence, on the 21st of August in that year the petitioner left him and went to her mother. In the following month of September the petitioner applied to the stipendiary magistrate at Manchester under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, complaining that her husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her and her infant child, and that by such neglect the respondent had caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him, and she sought to obtain an order under the provisions of that Act. On the 9th of September, 1896, the stipendiary magistrate made an order, from which it appears that the respondent appealed, and that it was ordered that the petitioner should be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, that the legal custody of the child should be given to the petitioner, and that the respondent should pay to the petitioner a weekly sum of 10s., and 6s. 6d., the petitioner's costs. The respondent did not pay anything under the order, and the petitioner accordingly took steps to enforce it by summoning the respondent two or three times; but no payment was in fact made by him, and since that time the petitioner has been living with her mother. On the 5th of August, 1905, the petitioner having ascertained, as she alleged, that her husband had been guilty of adultery, filed her petition in the present suit to obtain a decree of divorce on the grounds aforesaid. From the date of the magistrate's order it appears that the petitioner had not had any communication with her husband. The evidence satisfied me that the adultery on the part of the respondent was established, and, therefore, the right of the petitioner to succeed in the present petition depends upon whether there has been desertion on the part of the respondent for two years and upwards. The separation between the parties having taken place in 1896, far more than two years has elapsed since that date up to the commencement of the present suit; but two questions arise—viz., whether the evidence showed any desertion on the part of the respondent, and, if it did, what was the effect of the magistrate's order of September, 1896?

With regard to the first point, I have had the opportunity since the arguments were heard of reading the shorthand notes of the evidence taken in the case; and possibly because the papers had been sent to the King's Proctor with the intention of directing his attention to the general legal question raised, and the arguments before me were confined to that question, I had not, until I had read the notes, sufficiently appreciated this point. It had been rather assumed that the court would find from the whole of the facts given in evidence that there had been desertion by the respondent in accordance wtih the principles laid down in Sickert v. Sickert, 48 W. R. 268, [1899] P. 278, where I held that desertion is not to be tested by merely ascertaining which party left the matrimonial home first, and that the one who intends bringing the cohabitation to an end commits the act of desertion. But I am satisfied upon the evidence in this case that the husband had no intention of bringing the cohabitation to an end. He was, in fact, living upon his wife, who was keeping him, and no doubt, desirous of remaining with her, but as he was drinking and doing no work, she left him. She did not summon him for desertion, but for neglect to maintain; in fact, she wanted to get rid of him, and did so. I find, therefore, that the husband was not guilty of desertion for two years and upwards, or at all, and that is really sufficient to dispose of the case. It is not, as a rule, wise to express any opinion on points which are not strictly necessary to the decision of a case; but, having regard to the fact that this case has been argued by the Attorney-General for the King's Proctor with the object of obtaining a decision upon the legal question supposed to have been raised and of reviewing the decisions in the two undefended cases above-mentioned, and to the fact that the point is sure to come up again when it might not be convenient to have it argued as this case has been, and to the advantage which it may be to the magistrates throughout the country to have the opinion of this court upon the matter, I have decided to express the opinion I have formed as to the effect of the magistrate's order. Desertion contemplated by the Act of 1857 must be desertion without reasonable excuse for two years and upwards, and in order to maintain desertion throughout that period there must be in fact a state of things which keeps up the desertion throughout the whole of that period. I have so held in the case of Kay v. Kay, 53 W. R. Dig. 49, [1904] P. 382 That was a case in which a supplemental petition alleging desertion for two years and upwards had been filed, but the desertion found did not occur as much as two years prior to the date of the original petition; and it was held that the filing or prosecution of a suit for dissolution of marriage precluded the petitioner from successfully pleading that the period of desertion was running during the time when the suit was being maintained, as nothing had happened to entitle the wife to refuse to return to the husband if he had desired to put an end to the desertion, and the petitioner had put it out of the power of the respondent to do anything, and could not be held entitled to treat him as continuing to desert her. Therefore the question I am now considering in this case is whether, when the two years had not been completed at the time of the magistrate's order, that order had the effect of preventing the desertion from continuing after the date of the order. But first there is a technical point to dispose of, which was not taken by the Attorney-General, no doubt because he was concerned with the broad legal question, nor pressed, so far as I recollect, by the petitioner's counsel—that having regard to the form of the order in this case it might be treated as a nullity, because it might be considered as bad on the face of it. The order does not state upon its face the finding of fact upon which the order was made; in other words, it does not state on the face of it that the respondent had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the petitioner and her child, and that by such neglect he had caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him. It might be said that I could therefore ignore the order, and treat it as if it had never been applied for and made, on the general principle that a magistrate's order ought to state the finding of fact essential to the exercise of the jurisdiction: see the observations in the case of Brown v. Brown, 62 J. P. 711. But it is necessary to observe first that this point is highly technical, and on an appeal to this Division the defect could have been corrected; that the petitioner acted upon the order and endeavoured to enforce it and that it undoubtedly was treated by both parties as being an effective order; and, further, that in the case of Brown v. Brown the effect of the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts and of the forms which are provided for use under those Acts was not fully considered. According to section 8 of the Act of 1895, all applications under it are to be made in accordance with the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and without going through the details of those Acts, as they at present stand, it is sufficient to observe that the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, r. 31, provided that the forms in the schedule thereto, or forms to the like effect, might be used with such variations as circumstances might require, and the forms of orders in that schedule omit to state whether the complaint is found and adjudged to be true; so that, although in strictness the order ought to state the findings of fact essential to jurisdiction, having regard to the provisions of the Act and rules to which I have just referred, I am not prepared to hold without further argument that this order ought to be treated as bad on the face of it. I might point out, however, that it is desirable that the practice adopted, I believe, by the magistrates of London, of stating that the cause of complaint is found to be true, is desirable in order to avoid any such difficulty as arises in the present case upon this point: see the discussion of this subject, 62 J. P. 563.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Assuming, then, the order to be an operative order, I shall first consider the effect of the two cases which have already been decided—viz., Levy v. Levy and Smith v. Smith. I have been furnished by the King's Proctor with a transcript of the official shorthand writer's notes of the case of Levy v. Levy; and it is quite clear from a perusal of them that the discussion in that undefended case was of a very short character, and that no considered judgment by Lord St. Helier was given upon the point. With regard to the case of Smith v. Smith, Bargrave Deane, J., appears to have come to the conclusion in that case, without having had the benefit of any argument except that on the part of the petitioner, that he could ignore the operation of the order made by the magistrates as not affecting the jurisdiction of the court. I agree that the order does not affect the jurisdiction of this court; but desertion is a question of fact, and if something has taken place which puts an end to the desertion running on, just as, for instance, an agreement to live separate made after desertion would do, then the court cannot find the fact of the necessary desertion for two years or upwards. For the reasons which will appear I do not think I can follow that case after the very full discussion this case has had. In this court decisions in undefended cases, when the court has not had the benefit of an argument on both sides, have not been treated as so binding that the court, when it has the opportunity of a fuller consideration, is compelled to follow them. To arrive at a conclusion about this matter it is necessary to examine with some care the whole of the legislation affecting the question. According to the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 7, no decree for a divorce a mensa et thoro was to be made thereunder, but in all cases in which a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro might be pronounced the court might pronounce a decree for judicial separation which should have the same force and the same consequence as a divorce a mensa et thoro then had. By section 16 a decree of judicial separation might be obtained either by the husband or wife on the ground of adultery, or cruelty, or desertion without cause for two years and upwards. By section 17 an application for judicial separation might be made by either the husband or wife by petition to the Divorce Court, and also to the judges of assize. This latter provision was the subject of much discussion at the time, and in the following year, 1858, by section 19 of the Matrimonial Causes Act of that year the provision for judicial separation by petition to a judge of assize was repealed, and so matters remained until 1878. By the fourth section of the Matrimonial Causes Act of that year it was provided that if a husband should be convicted summarily or otherwise of an aggravated assault within the meaning of the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43, upon his wife, the court or magistrate before whom he should be so convicted might, if satisfied that the future safety of the wife was in peril, order that the wife should be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, and such order should have the same force and effect in all respects as a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, and that such order might further provide (1) for the payment by the husband to the wife of weekly sums, which payments were to be enforced as therein provided, and the court or magistrate by whom any such order for payment of money should be made should have power from time to time to vary the same on an application by either the husband or wife, upon proof that the means of the husband or wife had been altered since the original order, or any subsequent order varying it, should have been made, and (2) for giving the custody of the children under ten years of age to the wife; and the said section further provided that any order for payment of money or for custody of the children might be discharged by the court or magistrate by whom such order was made upon proof that the wife had since the making thereof been guilty of adultery. As bearing upon the point under consideration it is important to notice that the words as to non-cohabitation are the words which are adopted in sub-section (a) of the Act of 1895, and that it seems clear that the object of inserting them in the said section 4 of the Act of 1878 was to make a complete separation between husband and wife because the safety of the wife required it. No power is contained in the section to make an order without this provision, or to vary or discharge that order otherwise than with regard to the payment of money and the custody of the children, and so it would remain in permanent operation, because it originated in the necessity for providing for the future safety of the wife. The contention in the present case on the part of the petitioner is that similar words as to non-cohabitation in the Act of 1895 are to have a totally different construction. The next Act to refer to is the Maintenance in case of Desertion Act, 1886. According to that Act a wife might summon her husband for desertion, and the justices or magistrate, if satisfied that the husband was able wholly or in part to maintain his wife or his wife and family, but wilfully refused or neglected so to do, and had deserted his wife, might order a weekly payment, which might be afterwards varied or discharged in certain circumstances as therein provided; but the Act contained no power to make a non-cohabitation order in cases of desertion, and the usual form of order made was that the payments should be made so long as the desertion continued. Then, coming to the Act of 1895, it is important to notice at the outset that that Act is an Act to amend the law relative to the summary jurisdiction of magistrates in reference to married women. It is not an Act which alters, nor do any of its provisions appear to me to affect, the Matrimonial Causes Acts applicable to this court, nor was it intended to vary, nor does it in fact vary, the causes for which a divorce may be obtained. The fourth section of the Act gives five grounds for any one of which a married woman may lay a complaint and obtain an order or orders under the Act. Those grounds are these: (1) Where the husband shall have been convicted of an aggravated assault upon her within the meaning of section 43 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861; (2) where the husband shall have been convicted upon an indictment of an assault upon her and sentenced to pay a fine of more than £5, or to a term of imprisonment exceeding two months; (3) where the husband shall have deserted her; (4) where the husband shall have been guilty of persistent cruelty to her; and (5) where he shall have been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her and her infant children, whom he is legally liable to maintain, and in each of such cases—viz., of persistent cruelty or neglect to maintain—shall by such cruelty or neglect have caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him. Section 5 provides that the court of summary jurisdiction to which any application under the Act is made may make an order or orders containing all or any of the provisions following, viz.—(a) a provision that the applicant be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, which provision, while in force, shall have the force in all respects of a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty; (b) a provision as to the custody of the children; (c) a provision as to weekly payments to the wife not exceeding £2 per week; and (d) a provision as to the payment of costs. Section 6 is not material to the present case. Section 7 gives power to the court on the application of the married woman or of the husband, and upon cause being shown upon fresh evidence to the satisfaction of the court, at any time to alter, vary, or discharge any order, and to increase or diminish the amount of the weekly payments so that the same do not in any case exceed the weekly sum of £2. But where an order has been made it is very difficult to get rid of it, except possibly as to the amount of payment or custody of children: see as to the meaning of the term "fresh evidence," Johnson v. Johnson, [1900] P. 19. It would seem as if the magistrates had not a simple discretion to discharge the original order, and it is very important to notice that the Act appears to contain no provisions expressly empowering the magistrates to make original orders for temporary separation or of a probationary character, with such conditions and restrictions as might be useful, though such orders might meet the needs of many cases in which time, reflection, and amendment might end the trouble. Section 8 provides that all applications under the Act shall be made in accordance with the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. Section 10 gives power to the court, if in its opinion the matters in question between the parties or any of them may be more conveniently dealt with by the High Court, to refuse to make an order under the Act. It will be seen that the Act is an amalgamation of the two Acts last referred to. In practice, I believe, since 1895, the difference between cases involving the wife's safety and cases in the nature of desertion or neglect to maintain appears to have been lost sight of, and the orders under the Act of 1895 have been made in a form commencing with the non-cohabitation provision and following with the others as to custody and payment of an allowance and costs. This ought to be noted, because it is unnecessary, as I will point out more fully later on, in desertion cases or cases such as the present of neglect to maintain, that the non-cohabitation provision should be inserted, unless indeed the applicant particularly desires to have it. It ought also to be noted that the power of magistrates appears to be discretionary. The words are "The court may make an order or orders"; the language does not appear to impose upon them an absolute obligation to do so, and however this may be it is certainly clear that the order may contain all or any of the provisions aforesaid, and therefore that only such provisions should be inserted in the order as are necessary to meet the justice of the case.

This, then, brings me to the consideration of what effect is to be given to what I may term the non-cohabitation provision when it has been inserted in an order. The language of that provision I have above stated. The argument for the petitioner was to the effect that this provision was simply for the wife's protection, and has no effect on the husband's duties, and that although the wife is no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, yet he is still under the duty to do so if required. But where do these words as to non-cohabitation come from? Clearly, I think, from the Act of 1876, where the object was to provide for the wife's safety, and to make her completely free from her husband, as I have already pointed out; and I confess that I fail to appreciate the argument that if she be not bound to cohabit yet he still is. But still further; words are added as follows: "Which provision while in force shall have the force in all respects of a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty." Now, what is the effect of these words? In my opinion their effect is to be gathered from the provisions of sections 7, 25, and 26 of the Act of 1857, the result of which is that a wife, in a case of judicial separation, is to be considered as a feme sole in respect of property which she may acquire, and also for the purposes of contract and wrongs and injuries, and suing and being sued in any civil proceedings. She thus obtains complete protection from her husband, and he can in no way interfere with her. It was, however, argued that if the non-cohabitation provision is to have in all respects the force of a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, then a wife, having obtained such an order, though there had been no cruelty in fact, nor desertion, for two years or upwards by the husband, could at once, upon proof of adultery, sue him for divorce. In my opinion this argument, though ingenious, is entirely unsound. To uphold it would in effect be permitting the Act of 1895 to alter the Act of 1857, though the former is only an Act to amend the law relating to the summary jurisdiction of magistrates in reference to married women, and contains no express provision varying or amending the latter Act, and would in effect be giving new grounds upon which a divorce could be obtained by a woman. The argument appears to me to be based upon a misconception. The order is not a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. It is merely to have the same effects (which are what I have already stated). In cases of cruelty and adultery, if cruelty be proved, a judicial separation may be obtained. If adultery be afterwards proved the court "if satisfied" that both cruelty and adultery have been proved may grant a decree of divorce: see sections 27 and 31 of the Act of 1857. The cruelty already found in the judicial separation suit has been proved and the parties are estopped from disputing this. But how can the court be satisfied that there has been both cruelty and adultery if, though adultery be proved, it merely has before it in addition a magistrate's order which has no cruelty for its foundation? The Attorney-General, however, went further, and suggested that the Act of 1895 was intended to do away with the two years' limit in poor cases. I confess I cannot follow this. There is no repeal of this limit, and why should it be allowed in poor cases rather than in other cases? If the Act of 1895 were to have the effect contended for there would seem to be no reason why any wife deserted by her husband could not apply to the magistrates for a non-cohabitation order, and then upon proof of adultery get a decree of divorce and maintenance from this court. The answer is that the powers of this court to grant a decree of divorce are limited to certain specific causes which the Act of 1895 does not touch. Further, it is important to notice that if a husband refuses to return to his wife, a suit for restitution can be brought, and if a decree be obtained and the respondent fails to comply with it, then by virtue of the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, such non-compliance is to have the effect of desertion for two years and upwards so that a suit for judicial separation can then follow, or if there be adultery as well, a suit for divorce can then at once be maintained. This course has been adopted in a great many cases which have come before this court, and by it the two years' limit has, in such cases, been got rid of. In the present case perhaps want of means (though I have no evidence about this) might have hindered the petitioner from taking such a course, though such a suit is an inexpensive matter where not defended, but it is clear from the evidence that the petitioner would not have been likely to take such a course because it would seem probable that her husband would only have been too glad to come back to her to be kept by her. It was said that section 10 of the Act of 1895 countenances the above suggestion because the magistrates, it was said, have a discretion in making an order and may refuse to make one, but this cannot depend on the position of the people. It depends expressly on the question of convenience, as, for instance, if the court of summary jurisdiction cannot grant adequate relief or perhaps has not the means of compelling the necessary evidence. Lastly, it was urged for the petitioner that to refuse a decree will inflict great hardship upon her. That may be, but she asked for and obtained a non-cohabitation order, which put an end to the desertion, and it is desirable to consider how this jurisdiction of the magistrates should be exercised in suitable cases. I have already pointed out that the magistrate's order may contain all or any of the provisions mentioned in the fifth section of the Act of 1895, and it seems most important to consider whether it is desirable that the non-cohabitation provision should be inserted except in those cases where the wife's safety is involved, or where for some other reason it is necessary to insert it. It does not appear to have been necessary to have such a provision under the Desertion Act of 1886, and there seems to be no reason why it should be inserted in mere desertion cases now. This gives rise to the general consideration of the effect of these orders. Now, at the time when the Act of 1895 was passing through Parliament, it is remarkable that there should have been practically no discussion in either House as to the probable general result and effect of the then proposed legislation. The reports in Hansard, so far as I have been able to find, show that the Act passed almost without anything being said about it, although it went far beyond being a consolidation Act, and gave powers to grant non-cohabitation orders in large classes of cases where it did not exist before. Those who were concerned with it appear to have had their minds, if not entirely, yet mainly on the protection of women rather than on the general effects of the Act, and its probable influence on the morality of the country. The following statistics have an important bearing on the matter under consideration. The number of matrimonial causes heard in this court were—in 1886, 505; in 1896, 609; and in 1903, 743. Very few suits are now brought in this court for judicial separation. The number of orders made by courts of summary jurisdiction under the Acts prior to that of 1895 was—in 1895, 1,035; the Act of 1895 came into force on the 1st of January, 1896, and in that year the number of separation orders made by the courts of summary jurisdiction amounted to the large figure of 5,399, and the number rose in 1903 to 7,292. I have not before me the statistics for 1904 and 1905 The figure for those years will probably be greater and not less. These figures certainly give food for reflection. I can obtain no figures which could show in what number of cases the parties have come together again. I have sat on most of the appeals under the Act of 1895, and, although no doubt there are many bad cases calling for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the magistrates, I am convinced that the result of the Act has been to cause women in numerous cases to rush off to the court on slight provocation and to endeavour to make a case sufficient to obtain an order. This view was forcibly expressed in a recent communication to The Times by a very experienced metropolitan magistrate. Probably the experience of other magistrates is much the same. I have frequently noticed that the magistrates have done all in their power to reconcile the parties, and have adjourned cases from time to time with this object, and I expect that this has generally been the case and that the magistrates have so far as possible endeavoured to keep these applications within bounds. At the same time it may be doubted whether these summary proceedings are suitable for the determination of matters which affect the whole future life of the parties and their children. There is, further, a broad and very serious ground upon which the operation of these orders is open to question, having regard to the very large extent to which they are being obtained—viz., at the rate of over 7,000 a year—so that at any given time there must be an extremely large number of people living separate under orders made during the previous years. That ground is that the direct tendency of these orders appears to be to encourage immorality and to produce deplorable results. Applied first in an age remote and in a state of society different from the present, the remedy of permanent separation for matrimonial grievances would always seem to have been injudicious even in days when persons could not escape from their surroundings as they now can, and when they were more amenable to the pressure and censures of the Church, and is now probably to be regarded as more unsatisfactory still, and as tending to demoralization and providing inadequate justice to the innocent. At the time of the Reformation the Royal Commission issued by Henry VIII. and renewed by Edward VI., composed of ecclesiastics, civilians, and common lawyers, inquired into this subject. The project of reforming the law came to an end with the death of the latter king, but the commissioners' report was printed in the reign of Elizabeth under the title Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, and the recommendations were to the effect, inter alia, that separation a mensa et thoro should be abolished as productive of great abuses and scandal in the marriage state, and that while restrictions and punishments should be imposed upon the guilty party, the innocent party should be permitted to obtain a divorce for, among other grounds, desertion: see Reeves' History (2nd ed.), vol. 4, p. 546, summarizing Ref. Leg. Eccles. 47-56. Desertion is a ground in Scotland and in certain other countries. Nothing, however, was done by the Legislature, and marriage remained indissoluble except by Act of Parliament until 1857, when, after much controversy, the Act of that year was passed, which can hardly be held to have attained to finality. By it the right of divorce was given, but confined to the cases specified therein. The remarks of Mr. Bishop in his work on marriage and divorce (section 37) on the state of things which existed in England before that Act are deserving of most careful perusal. But the figures I have given above show the limited application of this Act, especially having regard to the great increase in the population of this country, and the applications under the Summary Jurisdiction Act appear to be partly for want of means to bring the cases before this court and partly because the causes for orders effecting permanent separation are wider than the causes for granting divorce. That the tendency of these orders is to encourage immorality, bearing in mind that human nature is what it is, and the classes of persons with whom the magistrates usually have to deal, I doubt whether any one of experience sufficient to judge, will deny. That is the opinion which I have formed after a long experience in this court, where case after case shows what so often follows from these orders, and discloses a most unsatisfactory state of things. It is an opinion in accord with that expressed in very forcible language by Mr. Bishop on the subject of divorce a mensa et thoro (section 29 ib.), where he collects the opinions of certain distinguished writers on the subject. The provisions of the German Code, 1564-1576, and French Code may be usefully studied as bearing upon the subject under consideration, especially those which relate to the powers as to turning a decree of judicial separation into a decree of divorce. I will first observe that these separation orders can only be obtained by a wife, except in the one case recently provided for by the Licensing Act of 1902, when a wife is an habitual drunkard as defined by the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879 (a case, by the way, difficult of proof, having regard to the definition there given), and it is most remarkable that in the present state of the law, while on the one hand it is more difficult for a woman to procure a divorce than for a man because she must prove adultery and one of certain other offences, whereas he has only to prove adultery, yet on the other hand she can obtain a separation order from the magistrates for the causes specified in the Act of 1895, but he can obtain no order at all, however unbearable his life may have become from his wife's drunkenness (short of her becoming an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the aforesaid Act), violence, desertion, or other cause. Moreover, these orders really impose a more serious penalty in the cases to which they apply than a decree of divorce would, for the result of a decree of judicial separation against a man is more severe to him, and in certain cases even to a woman, than a decree of divorce. The consequences of each are, in most cases, very much the same, except that the former imposes the disability of remarriage, while the latter does not, so that, for instance, a man may be more severely punished for the offence of adultery than for the same offence coupled with cruelty or desertion for two years or upwards; and, further, in the latter case the wife has the option of choosing whether to apply for separation or divorce. With regard to the orders obtained by wives against husbands, case after case in this court shows that rather than pay the allowance ordered the man goes elsewhere, either to another town, or to America, or the Colonies, and forms other ties almost as a matter of course. Again, a very frequent case in this court is where a wife by her own behaviour, such as drunkenness, violence, and neglect of home and children, causes her husband to leave her. She then takes out a summons against him for desertion; he appears, and agrees to pay so much per week rather than go back. She is found misconducting herself, as might be expected; he sues for a divorce, and asks the court to exercise its discretion in his favour notwithstanding that he had left her. These are illustrations, and are only brought to notice in this court when there is money enough for one of the parties to sue for a divorce. It is easy to guess at the state of things in the mass of cases where there are not sufficient means for this purpose, or where both parties are guilty of similar offences. I am anxious not to travel out of my province, which is jus dicere non jus dare; but the point as to how the Act of 1895 can be administered with regard to the non-cohabitation part of the order by the magistrates, who have, as noticed above, certain discretionary powers and can to a certain extent control the working of the Act so as to prevent as far as possible, evil results, gives rise to the foregoing general observations; and having, since I first sat on this Bench in 1892, found it necessary to make myself familiar with the history of the laws governing the relations of husband and wife and the discussions which have from time to time taken place relating thereto, more particularly at the time of the passing of the Act of 1857 and the results of those laws, of which experience in this court gives very considerable opportunities of judging, it is desirable, in my judgment, as bearing on the subject under consideration, to express the conviction which has forced itself upon me, that permanent separation without divorce has a distinct tendency to encourage immorality, and is an unsatisfactory remedy to apply to the evils which it is supposed to prevent. That the present state of the English law of divorce and separation is not satisfactory can hardly be doubted. The law is full of inconsistencies, anomalies, and inequalities amounting almost to absurdities, and it does not produce desirable results in certain important respects. Whether any and what remedy should be applied raises extremely difficult questions, the importance of which can hardly be over-estimated, for they touch that basis on which society rests, the principle of marriage being the fundamental basis upon which this and other civilized nations have built up their social systems, and it would be most detrimental to the best interests of family life, society, and the State to permit of divorces being lightly or easily obtained or to allow any law which was wide enough to militate by its laxity against the principle of marriage. It is not necessary for me now to express a formal and final opinion upon these serious questions; but the consideration of what I have found it necessary to deal with in this judgment brings prominently forward the question whether, assuming divorce is to be allowed at all as it has been in England by judicial decree for the past fifty years, and for a long time before that by Act of Parliament, any reform would be effective and adequate which did not abolish permanent separation as distinguished from divorce, place the sexes on an equality as regards offence and relief, and permit a decree being obtained for such definite grave causes of offence as render future cohabitation impracticable and frustrate the objects of marriage, and whether such reform would not largely tend to greater propriety and enhance that respect for the sanctity of the marriage tie which is so essential in the best interests of society and the State. It is sufficient at present to say that from what I have pointed out there appears to be good reason for reform, and that probably it would be found that it should be in the direction above indicated. The petition for divorce in this case must be dismissed, for the wife has only proved adultery, and that is not sufficient to enable her to obtain a decree of divorce, and it will not be any satisfaction to her to know that if her case had arisen and her suit could have been brought in Scotland, or most other civilized countries, she would have succeeded.

Solicitors, Crowders, Vizard, & Co.; King's Proctor.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Cozens-Hardy and Farwell, L.JJ.) — June 12.

NELSON & SONS (LIMITED) v. NELSON LINE (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Discovery of documents—Conduct of action taken over by plaintiffs' underwriters—Document in possession of underwriters' solicitor—Plaintiff retaining substantial interest in action—Stay of action till discovery made.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs, as owners of cargo, sued the defendants, as shipowners, for breach of a contract contained in a bill of lading. Underwriters, with whom the plaintiffs had effected a policy of insurance on the cargo to the extent of three-fourths of its value, paid on the policy and then took over the conduct of the action. The defendants desired to have discovery of a document which was in the possession of the underwriters' solicitors, and applied for an order to stay the action until such discovery was given.

Held, that, as the plaintiffs were not mere nominal plaintiffs, but had a real and substantial interest in the action, the order could not be made.

Willis v. Baddeley, 40 W. R. 577, [1892] 2 Q. B. 324, distinguished.

Appeal by the defendants from the refusal of Bigham, J., to order the plaintiffs to make a further and better affidavit of documents.

The action was brought by cargo-owners against shipowners to recover damages for breach of a contract to carry a cargo of frozen meat from Buenos Ayres to London. The action was founded on an alleged breach of a stipulation in the bill of lading that the temperature in the refrigerating machinery of the ship should be kept as low as possible, or, alternatively, on the alleged unseaworthiness of the vessel, whereby the plaintiffs' meat was rendered unsound. The plaintiffs had effected a policy of insurance with underwriters at Lloyd's on the cargo to the extent of three-fourths of its value. When the writ was issued the insurance money had not been paid, and the action was commenced in the name of the plaintiffs alone to recover the whole of their loss. A fortnight afterwards the underwriters paid on the policy, and took over the conduct of the action, and there was thereupon a change of solicitors.

It appeared that while the vessel was loading at Buenos Ayres the underwriters had been informed that there was something wrong with the refrigerating machinery, and thereupon a surveyor, acting on the instructions of the London Salvage Association, had examined the vessel and made a report in writing.

The defendants desired to see this report, and applied, in the first instance, to the Salvage Association, by whom they were informed that it was in the hands of the underwriters' solicitors. The defendants then wrote to the underwriters' solicitors, who, in reply, admitted that the report was in the possession of a member of their firm, but refused to allow the defendants to inspect it. The plaintiffs' usual affidavit of documents did not include the report in question.

The defendants applied for an order that the plaintiffs should make a further and better affidavit of documents.

Bigham, J., refused to make an order.

The defendants appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Bailhache, for the defendants.—The underwriters are interested in the sum sought to be recovered in this action to the extent of three-fourths thereof, and they are pro tanto subrogated to the rights of the plaintiffs. The underwriters are conducting the litigation and they are employing their own solicitors. It would be contrary to justice that the defendants should not be able to obtain discovery of a document of great importance to the action, which is admittedly in the possession of the underwriters' solicitors. It is the practice of the court in such cases to stay the action until discovery is made: Willis v. Baddeley, 40 W. R. 577, [1892] 2 Q. B. 324; Republic of Liberia v. Roye, 24 W. R. 967, 1 App. Cas. 139; West of England Bank v. Canton Insurance Co., 2 Ex. D. 472, 26 W. R. Dig. 77; Republic of Costa Rica v. Erlanger, 24 W. R. 151, 1 Ch. D. 171; Wilson v.

Raffalovich, 7 Q. B. D. 553. If the underwriters were suing in their own name, the defendants would be entitled to this discovery as a matter of course. They ought not to be shut out from discovery because the underwriters were suing in the name of the assured.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and Mackinnon, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants fail to show that the plaintiffs are not the real plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are the only persons who could bring this action, and they are in fact suing for their own benefit. The underwriters have no cause of action. A part of a cause of action cannot be assigned. The only cases in which a defendant has been allowed to have discovery from a person other than the plaintiff (with the exception of such special cases as actions by foreign republics) are actions on policies of marine insurance.

They cited Harding v. Bussell, [1905] 2 K. B. 83, 53 W. R. Dig. 81; Kearsley v. Philips, 31 W. R. 467, 10 Q. B. D. 465.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Bigham, J., refusing to make an order for discovery. The action is one brought by the owners of cargo against shipowners for injury done to the cargo in transit. The cargo owners had insured with underwriters, not to the full value of the cargo, but to a substantial portion of its value. At the time when the action was brought the underwriters had not admitted liability, but about a fortnight afterwards they came to terms with the cargo owners and agreed with them as to the amount of the damage done and paid a portion of it. The plaintiffs, having recovered indemnity from the underwriters as to three-fourths of their loss, claimed to be entitled to sue the defendants for the balance of the loss. It turns out that during the loading of the vessel something happened which put the underwriters upon inquiry, with the result that an inspection was had by a skilled person on their behalf and a report made by him to them as to the condition of the refrigerating machinery. The point we have to consider is whether, the action having been brought in the first instance by the cargo owners and being now continued by the underwriters who have settled with them, the defendants are entitled to have included in the plaintiffs' affidavit of documents this particular document, which is stated to be in the custody of the underwriters' solicitors. It is contended that, inasmuch as the underwriters are interested in the sum to be recovered to the extent of three-fourths thereof, and the plaintiffs only to the extent of one-fourth, the underwriters must be regarded as the real plaintiffs, and that we ought to treat them as such. The question is whether the rules relating to discovery and the cases do or do not entitle us to do that. It seems to me that we are not at large to do abstract justice in the matter. We are limited by the rules and by law. The whole subject-matter of the discussion is the subject of legislation. We must look to that legislation to see how far we can go. I sympathize with the defendants, but I should not be justified in departing from the foothold of existing statutory rules. The actual plaintiffs here have a real and substantial interest in the action, and are not mere nominal plaintiffs. The underwriters came in under their right of subrogation. That is not the same thing as assignment. It is impossible to effect a limited assignment of a right of action. By their right of subrogation underwriters can only put in suit the remedy which belongs to the assured. They have the right to stand in the shoes of the person whom they have indemnified, and by subrogation they take the right to put his remedy in suit; but the action still remains his and not theirs. The fact that here the actual plaintiffs are substantial plaintiffs takes this case out of the class of cases in which discovery has been ordered to be given by a person who is not a party to the action. The rules as to discovery relate to discovery as between parties. They are framed on the basis of there being a right to discovery as between parties, and primâ facie it is an answer to say that the person from whom discovery is asked is not a party to the action. There is no rule which provides, nor is there any authority for saying, that discovery can be ordered from a person who is merely putting in suit the remedy of another person, which other person still remains a substantial party to the action. The case of Willis & Co. v. Baddeley is distinguishable. It does not cover this case, nor does it go to the length for which the defendants contend. I therefore think the appeal should be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY and FARWELL, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Parker & Garrett.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hill, Dickinson, & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) — May 17.

GUARDIANS OF SOUTHWARK UNION v. GUARDIANS OF CITY OF LONDON UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Removability—"Deserted" wife—Misconduct of wife—Poor Removal Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 55), s. 3.

A wife while living with her husband in the parish of Lambeth, in the Lambeth Union, gave way to drinking habits, and in order to obtain drink she used to pawn her husband's goods, and she neglected the children of the marriage. On several occasions she spent, for purposes other than that for which it was intended, the money given to her by her husband in order to pay the rent of the house, and she conducted herself in a manner which rendered it impossible for her husband to keep a respectable home for his children. He thereupon told her that they must part for a time, and that she must find another lodging, and he gave her sufficient furniture to furnish a room. Accordingly when she found another lodging she left his house, and he made her an allowance. Some months afterwards he discovered that she had committed adultery, and he thereupon stopped her allowance, and she went to live with a man in a parish in the Southwark Union, where she lived for such a time as would, if she were a widow, have rendered her exempt from removal. The wife having become chargeable to the City of London Union,

Held, that she had been "deserted" by her husband within the meaning of section 3 of the Poor Removal Act, 1861, and that therefore she was, by her residence in a parish in the Southwark Union, exempt from removal therefrom.

Reg. v. Maidstone Union, 28 W. R. 183, 5 Q. B. D. 31, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) upon a case stated by the quarter sessions for the City of London on the hearing of an appeal by the Guardians of the Southwark Union against an order of two magistrates of the City of London, made on the 18th of December, 1903, whereby it was adjudged that the place from which Ellen Roff, a pauper lunatic, was irremovable was in the Southwark Union.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ellen Roff was the lawful wife of Frederick Roff, to whom she was married on the 28th of August, 1886. From the date of the marriage they resided and cohabited at 73, Fitzalan-street, in the parish of Lambeth, which was not within the Southwark Union, until the 12th of October, 1895. Previously to the 12th of October, 1895, Ellen Roff had given way to habits of intemperance, and had been habitually drunk; she had frequently pawned her husbands goods in order to get drink, and had neglected the children of the marriage, of whom there were four. She had on several occasions spent, for purposes other than that for which it had been intended, money given to her by her husband in order to pay the rent of the house, and had conducted herself in a manner which rendered it impossible for her husband to keep a respectable home for his children. On the 12th of October, 1895, the husband, upon his return home from work, found that a distress was being levied on his goods at 73, Fitzalan-street for non-payment of rent, and that his wife had again spent in obtaining drink the money given her for the purpose of paying the rent. He thereupon told her that he would not put up with this state of things any longer, and that he and she must part for a time, and that she would have to find some other lodging; that she might take enough furniture to furnish a room, and he would allow her 8s. a week so long as she kept straight, and that if she reformed they could live together again. The distress was withdrawn by arrangement between the husband and the landlord, and the wife remained on there for ten days, when she found another lodging. On the 22nd of October, 1895, she left, taking with her sufficient furniture to furnish a bedroom. The husband also left on the same day, taking with him his four children and the remainder of his furniture. Since that day he resided separately from her, and had never cohabited with her since the 12th of October, 1895. From the 22nd of October, 1895, he allowed his wife 8s. a week, and he continued to do so for eleven months, when he was informed that his wife appeared to be in the family way, and was constantly associating with men in public-houses, and especially with one John Humphrey, and he thereupon went to meet her at her brother-in-law's house, but she did not come. Subsequently, on the same day his wife followed him to a public-house, and he was asked by her why he had stopped her allowance. He then taxed her with infidelity, which she did not deny. She was at that time visibly pregnant with a bastard child, of which she was delivered about three months afterwards. He thereupon went away, and from that date he made her no further allowance, and neither knew nor took any steps to ascertain her whereabouts. Except that he visited her at the asylum since the commencement of these proceedings he never saw his wife nor contributed to her maintenance from the time when he met her in the public-house. He was sincerely attached to his wife, and the justices found that if she had reformed her drinking habits he would gladly have resumed cohabitation with her. Shortly after the interview in the public-house and the stoppage of the weekly payment the wife went to reside with John Humphrey at Stanhope-buildings, Redcross-street, in the St. Saviour's Union, and resided continuously with him there as his wife, and afterwards at Mowbray-buildings, Redcross-street, in the Southwark Union, from about September, 1896, to the 19th of July, 1903. On this latter date she left Mowbray-buildings, and was found on that day wandering in the City of London in a state of lunacy. On the 29th of July, 1903, she was removed, by order of one of the magistrates for the City of London, as a lunatic to the City of London Lunatic Asylum. On the 18th of December, 1903, an order was made by two of the magistrates for the City of London adjudging that the pauper lunatic was, on the 29th of July, 1903, irremovable from her place of residence in the Southwark Union.

Upon appeal by the Guardians of the Southwark Union to the Quarter Sessions for the City of London, it was contended on their behalf that the pauper had never been deserted by her husband, and that she had not, therefore, become irremovable under section 3 of the Poor Removal Act, 1861, from the Southwark Union by reason of her residence in that union. The quarter sessions found as facts that the pauper had been deserted by her husband, and that after she had been deserted she had resided for twelve months and upwards in the Southwark Union in such a manner as to render her irremovable therefrom, and they dismissed the appeal.

The question for the court was whether there was evidence upon which the quarter sessions could so find.

In the Divisional Court Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J., held, upon the authority of Reg. v. Maidstone Union, 5 Q. B. D. 31, that the pauper was "deserted" by her husband within the meaning of the Act, and affirmed the decision of quarter sessions; Ridley, J., held that she had not been "deserted" by her husband

The Guardians of the Southwark Union appealed.

By section 3 of the Poor Removal Act, 1861: "Where a married woman shall have been, or shall be, deserted by her husband, and shall after his desertion reside for three years in such manner as would, if she were a widow, render her exempt from removal, she shall not be liable to be removed from the parish wherein she shall be resident, unless her husband return to cohabit with her." 29 & 30 Vict. c. 113, s. 17, substituted one year for three years in the above section.

J. B. Matthews, for the appellants.—The pauper was not "deserted" by her husband within the meaning of section 3 of the Poor Removal Act, 1861. Desertion implies a voluntary act bringing the cohabitation of husband and wife to an end. The wife's conduct in the present case brought about the cessation of cohabitation, and therefore the husband was not guilty of desertion in the matrimonial sense of that word: Frowd v. Frowd, [1904] P. 177, 52 W. R. Dig. 66. The wife by her wilful conduct made it impossible for the husband to keep up the matrimonial home, and he was justified in turning her away with a sufficient allowance to enable her to keep herself. It was only when he discovered that she was committing adultery that he stopped the allowance, as he was entitled to do. In Reg. v. St. Mary, Islington, 18 W. R. 923, L. R. 5 Q. B. 445, the husband left his wife without any means of support. The present case is like Reg. v. Cookham Union, 9 Q. B. D. 522, 31 W. R. Dig. 142. The case of Reg. v. Maidstone Union, 28 W. R. 183, 5 Q. B. D. 31, was a different case from this on the facts, but if it cannot be distinguished it ought to be overruled.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the respondents, was not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Personally I have a great deal of sympathy with the old-fashioned notion that one ought to consider it almost impossible to excuse a husband sending his wife away from his home. I do not say this as meaning that I should have arrived at the same conclusion as the court did in Reg. v. Maidstone Union. No one would say that what occurred in the present case was desertion in the ordinary sense of the word. That word, when one is speaking of husband and wife, as a rule, means that the desertion is doing something wrongful. I should have been inclined to think that, if that be so, that would be the meaning of the word in section 3 of the Poor Removal Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 55)—a section which conferred a privilege upon a married woman—because one would think that a statute would hardly give a privilege to a married woman if she did not behave herself properly. I do not think, however, that Field and Cave, JJ., took that view in Reg. v. Cookham Union, though Field, J., seemed to think—as appears from the passage in his judgment where he says that "the object of the Act is this, that where a husband has by his desertion of her reduced the wife to the condition of a feme sole, she shall not be deprived of the advantage of gaining a settlement as a feme sole"—that the Act intended to confer a privilege on the wife. Still there is the decision in Reg. v. Maidstone Union, pronounced ever twenty-six years ago, a decision which has been recognized again and again, and I do not think that we ought lightly to depart from the law so laid down and recognized as it has been from time to time. I agree that it is not like a decision upon a conveyancing question, upon which conveyancers have acted and on which therefore titles depend. Nor do I think that it can be said that the decision was given sufficiently long ago to let in the doctrine of contemporanea expositio. But I do not think that the mere fact that I myself would not have arrived at the same conclusion is sufficient to justify me in departing from that decision. I do not feel the same difficulty with regard to the judgment of Manisty, J., as I do with regard to that of Cockburn, L.C.J. The former said, with reference to section 3 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, "it must be taken to mean that, where a woman is, whether rightfully or wrongfully, sent away by her husband so as to be left as a free woman, she can so reside as to gain a settlement apart from him, unless he returns to cohabit with her." It was obviously present to that learned judge's mind, as it was to the mind of Field, J., in Reg. v. Cookham Union, that the Legislature was by section 3 conferring a privilege on a wife, but at the same time he came to the conclusion that if her husband sent her away, whether rightfully or wrongfully, he must, within the meaning of section 3 of the Act, be said to have deserted her. It is impossible to depart from the decision in Reg. v. Maidstone Union, and I feel bound by it just as the Divisional Court did. The appeal therefore fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

MOULTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The judgment of Manisty, J., in Reg. v. Maidstone Union expresses my view of section 3 of the Poor Removal Act, 1861. I think that the question whether the desertion of the wife was rightful or wrongful has nothing to do with the operation of section 3. If we were to hold otherwise we should be making the settlement of the wife depend upon the rights or wrongs of matrimonial squabbles of years before. In my opinion the judgment of Manisty, J., in the above case is correct and applies to the present case.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, Howard C. Jones.

Solicitors for the respondents, Rexworthy & Barnard.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Moulton, L.JJ.) — April 24; May 14.

In re BLAIR & GIRLING. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Disbursement—Stamp duty on share capital of company—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 112—Finance Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 9), s. 7—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.

A payment made by a solicitor on behalf of the promoter of a company in respect of the ad valorem stamp duty payable on the nominal share capital of the company under section 112 of the Stamp Act, 1891, as extended by section 7 of the Finance Act, 1899, is not a "disbursement" within the meaning of section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and ought not to be included in his bill of costs.

Appeal by Messrs. Blair & Girling, a firm of solicitors, from the refusal of Channell, J., to order a review of taxation of costs.

The solicitors were employed by Mr. Herbert Ernest Moore on behalf of the promoters of a company to be called the Barkly West Syndicate (Limited) to act for them in the formation and registration of the company under the Companies Acts. They proceeded to do the necessary work, and in the course of it paid the stamp duties payable on registration. One of these payments was a sum of £150, being the ad valorem stamp duty payable on the statement of the amount of the nominal share capital of the company, under section 112 of the Stamp Act, 1891, as extended by section 7 of the Finance Act, 1899. In their bill of costs the solicitors included this sum of £150 as a disbursement. The total amount of the bill of costs as delivered was £525 13s. 7d.

On taxation the taxing-master disallowed the item of £150, on the ground that it ought not to have been included as a disbursement in the bill of costs and transferred it to the solicitors' cash account, but he allowed the items of £18 15s. and 10s. paid as stamp duty upon the registration of the memorandum of association and the articles of association respectively. From the bill of costs, without taking the sum of £150 into account, he taxed off the sum of £83 5s. 7d. The consequence of disallowing the £150 as a disbursement in the bill of costs was that the total amount of the bill was reduced to £375 13s. 7d., whereof more than one-sixth—viz., £83 5s. 7d. was taxed off, and therefore, by virtue of section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, the solicitors had to pay the costs of the taxation. If, on the other hand, the £150 was properly included as a disbursement in the bill of costs, then less than one-sixth of the bill had been taxed off, and in that case the client would have to pay the costs of the taxation.

The solicitors carried in an objection to the disallowance by the taxing-master of the sum of £150, on the ground that the payment was made by them in pursuance of their professional duty undertaken by them, which they were bound to perform, and also that in accordance with an opinion published by the Incorporated Law Society the payment in question was sanctioned as a professional payment by the general and established custom and practice of the profession. This opinion was to the effect that payments by solicitors of stamps and fees payable on the registration of a company were professional payments and were properly included as disbursements in a bill of costs.

The answer of the taxing-master to the objection was as follows: "In my opinion this point is governed by In re Kingdon & Wilson, 50 W. R. 533, [1902] 2 Ch. 242. The ad valorem duty in this case is a stamp duty originally imposed by the Stamp Act and since twice increased by the Finance Acts of 1896 and 1899, and the solicitor is acting as agent for his client in paying this sum and not as solicitor. The amount is very large, and, as might not unreasonably be expected, the inclusion or exclusion of this large sum governs the incidence of the costs of this taxation, and such a result, as was pointed out in In re Kingdon & Wilson is undesirable. The opinion of the Law Society to which I have been referred was given before the case of In re Kingdon & Wilson was decided, and I cannot think either that by the words 'stamps and fees' therein referred to the committee of the society intended to include an ad valorem duty of this description, and I cannot come to the conclusion either that a payment of this sort comes within the certificate given by the taxing-masters in In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603, 613, referred to in In re Kingdon & Wilson. This case is also somewhat out of date as regards modern practice, and, even if the item comes within the language of the certificate I have referred to, which I do not think it does, it certainly does not come within its spirit. I therefore overrule the objection, and, in my opinion, the solicitors should pay not only the costs of the reference, but the costs of the application for taxation."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The solicitors applied to Channell, J., for an order to review the taxation, but the learned judge dismissed the application.

The solicitors appealed.

Gore-Browne, K.C. (Norman Craig with him), for the appellants.—The rule was laid down in In re Remnant that payments made by solicitors in pursuance of their professional duty are properly included as disbursements in the bill of costs. Where solicitors are employed to act in the formation and registration of a company, payment of the stamp duty on the registration of the company is an ordinary and necessary incident of their professional employment, and it is the custom and practice of solicitors to include sums paid by them on account of such stamp duty in their bills of costs. The opinion of the taxing-master was based on In re Kingdom & Wilson, but that was a decision on estate duty, and does not govern this case.

They referred to In re Lamb, 37 W. R. 506, 23 Q. B. D. 5, and In re Grant, Bulcraig, & Co., ante, p. 165, [1906] 1 Ch. 124.

Montague Lush, K.C., and H. M. Giveen, for the respondent.

During the argument the court determined to refer the question of the practice to the taxing-masters, and they received from the taxing-masters the following report or certificate: "In compliance with your lordships' directions, the taxing-masters beg respectfully to state that the practice as to the payments by a solicitor proper to be included in his bill of costs remains the same as it was certified to be in In re Remnant. For a time the practice in the taxing office was unsettled by the decision in In re Lamb, but the Court of Appeal in In re Kingdon & Wilson restored the practice, and in In re Buckwell & Berkeley, 50 W. R. 629, [1902] 2 Ch. 596, confirmed it on what the taxing-masters venture to think are the proper lines and in accordance with the ordinary busines relations between a solicitor and his client. The taxing-masters are of opinion that the duty payable on registration of a joint stock company in respect of its capital is not an ordinary professional disbursement such as a solicitor can be required by his client to make. He is not bound to find the money, but if he does, the disbursement is properly and usually included in his cash account and not in his bill of costs. The taxing-masters certify that this is and has been the practice and custom in cases coming before the taxing-masters, and the cases where a solicitor has sought to introduce the amount into his bill of costs are extremely rare. The inclusion of the amount in the bill of costs would in most cases throw the costs of taxation in any event on the client, and in such cases would impose on the client a tax of £2 10s. per cent. on the duty, that being the taxing fee on a bill of costs; while, if the amount is in the cash account as a receipt, the taxing fee is 1s. per cent."

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. — At the instance of counsel for the appellants the court have obtained a certificate of the taxing-masters, and it is sufficient to say that the taxing-masters do not recognize the custom for which he contends. A question has arisen in this case, as in many others, as to what is a disbursement within the meaning of section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843. It is not disputed that the disbursements spoken of in that section mean disbursements made by a solicitor as such. That being so, the question arises whether a particular disbursement in cash made by a solicitor was made by him in his professional character as a solicitor or was made by him as an agent independently of that character, as a payment might be made by a banker or any other kind of agent. I agree that it makes no difference whether, in fact, the money was supplied by the client or not. What we have to consider in each case is whether it was a professional disbursement. I cannot feel any doubt in this particular case of the payment of capital duty on the registration of a company, that such a payment is primâ facie not a professional disbursement. One reason for my coming to that conclusion is the consideration of quantum. But apart from that, I think that this is not a disbursement which, primâ facie, is a professional disbursement made by a solicitor. It is suggested that, though that is so, yet a custom has been established to the contrary, a custom which shows that this payment must be treated as a professional disbursement. I do not think that that is established. When I look at the affidavits which have been filed as to the practice of solicitors, they do not seem to me to establish the alleged custom. They say that solicitors often do include such charges in their bill of costs as distinguished from their cash account. But in cases where there is no submission to taxation it makes little or no difference to the client whether the charge appears in the bill of costs or the cash account, as, in any event, he will have to pay it. In my opinion we ought not to draw the inference that the custom has been established because many solicitors enter this charge as a disbursement in their bill of costs. And I do not find sufficient evidence of the habitual treating of this charge as a disbursement to establish the custom. I come to the conclusion that the certificate of the taxing-masters is substantially right. Primâ facie, this particular disbursement is not a professional disbursement, and the appellants fail to prove any custom which establishes that as between solicitor and client this disbursement is properly included in a bill of costs.

STIRLING and MOULTON, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Blair & Girling.

Solicitors for the respondent, Statham, Rose, & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } April 30; May 1.

LAW GUARANTEE AND TRUST SOCIETY v. MITCHAM AND CHEAM BREWERY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Mortgage—Security for debentures—Licensed premises—Compensation money for loss of licence—Licensing Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 23), s. 2.

A brewery company specifically mortgaged its freehold and leasehold property, including a leasehold beerhouse, the Running Horse, to trustees as security for certain debentures, which were not redeemable until 1920. The company also gave a floating charge on all its property not specifically mortgaged. The licensing authorities refused to renew the licence of the Running Horse, and compensation was awarded in respect thereof under the Licensing Act, 1904. The trustees thereupon claimed the money as coming within their mortgage, while the company claimed the money as being property over which they had granted the floating charge.

Held, that the trustees were entitled to receive the money as being part of their mortgage security, but that they could not apply the money in reduction of the mortgage debt until the security became enforceable, and that until then the brewery company were entitled to the income derived from the investment of the money.

Adjourned summons.

This summons was taken out for the purpose of determining who was entitled to a sum of money awarded as compensation under the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1904, for the refusal to renew the licence of a certain public-house; the money being claimed both by the defendant company and the persons to whom they had mortgaged the house.

By a deed dated the 3rd of March, 1899, executed by the defendant company as security for the issue of debenture stock, the plaintiffs, the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, were appointed trustees. The deed contained provisions for securing debentures to the extent of £75,000 and interest which were redeemable at the option of the defendant company after the 31st of December, 1920, or earlier in case of reconstruction or liquidation at a premium.

By clause 4 the defendant company conveyed unto the trustees the freehold lands and hereditaments described in the first schedule thereto, and also the goodwill of the business carried on in connection with the same premises or upon or in connection with the hereditaments referred to in the second schedule thereto as to the goodwill absolutely.

By clause 5 the defendant company demised unto the trustees the leasehold premises described in the second schedule, which included the house in question, to hold upon the terms of the leases to which the same were subject, except the last day thereof.

By clause 7 the defendant company declared that they held the reversions of the original terms in trust for the trustees.

By clause 8 the defendant company charged all their other property, rights, and assets for the time being, both present and future, including their uncalled and unissued capital for the time being and their undertaking, with the payment of all principal moneys and interest thereinbefore covenanted to be paid by the company, such charge as regards all freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments and any interest therein (other than interest created by way of security only) to be a fixed charge, but as regards all other premises affected thereby to be and rank as a floating charge, and such charge should in no way hinder or prevent the company from selling, alienating, mortgaging, charging, or otherwise disposing or dealing with their property (other than freehold, copyhold, or leasehold hereditaments) for the time being for any purpose whatsoever for the time being authorized by the memorandum of association, as the company might from time to time deem expedient, and as if they were absolute owners thereof, but subject to the powers so reserved to the company the floating charge thereby effected should attach as a first charge upon all the property for the time being of the company affected thereby or the interest of the company for the time being therein.

By clause 9 the defendant company undertook to vest any other property thereafter acquired in the trustees for the purpose of giving them a further security corresponding, so far as incumbrances would admit, with the security constituted by the present deed upon the premises specifically mortgaged.

Clause 13 provided that the trustees should permit the company to hold and enjoy all the premises thereby specifically mortgaged and to receive the rents and profits thereof and to carry on thereon and therewith the business authorized by the association until the security thereby constituted should become enforceable, and in that event the trustees might in their discretion enter upon and take possession of the mortgaged premises or any parts thereof or receive the rents and profits thereof, and might at the like discretion sell the same or any part thereof.

Clause 14 provided the events upon which the security should become enforceable: (i.) Non-payment of principal or interest for six weeks; (ii.) non-performance by the company of its obligation; (iii.) resolution to wind up the company.

Clause 17 provided that the trustees should hold the proceeds of any sale under the primary trust for sale upon trust and apply the proceeds, after the payment of costs, in payment to the stockholders pari passu in proportion to the stock held by them.

Clause 22 provided that at any time the trustees might, before they had made entry, upon the application of the company, sell or concur in selling any of the mortgaged premises in the same manner as they could do if the primary trust for sale had arisen.

Clause 23 provided that the proceeds of any sale under the powers of clause 22 should be invested by the trustees at their discretion in one or other of the following modes: (a) In the erection of buildings for the purposes of the company. (b) In the purchase of freehold or leasehold hereditaments for the purposes of the company. (c) In the purchase of any interest in any hereditaments comprised in the mortgaged premises. (d) In payment of part of the purchase-money of any hereditaments, the residue to be provided by the company. (e) In payment of any premiums on leases. (f) In payment of any premiums on any renewed, extended, or reversionary lease. (g) In discharge of any mortgage upon any hereditaments comprised in the mortgaged premises and having priority over the security thereby constituted. (h) In payment of the enfranchisement of any copyhold hereditaments comprised in the mortgage. (i) In any investment authorized for the investment of trust funds or in making advances to any tenant of any part of the mortgaged premises upon a mortgage of his tenancy, or in making deposits in the names of the trustees in such bank as they should think fit.

Clause 38 provided that the defendant company would during the continuance of the security carry on and conduct the business in a proper manner . . .

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

and that the company would keep the licences for carrying on the sale of intoxicating liquors upon the mortgaged premises insured to the satisfaction of the trustees against loss or refusal, and would pay over to the trustees all moneys to be received by virtue of any insurance of a licence, to the intent that the same might be applied in the same manner as moneys arising from a sale of the mortgaged premises under the powers therein contained.

One of the leasehold properties comprised in the second schedule to the deed was a beerhouse, known as the Running Horse beerhouse, in Austin-road, Battersea, about which the dispute in this present action arose. This house was held upon a lease for twenty-one years from the 25th of December, 1904, and a further lease of it was granted to the defendant company by a deed dated the 24th of April, 1903, for a term of twenty-one years from the 25th of December, 1905.

By a deed dated the 21st of April, 1904, the Running Horse was sub-demised to the plaintiffs for the residue then to come and unexpired of the term created by the indenture of the 24th of April, 1903, except the last day thereof.

At the brewster sessions, 1905, the licensing authority referred the renewal of this licence to the quarter sessions with a report against its renewal, and the quarter sessions refused to renew the licence and referred the matter of compensation to a later meeting.

The company made a claim for compensation to the extent of £1,556 15s., made up of the following items: Beer trade lost, £575; improved value of premises as licensed premises by reason of the 1869 licence, £143 15s.; capitalized loss of rent, £787 10s.; loss on sale of fixtures, £50.

The compensation authority awarded a sum of £1,510 as compensation in respect of the house, which they apportioned—£272 to the owners of the freehold; £105 to the licensee; and £1,133 to the defendant company.

The trustees did not appear before the compensation authority as their interest was co-extensive with that of the company.

This summons was taken out by the trustees to determine whether they were entitled to the whole of £1,133 awarded as compensation to the company; if not, to any and what part of it.

The Licensing Act, 1904, s. 2 (1), provides: "Where quarter sessions refuse the renewal of an existing on-licence under this Act, a sum equal to the difference between the value of the licensed premises (calculated as if the licence were subject to the same conditions of renewal as were applicable immediately before the passing of this Act, and including in that value the amount of any depreciation of trade fixtures arising by reason of the refusal to renew the licence) and the value which those premises would bear if they were not licensed premises, shall be paid as compensation to the persons interested in the licensed premises; (2) the amount to be so paid shall, if an amount is agreed upon by the persons appearing to quarter sessions to be interested in the licensed premises and is approved by quarter sessions, be that amount, and in default of such agreement and approval shall be determined by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the same manner and subject to the like appeal to the High Court as on the valuation of an estate for the purpose of estate duty, and in any event the amount shall be divided amongst the persons interested in the licensed premises (including the holder of the licence) in such shares as may be determined by quarter sessions: Provided that in the case of the licence-holder regard shall be had, not only to his legal interest in the premises or trade fixtures, but also to his conduct and to the length of time during which he has been the holder of the licence, and the holder of a licence, if a tenant, shall (notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary) in no case receive a less amount than he would be entitled to as tenant from year to year of the licensed premises."

Section 6: "A secretary of state may make rules for carrying into effect this Act."

Rule 2 of the Licensing Rules 1904: "'The registered owner' in respect of any licensed premises includes any person whose name appears on the register of licences as the owner of those premises."

Rule 22: "The persons interested in the licensed premises within the meaning of sub-section 2 of section 2 of the Act (in these rules referred to as the persons entitled to compensation) (1) shall be deemed to be the licensee and the registered owner of the premises, if no claim to be treated as a person interested in the licensed premises is sent in to the compensation authority under these rules; (2) and if a claim is so sent in, shall be deemed to be the persons entitled to compensation in accordance with these rules."

Licensing Act, 1874, s. 29: "Any person possessing an estate or interest in premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, whether as owner, lessee, or mortgagee, prior or parmount to that of the immediate occupier, shall on payment of a fee of one shilling to the clerk of the licensing justices be entitled to be registered as owner or one of the owners of such premises: provided that when such estate or interest is vested in two or more persons jointly, one only of such persons shall be registered as representing such estate or interest."

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and E. Beaumont, for the plaintiffs.—The trustees being mortgagees are entitled to the compensation awarded in respect of this property. The sum was arrived at as being the difference in value of the premises with a licence and without a licence, and to do that the trade must be taken into account. Under clause 13 the company were to hold and enjoy the premises specifically demised until the security became enforceable, but the company could not alienate the mortgaged premises. If part of the premises had been compulsorily acquired before the mortgage became enforceable the proceeds of sale would belong to the mortgagee and not to the mortgagor. There is no express provision, but this would follow by analogy from clause 23, where it was provided that the proceeds of sales should be retained as capital where the sale was by consent of the mortgagee and mortgagor. The mortgagees could have been parties to the proceedings before the compensation authority. Section 29 of the Licensing Act, 1874, read in connection with the rules made under section 6 of the Licensing Act, 1904, makes the rules apply to any person who may be on the register as regards licensed premises. [KEKEWICH, J., referred to Martin v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 14 W. R. 880, L. R. 1 Ch. 501, where it was held that mortgagees, who were entirely outside the award, were not bound by it unless they approbated.] In this case there was an actual assignment of property and also of the goodwill; this property is part of the specifically mortgaged property which the company could not deal with without the consent of the trustees. The whole question is whether money received as compensation in respect of specifically mortgaged property is subject to the floating charge or not. This money takes the place of property and by strict analogy it ought to be invested in the names of the trustees so to allow the company to receive the income until the security becomes enforceable. Under clause 38 the trustees were to receive the insurance money arising from the loss of a licence. The deed does not deal with this compensation money because it was executed before the Licensing Act of 1904 was passed. In Pile v. Pile, Ex parte Lambton, 24 W. R. 750, 3 Ch. D. 36, it was held that mortgagees were entitled to compensation paid for the goodwill of a business, as that passed with the premises. The mortgagor cannot sell without the consent of the mortgagee, and the mortgagee cannot sell unless the security becomes enforceable; if a sale takes place by consent the proceeds of the sale have to be treated as capital under clause 23. As there is no express provision in the deed in respect of this money, it ought to be treated as capital in analogy to the proceeds of a sale by consent and insurance money paid for the loss of a licence. In King v. Midland Railway Co., 17 W. R. 113, it was held that the goodwill attached to the premises and that the mortgagee was entitled to the amount of compensation paid in respect of the goodwill.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and P. B. Abraham, for the defendant company.—The plaintiffs have no right under the Licensing Act, 1904. As they did not register themselves as owners of the charge and were not parties to the proceedings when the compensation was awarded, their rights must accordingly depend on their position as mortgagee. The compensation is given for the loss of the licence to sell intoxicating liquor, the licence is granted to a person and not to a house; this is recognized in the Licensing Act, 1904. In assessing compensation other elements have to be considered besides the value of the licensed premises and the licensee's interest in them it depends partly on the licensee's conduct and the length of time he has held the house. The compensation is not attached to the premises, the sum represents the difference in value between the value of the premises with a licence and without a licence. It is the only way in which compensation can be measured. The cases of Pile v. Pile and King v. Midland Railway Co. can be distinguished, because they were both decided under the Lands Clauses Act; in both cases the mortgagees had gone into possession, and where a mortgagee has gone into possession and the property is sold the mortgagee receives the compensation for the goodwill, because the goodwill is part of the property mortgaged to him; but that does not apply here, when the business is still being carried on by the mortgagors, and the mortgagees have not gone into possession. It was held in In re Bennett, Clarke v. White, 47 W. R. 406, [1899] 1 Ch. 316, that the taking possession of the premises amounted to the acquisition of the goodwill de facto, and that unless possession was taken the mortgagee did not acquire possession of the goodwill. There are no provisions in the trust deed which relate to this compensation, therefore the plaintiffs have to rely on analogies. But this money will not pass under the specific mortgage in the deed unless express reference is made to it. The goodwill that passed to the trustees under clause 4 was the goodwill attached to the brewery company by reason of the house being tied to it, the goodwill of the house itself belongs to the licensee. The analogy relied upon by the plaintiffs of the two cases where it was expressly provided by the deed that the moneys payable thereunder should come into the hands of the trustees, really help the defendants as those were the only cases in which the parties contemplated that the money should come into the hands of the trustees. The deed must be construed strictly and not by analogy. This compensation money comes within the other property to which the floating charge attaches, and under clause 8 that charge does not prevent the company from disposing of their property other than property specifically charged. This money is not part of the leasehold hereditaments. The company has received money as compensation for one of their leases and they are entitled to carry on their business therewith in accordance with clause 13. The Legislature has given the company the right to receive something which was never contemplated under the deed, and the court cannot enlarge the provisions of the deed, so as to prevent this being done.

KEKEWICH, J.—The difficulty in this case is occasioned by the fact that the contractual relations of the parties are determined by a deed of 1899, whereas the contest arises respecting a sum of money produced by the intervention of the Legislature quite irrespective of those contractual relations in 1904, and the deed which defines those contractual relations is extremely difficult to apply to the facts with which we have to deal. By that deed, which is one in the ordinary form for the creation of a charge through the medium of trustees for the benefit of debenture-holders, there is assigned, or strictly sub-demised, certain leasehold property to trustees upon trust for the benefit of debenture-holders. The sub-demise is also in ordinary form, and excepts one day, but the lessor, in this case the company creating the charge, declares itself a trustee of that remaining day, so that for all practical purposes, though not strictly in law, the trustees, who are the owners, are in the same position really as the assignees of the lease which was formerly held by the company. That lease has not been taken by anyone. It is still vested in the trustees by virtue of that which I have called an assignment, though it is not strictly an assignment. It is vested in them as mortgagees, and the equity of redemption is still vested in the company, but the property is not what it was because something has been taken out of it. In truth a restriction has been placed upon the use of it. The leasehold property was assigned as a property on which the business of a licensed victualler could be carried on, and the licence has been taken away and it is now a leasehold property which can be used for any purposes other than that of a licensed victualler. A restriction has been put upon it, and money has been paid for the purchase of the right to place that restriction on. That is the practical result. That is all done under the Act of 1904, and it has been necessary for the consideration of this case to go into some sections of the Act, and also it was right and proper to refer to some rules made under the Act. But really I am not concerned with any construction of the Act. I have not to consider what the policy or the scope of the Act is, or how it is carried into effect, further than this, that it has provided for a certain authority being able to refuse a licence up to that time granted in respect of particular premises and to assess the compensation to those who are interested in those licensed premises, and it also provides for the payment of the compensation so assessed. Again, I am not concerned with any distribution of the compensation. In this particular instance there were three persons or three classes interested. It was, as I have said, a leasehold property and, therefore, the freeholder was entitled to some part of the compensation. We have nothing to do with that. There was also the publican, although not the actual holder of the licence at the time, who was always entitled to some compensation. The people claiming under the lease were the company or those claiming through them who were entitled to the lease, and it is in respect of that that this money has been paid. It is important to see for what the

